INTRODUCTION.

GENEROUSLY employed to write the history of Montana, if I have failed to make it of interest and profit to all concerned, the fault is entirely my own; for never had man such material at hand. As a rule, the history of a great land is a history of wars, schemes, marches and counter-marches, miseries, victories, defeats, and all the petty deeds of selfish men. Here, great men in the glorious pursuits of peace laid the foundation stones without cement of blood, and reared a great State out of material fresh from the hand of God. I may have failed, but, humbly, I have done my best. To have done less had been treason. For all I am, or hope to be, is due entirely to the mountains, here and elsewhere, and I could have undertaken nothing of this sort nearly so well as this work here before me. Nor could I have been induced to undertake the story of any other land or State than Montana, whose very name signifies my home, as boy and man, for nearly half a century.

My mountains still are free;
They hurl oppression back,
They keep the boon of liberty.

And this has been the history of all nations from the dawn of civilization. Take Scotland, her literature, her philosophy, love of liberty, religion, statesmanship, loyalty and valor, whether of common soldier or king, entirely out of the grand story of the British empire and you will have little left outside of craft and trade to distinguish Albion above the ordinary nations that make up the unhappy history of the contentious world.

The mountains have ever been the bulwarks of freedom. Valor is born there, virtue is cherished there, and these are the seeds of song and story. No land ever yet had a literature to endure that had not these for its theme, these offsprings of the pure, sweet atmosphere and sublime splendor of inspiring mountains; and the more glorious the mountains the more glorious the song and story. What then may we not prophesy for Montana when her now torn and devastated placer fields are terraced vineyards, as in Savoy, and the peace and rest of the old pastoral days of Greece shall possess her?

Meantime, our task is with the hard facts of to-day and the days mainly still within the memory of man, that the dramatic story of the brave men and virtuous women who gathered about the cradle of the infant Montana may not be lost to those who come after us. And the task is a serious one, serious in its responsibilities, serious in the fact that we look back over a billowy sea of graves. For so many brave men died! Some died even on the way here, before they could yet look down from the mountains into the thousand pretty vales that promised to them and their children such happy homes. Some fell from exposure and over-toil, some from battle with savages, some died even as they sat for the first time by the new-laid hearth-stone waiting for wife and babe to come with the first wild flowers of spring. It is our duty, sad though it be, to see that they and their valorous endeavors shall not be despised.

Does the world well understand what it cost to come here in the old days? The Pilgrim Fathers set foot in ship and landed on Plymouth Rock. The cavaliers of Virginia sailed pleasantly up the James river and scarcely knew what a camp in the wilderness meant till they sat down in their future dooryards. Even the Argonauts of California, many of them, merely sailed from port to port. But here lay Montana, a thousand miles from any sea; a wilderness in the very heart of an untrodden wilderness, with savages on the four sides of her and savages in her every pass and valley. And so it was that no man ever set foot here among the first who was not in some sense a soldier; aye, a veteran soldier who had mustered and marched and battled and bivouacked, endured hunger and cold and heat and all that the bravest and most unselfish soldier endures for at least his full half year of service before he even got sight of the promised land. And there was this bitter difference between the Montana veteran and the bravest of the brave in any war that has ever been. The soldier of Cæsar, Napoleon, Grant, had the government to feed him, clothe him, pay and pension him; but the hero of Montana stood alone. There is nothing in all the history of civilization more pathetic, more dramatic than this untold story of the Montana veteran.

But as the endurance and exile of the Puritans only made them the more liberty-loving and liberal-minded in the end, as expatriation only made the valorous and courtly cavalier the more courtly and valorous, and as the wild ventures of the romantic and poetic searchers for the golden fleece only made the Argonaut the more a romancer and poet, so may we not prophesy that our larger experience in this larger land may, as time surges forward, show larger results in all that ennobles man and makes life glorious.

It is not for the historian to magnify facts, much less to emphasize what the finger of God has written. But shall these two mighty rivers of this continent, nursed at the bosom of Montana, remain forever mute and unsung? The lines and laws of God gave to Montana all the marvels of Yellowstone. Man has not given Montana so much, but he could not take away the gates; and Montana shall sit forever with the keys of Yellowstone Park in her hand, whatever man may do or say.

In truth, whichever way you turn, whatever you may say of valor and endurance, whatever you may see in the magnificence of nature, be it river or mountain, lake of fire or high-heaved chain of frost, Montana stands matchless, peerless and alone.

Garmented in silver and in gold, a diadem of precious stones, a mantle of white or green or gold about her stately figure as the seasons come and go, there she stands above the world. The air is very clear on every side, that you may see her well. And but for the fear of not being able to do justice to her and hers, how happy the employment reluctantly ventured upon. But whatever comes of it, nothing can rob me of the pride and the glory of having stood by the cradle of this now stateliest State in all the sisterhood and studied her features years before she even had a name. Happy those who were with us among the first, and those who came after and still survive; and thrice happy those who shall come when song and story still keep our memories green and Montana has taken her place in the literature of the world, as Scotland has in the literature of the British empire.

HISTORY OF MONTANA.

Sunt loca montana, seu regivant pars regionis inter montes sita.—Liv. 21, 34.

PART I.

FROM EARLIEST DATE TO THE GREAT GOLD AND SILVER DISCOVERIES.

CHAPTER I.

THE NAME OF MONTANA—FOOTPRINTS OF THE FRENCH—SPANISH POSSESSION.

MONTANA has the only classic name in all the constellation of States (see quotation from Livy already made). This poetic and most appropriate name was familiar to the schoolboy so far back as the time when western Europe was still the vague and dim ultima thule.* Nearly all the States of this proud republic have Indian names. The few exceptions are those named in honor of foreign rulers and the Father of his Country, and two or three that are of Spanish origin. But here is one that stands apart and alone,—distinct even in name as in many historical incidents, characteristics, soil, products and physical features.

Montana, as we see by the journals of Lewis and Clarke, was the very first of all that trackless waste and world of terrors lying west of the Mississippi to be traversed by civilized man. Her climate, soil, woods and wild beasts were well known to the world nearly a century before those of Illinois, Iowa or even the lower part of Missouri, through this expedition from the far-away East; and although these first men came from the East her founders,—they who discovered gold, named the nameless rivers, surveyed and possessed the valleys, built cities and made laws,—were men who, in the first instance, at least, came up from under the setting sun,—gray men, mostly, gray with toil and time, and travel, too, for they had girdled the *Perventum inde ad frequentem cultoribus alium ut inter Montana, populum.—Pliny 6, 22, 7.

Prasiorum gens, quorum in Montanis Pygmaei traduntur.—Ib. 6.

Granville Stuart, first president of the Historical Society of Montana, and at all times an authority in her early history, says the Indian name of Montana is "Tozabe-Shock-up," meaning the country of the mountains.

May I venture to insist that the Indian name of the Rocky mountains, put into English, "Shining Mountains," is the fitter name of the two, so for as applied to Montana?

I would also indicate that the appellation "Montanians," as applied to the people of Montana, is not nearly so euphonious as to say Montanese; as the Latins say Milanese, Piedmontese, etc.

continent and spent years in the gold fields of California. In this, too, as well as in so many other things, how characteristic and entirely unique is Montana.

But more characteristic still is the story of her classic name, a name that was old in books thousands of years ago, when poets wrote with "the antique iron pen." Here where the Indian lorded the soil alone and attained his highest stature; here where the Indian housed before the dawn of history; here where he made his last bloody stand in battle; here where he fought his fiercest and most fiendish fight in all his centuries of warfare with the white man,—he has not fixed his name, as if the swift, sweet winds of these mountain peaks and fruitful valleys were too pure for his bloody memory and would forever "whistle him down the wind!"

While other States have taken much from the savages they destroyed, the schoolboy finds the name of Montana scattered through classics that were written before the Christian era; and this much here in testimony of the fact that the land was first possessed, christianized and baptized by cultured, gentle and discriminating men.

We need no books to tell us that the French were the first white people to set foot on the mighty ramparts of Montana. You can read the French names of rivers, valleys and Indian tribes on all the maps, old and new, from Captain Carver's map of 1678 on down to the huge roll of charts sent to the writer from Washington by the Government only last year, to be used in compiling this work.

I take the succeeding very remarkable and elaborate paper, notes, explanations and all, from volume 1, pages 301 16, of the Historical Society of Montana.

[The following article selected and forwarded to the Historical Society by Mr. John Potter, of Hamilton, Montana, attracted the attention of the members of the society by reason of the exceptional interest which it excited. It is believed to relate the first discovery of "The Shining," or Rocky, mountains north of New Spain. It had been selected by Mr. Potter from a periodical published in Washington Territory, and the directors of the society resolved, contrary to their general rule, to publish it with their contributions, with such notes as it evoked, in the hope that thereby its author would be discovered and further particulars of this expedition be obtained.

There was nothing to indicate the author. Some portions of the story were confirmed by authorities known to the members of the society; some portions bore inherent evidence of truth, while as to the balance the directors their of the society were not informed. The arrangements for publishing it were perfected, when the society was furnished with a pamphlet copy of the same, containing the name of the author, the Rev. E. D. Neill, the accomplished historian and president of Macalester College, Minneapolis, Minnesota.

The society could do no less than explain the awkwardness of the situation to Mr. Neill, who, with characteristic generosity, relieved the officers of the society from their embarrassment by freely consenting that it, with its notes, be published by them. The notes explain somewhat the text, but it yet remains very obscure. It is not impossible that a recurrence to the original sources of information by those familiar with the country from personal observation will make the lines of this remarkable journal plain. It is probable that from the discoveries of Verendrye and his party Captain Jonathan Carver derived the information which enabled him to put forth the pretentious but inaccurate knowledge of the "sources of the four great rivers" flowing into the gulf of Mexico, the gulf of St. Lawrence, the straits of Annian, and the Hudson bay. Twenty-three years before Captain Carver's journey, and sixty-two years before the party of Lewis and Clarke visited this region, this dauntless adventurer broke the stillness of these solitudes by a midwinter journey, fired by an enthusiasm for his faith and his king. It is to be hoped that the archives of French adventure in the Northwest now in process of publication will give in detail this chapter of the history of Verendrye. Those notes indicated by an asterisk (*), and that portion of the numbered notes included in parenthesis ( ), are by Mr. Granville Stuart, while the notes indicated by numbers are by Mr. Neill.—W. F. S.]

SIEUR DE LA VERENDRYE AND HIS SONS THE DISCOVERERS OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS, BY WAY OF LAKE SUPERIOR AND WINNIPEG, AND RIVERS ASSINIBOINE AND MISSOURI, IN 1743. BY REV. EDWARD D. NEILL.

Three Rivers, at the confluence of the St. Maurice with the St. Lawrence, ninety miles from Quebec, is one of the oldest hamlets of Canada. A wedding here took place on September 26, 1667, which received some notice at the time. On that day, Marie Boucher, then only twelve years of age, was made the wife of Lt. Rene Gaultier Varennes.

The son-in-law soon succeeded Boucher, and for twenty-two years was the governor of Three Rivers, and one of his sons, Pierre Gaultier de Varennes, was the Sieur de la Verendrye, the subject of this paper, and the explorer of a northern route to the Rocky mountains.

When a young man, he joined, in 1697, in a war expedition against New England, and in 1705 was fighting with the French army in Flanders. Returning to Canada, he identified himself with the opening of the great unknown West.[1]

In 1716, Bobe, a learned priest at Versailles, who had exposed the deception of Lahontan in placing Long river on the map, for which there was no foundation,* was constantly urging the French government to search for a northern route to the Pacific. On the 15th of March, 1716, he wrote to De L'Isle, geographer of the Academy of Science at Paris: "They tell me that among the Scioux of the Mississippi there are always Frenchmen trading; that the course of the Mississippi is from north to west, and from west to south; that it is known that toward the source there is in the highlands a river that leads to the western ocean. . . . For the last two years I tormented exceedingly the governor-general, M. Raudot, and M. Duche, to endeavor to discover this ocean. If I succeed as I hope, we shall have tidings before three years, and I shall have the pleasure and the consolation of having rendered a good service to geography, to religion, and to the state."[2]

His importunity received its reward, and in 1717 the post erected by Du Luth in 1678 was

* This is unjust to La Hontan, for there is good reason to believe that the information concerning Long river, which he obtained from the Indians, referred to the Missouri, but in passing through the many intervening tribes it became greatly exaggerated. For instance, the many lakes on Long river do exist in the vicinity of the headwaters of the Missouri—such as Flathead Lake, Henry's Lake, Jackson Lake, Yellowstone Lake, Lake Pahkokee, Great Salt Lake, etc.; but by the time the knowledge of them reached the Indians with whom he came in contact, it is very natural they should locate them all on and along the upper Missouri, and it may also be that La Hontan could but very imperfectly understand them, and therefore may have made these mistakes himself.

re established at the head of Lake Superior, near the mouth of the Kamanistigoya, by Lieutenant Roberte1 de la Noue, and another built among the Sioux, with a view of pushing westward the power of France.

Verendrye, in 1728, was stationed at Lake Nepigon, whose waters flow into Lake Superior from the north.[3] While here, the Indians were so positive relative to a river which flowed toward the sea of the west that he resolved to make an exploration. At Mackinaw, while on his way to confer with the government of Canada upon the subject, Father de Gonor arrived from the post which had been established among the Sioux, nearly opposite Maiden Rock, on the shores of Lake Pepin.

After an interchange of views, the priest promised to assist him as far as he could in obtaining a permit and outfit for the establishment of a post among the "Knisteneaux," or the "Assiniboels," from which to go further west.[4]

Charles de Beauharnois, then governor of Canada, gave him a respectful hearing, and carefully examined the map of the region west of the great lakes, which had been drawn by Otchaga, the Indian guide of Verendrye. Orders were soon given to fit out an expedition of fifty men. It left Montreal in 1731, under the conduct of his sons and nephew, he not joining the party till 1733, in consequence of the detention of business.

In the autumn of 1731, the party reached Rainy lake, by the Nantouagan or Groselliers, now called Pigeon.[5] Father Messayer, who had been stationed on Lake Superior, at the Groselliers river, was taken as a spiritual guide. At the foot of Rainy lake a post was erected and called Ft. St. Pierre; and the next year, having crossed Minnittie, or Lake of the Woods, they established Ft. St. Charles on its southwestern bank. Five leagues from Lake Winnipeg they established a post on the Assiniboine.[6] The river Winnipeg, called by them Maurepas,

[3] For many of the facts of this article, I am indebted to two articles of Pierre Margry, published in "Moniteur Universel."

[4] The Jesuit, du Gonor, with his associate, Guignas, came to Lake Pepin with La Perriere Boucher, who had made himself notorious in Massachusetts by leading the Indian attack on Haverhill. They arrived on September 17, 1727 and erected Ft. Beauharnois opposite Maiden's Rock, on a low point. In the spring of 1728, the water rose two feet and eight inches above the floors of the post. Below Lake Pepin, in 1683, Perrot established a post. Above Lake Pepin, on Prairie Island, a stockade was erected in 1695. On a creek of the Blue Earth, not far from Mankahto, LeSueur had a post in 1700.

[5] Groselliers and Radisson, adventurous fur-traders, about the year 1660 went by the Grand Portage to Lake Winnipeg, and were the first Europeans to go from thence to the bottom of Hudson's Bay. It has been said that the river was called after the trader, but it may be after the wild gooseberry bush, called in French "grosillier."

[6] Named from the Assiniboines, a separate band of the Sioux or Dakotahs, and known among themselves as Hohays, "fish-netters." The Chippeways call them Assenay Bwans, or "Stone Sioux," because, living on the wide prairie, they were, for want of fuel, obliged to cook their fish by warming the water with hot stones.

A Jesuit relation, written more than two hundred years ago, says: "As wood is very scarce and small with them, nature has taught them to burn stones in place of it, and to cover their wigwams with skins. Some have built mud cabins nearly in the same manner as swallows build their nests."

(In regard to the first part of the above, the question would arise as to how they could heat the stones without fuel. This curious error is easily explained, however, by the fact that it was not the lack of fuel which caused them to boil their fish by putting hot stones in the water, but lack of vessels that would stand fire. Almost all savage tribes, before contact with the whites, did often cook their fish or other game by putting it into water tight baskets or troughs, and then put hot stones into the water until it boiled. As to the other assertion that because "wood was scarce and small with them, nature had taught them to burn stones in place of it," it most probably arose from war parties of the Chippeways (who were hereditary enemies of the Sioux) watching at a distance, and seeing the Assiniboines gather something on the naked prairie, and make a fire with it, naturally they thought it must be stones, and so told the Jesuits, while in reality it was dried buffalo dung or "buffalo chips," which is still used by all the tribes of the great plains; but the Chippeways, who lived in timbered regions, knew nothing of its use.—G. S.

in honor of the minister of France in 1734, was protected by a fort of the same name.

About this time their advance was stopped by the exhaustion of supplies; but on the 12th of April, 1735, an arrangement was made for a second equipment, and a fourth son joined the expedition.

In June, 1736, while twenty-one of the expedition were camped upon an isle in the Lake of the Woods, they were surprised by a band of Sioux hostile to the French allies, the Knisteneaux, and all killed. The island, upon this account, is called in the early maps Massacre island. A few days after, a party of five Canadian voyagers discovered their dead bodies and scalped heads. Father Ouneau, the missionary, was found upon one knee, an arrow in his head, his breast bare, his left hand touching the ground, and the right hand raised.

Among the slaughtered was also a son of Verendrye, who had a tomahawk in his back, and his body was adorned with garters and bracelets of porcupine. The father was at the fort on the Lake of the Woods when he received the news of his son's murder, and about the same time heard of the death of his enterprising nephew, Dufrost de la Jemerays, the son of his sister Marie Reine de Varennes, and brother of Madame Youville, the foundress of the hospitaliers at Montreal.[7]

It was under the guidance of the latter that the party had, in 1731, mastered the difficulties of the Nantouagan or Groselliers river.

[7] The Indians have a tradition of this occurrence. They state that early one morning a French canoe, with eight men, left a trading-house, which the French had built about the middle of the Lake of the Woods, and stopped upon an island near the last pass to enter the river of Rainy lake. The atmosphere was so still that the wind could hardly be felt. Having built a fire, the smoke was perceived by Sioux warriors, who approached and landed unperceived on the opposite side of the isle, and massacred the missionary and party.—BELCOURT, in Minn. Hist. Soc. Annals, 1853.

On the 3d of October, 1738, they built an advance post, Ft. La Reine, on the river Assiniboine, which they called St. Charles, and beyond was a branch called St. Pierre. These two rivers received the baptismal name of Verendrye, which was Pierre, and Governor Beauharnois, which was Charles. This post (Ft. La Reine) became the center of trade, and point of departure for explorations either north or south.

It was by ascending the Assiniboine, and by the present trail to Mouse river, they reached the country of the Mantanes,[8] and, in 1742, came to the upper Missouri, passed the Yellowstone, and at length arrived at the Rocky mountains. The party was led by the eldest son and his brother the chevalier. They left the Lake of the Woods on the 29th of April, 1742, came in sight of the Rocky mountains on the 1st of January, 1743, and on the 12th ascended them. On the route, they fell in with the Beaux Hommes, Pioya, Petits Renards and Arc tribes, and stopped among the Snake tribe, but could go no farther in a southerly direction, owing to a war between the Arcs and Snakes.[9]

On the 12th of May, 1744, they had returned to the upper Missouri, and the Petite Cerise[10] country they planted on an eminence a leaden plate of the arms of France, and raised a monu-

[8] The Mandans, or White Beards, of the Dakotah family, are noted for being gray-haired. Sometimes children six years of age have this appearance. They were nearly destroyed by small-pox in 1837, and in 1874 they lived near the Arricarees and Gros Ventres, in the vicinity of Ft. Berthold, on the Missouri. Formerly, all dwelt in mud cabins, surrounded by ditches. A few yet live in dirt lodges.

[9] The Arcs may be the Aricarees. The first attempt to trace the upper Missouri is on De L'Isle's map of Louisiana; and on it the "Aricaras" are marked as dwelling north of the Pawnees. They speak the same language. In 1874 they lived near Ft. Berthold, and were about nine hundred in number.

[10] Petite Cerise—Choke Cherry.

ment of stones, which they called Beauharnois.* They returned to the Lake of the Woods on the 2d of July.

North of the Assiniboine, they proceeded to Lake Dauphin (Swan's Lake), explored the river "des Biches," and ascended even to the fork of the Saskatchewan, which they called Poskoiac. The two forts were established, one near Lake Dauphin, and the other on the river "des Biches," called Ft. Bourbon. The northern route by the Saskatchewan was thought to have some advantage over the Missouri, because there was no danger of meeting with the Spaniards.

Governor Beauharnois having been prejudiced against Verendrye by envious persons, De Noyelles was appointed to take command of the posts.

During these difficulties, we find the Sieur de la Verendrye, Jr., engaged in other duties. In August, 1747, he arrived from Mackinaw, at Montreal, and in the autumn of that year he accompanies St. Pierre to Mackinaw, and brings back the convoy to Montreal. In February, 1748, with five Canadians, five Knisteneaux, two Ottawas, and one Santeur, he attacked the Mohawks near Schenectady, and returned to Montreal with two scalps, one that of a chief. On June 20, 1748, it is recorded that Chevalier la Verendrye departed from Montreal for the West Sea. Margry states that he perished at sea, in November, 1761, by the wreck of the "Auguste."

Fortunately, Galissoniere, the successor of Beauharnois, although deformed and insignificant in appearance, was fair-minded, a lover of science—especially botany—and anxious to push discoveries toward the Pacific.

Verendrye, the father, was restored to favor, and made captain of the Order of St. Louis, and ordered to resume explorations. While planning a tour up the Saskatchewan, he died, on December 6, 1749.

The Swedish professor Kalm met him in Canada not long before his decease, and had an interesting conversation with him about the furrows on the plains of Missouri, which he erroneously conjectured indicated the former abode of an agricultural people. These ruts are familiar to modern travelers, and are only buffalo trails.

Father Coquard, who had been associated with Verendrye, says that they first met the Mantanes, and next the Brochets.[11] After these were the Gros Ventres,[12] the Crows,[13] the Flat-

* Among the papers of the late James Stuart, who was stationed, during the three years preceding his death, at Ft. Browning on Milk river, and Ft. Peck on the Missouri, was found a memorandum, evidently referring to a monument of which he had heard, and of which he made a note for the purpose of tracing it up; but his untimely death occurred before he had the opportunity of doing so. The memorandum reads as follows: "Twenty feet in diameter—on river bluffs—round, and run to point—spaces between the bowlders filled with green grass and weeds." The fact of moss and earth having accumulated in the interstices between the stones, so as to sustain grass and weeds, would indicate great antiquity, and the Historical Society are instituting inquiries concerning it, in the hope that it may prove to be Verendrye's monument. The Indians of those regions erect no permanent monuments.—G. S.

[11] Perhaps the Brochets or Fish tribe may be the Assiniboines. The Dakotahs call these Hohays, or Fish-netters. Fish were cooked by heating the water with hot stones.

[12] The Gros Ventres and Crows are bands of Minnetarees, and belong to the Dakotah family. They are found on the tributaries of the upper Missouri and Yellowstone.

The Crows are called Absarokis, or Upsaroka. The Gros Ventres are said to have formerly lived on the Assiniboine and Red river. Governor Ramsey, of Minnesota, in a report, in 1850, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, says: "The chief of Red Lake Chippeways of Minnesota, some years ago, met a village of Gros Ventres, toward the sources of the Missouri. They learned that the smoke of the Gros Ventres lodges once arose at Sandy Lake, and that they had a large village of earthen houses at the mouth of the Savanna river, which empties into the St. Louis." The Gros Ventres now number six hundred and twenty.

[13] The River Crows roam between the Missouri and heads,[14] the Blackfeet,[15] and Dogfeet,* who were established on the Missouri, even up to the Falls, and that about thirty leagues beyond the rapids they found a norrow pass in the mountains.[16]

Bougainville gives a more full account. He says: "He who most advanced this discovery was the Sieur de la Veranderie. He went from Ft. La Reine to the Missouri. He met, on the banks of this river, the Mandans or White Beards, who had seven villages, with fine stockades, strengthened by a ditch. Next to these were the Kinongewiniris, or the Brochets,* in three villages; and toward the upper part of the river were three villages of the Mahantas.[17] All along to the north of the Wabiek or Shell river[18] were situated twenty-three villages of the Panis.[19] To the southwest of this river, on the Marias rivers, and number twelve hundred. The Mountain Crows are in the valley of the Yellowstone, and are estimated at three thousand.

(This is a mistake. The River Crows roam along the Missouri river, from the mouth of the Musselshell to Ft. Benton, and between the Missouri and the Yellowstone rivers. They never go between the Missouri and the Marias, that being in the Blackfoot country.—G. S.)

[14] The Flatheads live west of the Rocky Mountains, in the vicinity of Flathead Lake and river. They are estimated to be about nineteen hundred. Are much diminished by wars with the Blackfeet. They hunt for buffalo on the plains east of the mountains.

(This estimate is much too high. There are only a few hundred Flatheads; but possibly it may have included the Pen d'Oreilles, who speak the same language and occupy the same region. But the combined tribes do not reach so high a number. It is probable that Verendrye met them on the Judith or Musselshell river, where they frequently go in search of buffalo.—G. S.)

[15] The Blackfeet, or Satiska, are divided into: Bloods, 1,560; Pigeon or Pheasants, 2,450; and Blackfeet, 1,500. Some of the Gros Ventres are now incorporated with them. They are between the Missouri, Sun, and Marias rivers.

* As there is now no such tribe in that region, and has not been since the time of Lewis and Clarke, it is highly probable that the "Dogfeet" were a village of Blackfeet, who took their names from their petty chief. In 1862-63, there was a chief residing near the Great Falls who was known as the "Little Dog."—G. S.

[16] The entire sentence, as quoted by Margry in a letter dated July 5, 1875, reads: "Trouvent les Gorges des Missouri entre des Montagnes et le Missouri est la decharge du Lac dont on ne connait pas l'entendue."

Mullan, in a map of a military road from Ft. Benton, on the Missouri, to Ft. Walla-Walla, on the Columbia, marks Flathead lake, whose waters enter the Pacific by the Columbia river, and are very near the sources of the Marias, a tributary of the Missouri.

At the Gate of the Rocky Mountains the Prickly Pear river enters the Missouri, whose headwaters flow through Mullan's Pass, and are not far distant fron the Bitter Root river, whose waters enter the Columbia.

The Madison branch of the Missouri nearly interlocks with the discharge of Yellowstone Lake, and the Jefferson Fork is a short distance from the headwaters of the Snake river, a tributary of the Columbia.

(The literal translation of the sentence quoted by Margry would be: "Found the passes of the Missouri between some mountains, and the Missouri is the discharge of the lake of which they know not the extent." This goes to show that they ascended the Missouri as far as the Gates of the Mountains, at the "Bear's Tooth," near Helena, Montana, and asceuded the mountains in this vicinity, on the 12th of January, 1743. They doubtless got the idea of the Missouri being the outlet of a large lake from the Flatheads, whom they met lower down, and who told them that they went up the river when returning to their country, and that in their country was a very large lake. It also seems from Stoddard's sketches of Louisiana, that from a very early period in the settlement of Canada and the Atlantic States, the idea prevailed that among the "Shining Mountains" (the Rocky Mountains were first called by this name because of the glittering snow upon them), in the direction of the upper Missouri, was a great lake, whose shores were inhabited by a fair people, and where were many wonders.

Neither the Prickly Pear, the Missouri, nor any other stream, flows through Mullan's Pass, or any of the passes of the main range; they do, however, pass through spurs that put out from the main divide, and in doing so have formed many magnificent cañons and gorges. Many of the passes in the Rocky Mountains are but little lower than the main chain on either side of them, but owe their name mostly to the peculiarly favorable nature of the approaches to them on both sides.—G. S.)

* Assiniboines.

[17] The Mahas, or Omahas, on De L'Isle's map of Louisiana, are marked as near the Aiouez (anglicized, Iowas). They live now on the Missouri, in eastern Nebraska, and number about one thousand.

(This note would convey the impression that the Mahantas were the Omahas, which is evidently not the case; for Lewis and Clarke, in 1804, found a village of Gros Ventres called "Mahaha," at the mouth of Knife river, above old Ft. Clark, and these are doubtless the "Mahantas" of Verendrye.—MONT. HIST. SOC.)

[18] Perhaps the Musselshell river of modern maps.

[19] The Pawnees, on De L'Isle's map, are marked on the Missouri, and on Panis, now Platte, river. Jeffreys, on his map, marks a tribe west of Lake Winnipeg, called banks of the Ouanaradeba, or La Graisse,[20] are the Hectanes or Snake tribe.[21] They extend to the base of a chain of mountains which run north-northeast. South of this is the river Karoskiou, or Cerise Pelee, which is supposed to flow to California.[22]

He found, in the immense region watered by the Missouri, and in the vicinity, the Mahantas, the Owiliniock or Beaux Hommes, four villages; opposite the Brochets the Blackfeet, three villages, of a hundred lodges each; opposite the Mandans are the Ospekakaerenousques or Flatheads, four villages; opposite the Panis are the Arcs or Knisteneaux and Utasibaontchactas of Assiniboel, three villages; following these the Makesch or Little Foxes, two villages; the Piwassa or Great Talkers, three villages; the Kakokoschena or Gens de la Pie, five villages; the Kiskipisounouini or the Garter tribe, seven villages.

Galissoniere was succeeded by Jonquiere in the governorship of Canada, who proved to be a grasping, peevish, and very miserly person. For the sons of Verendrye he had no sympathy, and forming a clique to profit by their father's toils, he determined to send two expeditions toward the Pacific ocean—one by the Missouri and the other by the Saskatchewan.

Father Coquard, one of the companions of Verendrye, was consulted as to the probability of finding a pass in the Rocky mountains, through which they might, in canoes, reach the great lake of salt water, perhaps Puget's Sound.

The enterprise was at length confined to two experienced officers—Lamarque de Marin and Jacques Legardeur de Saint Pierre.[23] The former was assigned the way by the Missouri, and the latter was given the more northern route; but Saint Pierre in some way excited the hostility of the Knisteneaux, who attempted to kill him, and burned Ft. La Reine. His lieutenant, Boucher de Niverville,[24] who had been sent to establish a post toward the source of the Saskatchewan, failed on account of sickness.

"Cris Panis Blanc." Drake speaks of White Pawnee,s and Pawnees of the Platte. They now number about eighteen hundred, and dwell on a reservation on a branch of the Platte, in Nebraska.

(Lewis and Clarke say that the Mandans call the Aricarees, Pawnees; and this is correct, because they both speak the same language. Therefore, it was Aricarees that Verendrye found near the Musselshell river.—G. S.)

[20] La Graisse. There is a shrub called Grease-bush, like the currant bush, from which the Indians of the upper Missouri used to make arrow shafts. In the Wind River valley is Greasewood creek. Ouanaradeba, perhaps derived from the Dakotah wasna (ouasna) grease, and watpa (ouadeba) river.

(This river, Ouanaradeba, is most probably Wind river. A portion of the Snake Indians have lived there from time immemorial.—Mont. Hist. Soc.)

[21] The Snakes are known as Shoshonees, Bonacks, or Diggers. The Hictans, Padoucas, or Comanches of Texas, as well as the Utahs, are offshoots of this nation. In De L'Isle's map, the Padoucas are marked as dwelling from the upper Missouri to the Arkansas. About eighteen hundred Shoshonees are on a reservation in Wind River valley, Wyoming, and fifteen hundred are about Ft. Hall or Snake river, in Idaho.

(The Bonacks are a distinct tribe, whose language bears no analogy to the Snake. There are Digger Snakes and Digger Bonacks. It is supposed that the Comanches and Shoshonees were once one tribe, but the Utahs are a different tribe, and speak a different language.—G. S.)

[22] Near the southern sources of the Missouri are found the headwaters of the Colorado, whose mouth is in the Gulf of California.

(The river Karoskiou, or Cerise Pelee (peeled cherry), is most probably what is now known as Green river, which is the most northern, and also the longest branch of the Colorado.)

[23] St. Pierre, in 1737, was stationed at Ft. Beauharnois, on Lake Pepin. The Jesuit Conquard, the old associate of Verendrye, was present in September, 1755, at the battle near Lake George, and in a letter to his brother, says: "We lost on that occasion a brave officer, M. de St. Pierre."

[24] Boucher de Niverville, in 1746, left Montreal to annoy the New England settlements, and returned in May with John Spafford and Israel Parker prisoners. In 1746, he attacked the stockade at Fall Mountain, Charlestown, New Hampshire, and during this raid burned three churches. In August, 1748, he was alarming the people at Williamstown, Ft. Massachusetts.

Some of his men, however, pushed on to the Rocky mountains, and in 1753 established Ft. Jonquiere. In Henry's Travels he says that Saint Pierre established Ft. Bourbon.

In 1753, Saint Pierre was succeeded in the command of the posts of the West by De la Corne, and sent to French creek, in Pennsylvania. He had been but a few days there when he received a visit from Washington, just entering upon manhood, bearing a letter from Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia, complaining of the encroachments of the French. *

The first reliable† navigator who approached as nearly as may be to Montana by way of the high seas was Captain James Cook, the English discoverer who lost his life at the hands of the Kanakas, or "cannibals" so called, soon after his voyage to the extreme north in 1779.

True, the Spaniards and the Portuguese had pushed far north years before; but perhaps not so far north or so near to Montana, in an air line, as this intrepid Englishman. True, also, it is that the Russians, during the reign of Peter the Great, pushed their way through

Three years later, he is burning houses and capturing horses in Virginia, on the banks of the Potomac, fifteen leagues from Ft. Cumberland. He is next at the siege of Ft. William Henry, and then with Montcalm, in his contest with Wolfe.

* From the general tenor of the foregoing narrative, the Historical Society is inclined to believe that the route pursued by Verendrye was as follows:

Starting from Ft. La Reine, on the Assiniboine river, they went up Mouse river in a southerly direction, and then crossed over to the Missouri a little below where is now Ft. Berthold. They then ascended the Missouri as far as the Gates of the Mountains, where the river breaks through the Belt range (near Helena, Montana), and ascended those mountains on the 1st of January, 1743. Thence they passed up Deep or Smith's river, and over to the head of the Mussleshell, and from there they went south to the Yellowstone, crossing which they went up Pryor's fork, and through Prior's Gap, to Stinking river, which they crossed, and continuing on south, came among the Snake Indians, on Wind river, who told them that on the south side of Wind River Mountains was the river Karoskiou (Kanaraogwa, in the modern Snake tongue), now called Green river. The Snakes also told them they would be killed if they tried to go any farther south, because war parties of the Saos Arcs band of Sioux, hereditary enemies of the Snakes, were always watching about the South Pass, to kill and plunder them as they passed to and from Green river, where lived another band of the Snake tribe. Here the party turned back, and, "on the 19th of May, 1744, they had returned to the upper Missouri, and in the Petite Cerise ('Choke Cherry') country they planted on an eminence a leaden plate of the arms of France, and raised a monument of stones, which they called Beauharnois." This proves that they were about a year making this southern trip; but whether they returned by the way they went or not, can not be determined, as there is no tribe known as the "Choke Cherries" now in that region, and the fruit itself grows all over the Upper Missouri country. After erecting the monument they doubtless descended the Missouri to where they first struck it on their outward journey, and from there returned by the way of Mouse river and the Assiniboine, to the Lake of the Woods, where they arrived on the 2d of July, 1744.—G. S.

Of course no one assumes to say what is fact or what is fiction here, but no man can read these lines of Verendrye without admiration.—J. M.

† Doubtless the bold Spanish navigators knew these northern natives well long before, even centuries before; and the Portuguese also; but in their mad and destructive adventures in search of gold they paid little heed to scientific discovery; and romance trenches so closely on truth that we are loth to give them any great reliance. Still, we know from the names Cape Blanco, Straits of Fuca and the Oregon, which remain fixed on the country to this day and are found in the romances of Spain and Portugal written centuries ago, that their ships ran here before those of the exact and reliable Briton.

There is, or was in 1859, a copper plate near the sea shore of one of the principal Sandwich islands bearing this inscription:

IN MEMORY OF
CAPTAIN JAMES COOK, R. N., WHO DISCOVERED THESE ISLANDS
IN THE YEAR OF OUR LORD
1778,
THIS HUMBLE MONUMENT IS ERECTED
BY HIS FELLOW COUNTRYMEN IN THE YEAR OF OUR LORD
1825.

The plate is, or was when I saw it, fastened near the top of a piece of mast which rises about ten feet above a monument of lava, reared by Lord Byron.

In 1878 I saw unveiled in London a heroic figure in bronze of this great navigator, who fell at the cruel hands of the Kanakas. The statue stands facing that of General Outram, of India fame, at the entrance of the Athenæum Club, Pall Mall.

Kamtchatka and took possession of a region not so very remote from Montana toward the last of the sixteenth century. True, Behring passed the straits which bear his name in 1741. True it is, also, that Sir Francis Drake navigated and named bays and inlets north of the utmost claim of Spain, if we except Cape Blanco; but it was left for Captain Cook, so far as we can say positively, to point his ship's prow toward the mountains of Montana and break the hush of ice-bound seas as nearly under the beetling banks of Montana as ocean ships have ever sailed or ever shall sail. Yet it is worthy of mention that the French made land in 1785 near Mount St. Elias, and a few years later opened trade with the Indians.

It may be of interest to relate, also, that Hudson entered the bay which bears his name a century and a half before; but how far he penetrated those drear inland seas we may not know certainly. We know that his courage cost him his life, and possibly he broke the silence of this lonely and deserted inland sea far out toward the rock-built battlements of this now mighty mountain empire.

It is not folly to say that destiny seemed pointing men toward these mountains of gold almost from the first discoveries. Spanish, French, English, Portuguese and Russian,—all sent ships here and there, hovering like mighty birds along sea bank and bay. Then the new man, the wondrous explorer and world-builder, was born of it all.

Two things constantly tower above all others and fill the mind as we approach and contemplate the story of Montana. First, after all the search and research for the road to India, beginning even before the first voyage of Columbus, when King John of Portugal took his brief sail to the West, the one only direct way to India and China was found by passing through what is now Montana, up the Missouri and down the Columbia. Then, after all the mad, persistent search for gold, during nearly four hundred years, the richest deposit of gold yet discovered on the globe was found in the heart of Montana at the heads of the great rivers of this continent. Expedition after expedition went out under the gaudy banner of Spain from the earliest conquest of the Montezumas in search of the fabled cities of gold for a full generation. Yet here in Montana lay all the time, as they had lain for ages, not cities, but literally mountains of gold! These two things, the two most important in the commercial history of the earth, certainly lend a luster and a brilliant attraction to what lies before us, above all other things in all this constellation of States, and we can but approach the subject with eager impatience and boundless exultation.

How many brave men went out to search for the way to India! How many ships! The very catalogue would fill a volume. Magellan, in the "Ancient Mariner," is supposed to say,

> "We were the first that ever burst > Into that silent sea."

And the ships that followed, breaking the dreadful hush of a thousand centuries on southern seas or northern seas, up to the time when Benton arose in the Senate, and, pointing to the snow-walled passes of Montana, cried to his peers: "Yonder in the West lies the East; there lies the path to India!"

First, then, in contemplating the search for the northwest passage, divest your mind of the idea that Montana is backed and banked against a desolate north. The truth is, Montana is in the heart of this continent, so far as fertility and product of soil is concerned. Geographically, she is almost entirely central. She is hardly full half way to the farthest northwest of the United States of America, reckoning from Plymouth Rock.

As for the resources of the northwest of the continent to the north of Montana, they can hardly be estimated. They are simply boundless. When the new India, which England has latterly brought into competition with California and other wheat ports of the world, has put off her garments of gold and lain down to rest, the Red river and other rivers to the north will take up and wear the yellow mantle of Ceres as it was never worn before, and the world will be fed as it has never yet been fed. For the wheat-fields of the north have only to-day been discovered, as the gold fields of Montana were only yesterday discovered.

Let us take up one single book, the first of a dozen ponderous tomes on this theme to be found in the Sutro library at San Francisco. Let us take the very first paragraph in this book of discoveries: we can do no more now. This one opening paragraph will show that Montana is not new. The trappers of Alexander Mackenzie and his followers tracked every stream of Montana from foot to head fully a quarter of a century before the Government of the United States took formal possession of the land; but "they left no sign." Mackenzie, the geographer of the British Fur Company, personally led to the northern ocean. He was discovering lakes, mountains; he was naming rivers that rolled away toward the North Pole.

If you will contemplate the distance of Santa Fe from the capital of Montana and then locate a wheat center as far away toward the North Pole, you may fix some partial idea in your mind of the room and richness to the north of Montana. But here is the opening paragraph referred to, and with this we must end, so far as he and his massive book of expeditions to the north of Montana is concerned, as he sought in vain for the northwest passage to the sea of seas.

"The fur trade, from the earliest settlement of Canada, was considered of the first importance to the colony. The country was then so populous that, in the vicinity of the establishments, the animals whose skins were precious in a commercial view, soon became scarce, if not altogether extinct. They were, it is true, hunted on former fields, but merely for food and clothing. The Indians, therefore, to procure the necessary supply, were encouraged to penetrate into the country, and were generally accompanied by some of the Canadians, who found means to induce the remotest tribes of natives to bring the skins which were most in demand, to the settlements, in the way of trade."—Mackenzie's Voyages, vol. 1, 1.

In a book published in London, in 1755, and called "The Northwest Passage, dedicated to Lord Hillsborough, one of His Majesty's Secretaries of State," I find this final conclusion, that there is no open way from the Atlantic to the Pacific, set frankly down:

"The opinion of there being a northwest passage between the Atlantic and the Southern oceans hath continued for more than two centuries; and though the attempts made to discover this passage have not been attended with desired success, yet in consequence of such attempts great advantages have been received, not by merchants only, but by men of science."

It would seem that the Americans, the natives of the soil, were the first real explorers by land on the globe. The argonauts of old, all men of all ages up and down the old world, clung to ships; and even with us it took generations to rear a race of men who felt at home far away from the seas: the Canadians of the St. Lawrence river and then the citizens of the United States.

And here, let it be repeated, you come upon a mountain of books. Once well away from the sea and in the vast, silent plain, the heart hungers for companionship; none is at hand: even books are not; and so the silent trapper sits amid his silent Indians and writes down his day's adventures.

You find books in excellent Latin, written by pious men of the cross, like La Salle; books by bold and gold-loving Spaniards, like unto those who left the silver stirrup with its silver engraving and Castilian motto in the sands of Omaha, to be seen to this day in the Smithsonian Institute at Washington; but even a list of these books would weary, to say nothing of selections from their pages, however tempting.

The period which followed the search for gold, the northwest passage and the quest for furs, is one worthy of respect,—that of the pious founders of missions for the conversion of savages to Christianity. And yet brief must be the chronicle. The efforts were laudable, brave, most unselfish, but, frankly, the results were meager, almost fruitless. The Indian remained a warrior and a hunter, his wife a slave and a tiller of corn, "a hewer of wood and a drawer of water," till missionary and monk, warrior and wife, passed on in silence together beyond the River of Rest. Still will the name of Father De Smet long survive whatever may be said of results from his brave and laborious life among the first human inhabitants of Montana. Nor will the murdered Whitman, whose roving bands of Walla Walla Indians sometimes pitched tent even on the Missouri side of the Rocky mountains, ever be despised; nor yet the venerable Spaulding, who published the gospels and sang hymns in the Indian tongue as his Nez Perces pursued the buffalo each summer in Montana. But all the time we certainly are confronted with the question, To what good?

The search for the northwest passage, as the sage British author says, brought good in the end, not only to the merchant but to the man of science. But what good ever came of our conquest, education and christianization of the Indian? No man can say. No man will dispute the fact that we made the war with Chief Joseph possible; and there are many grave and good men of the army as well as out of it who will say that we, by our education of the Indian in the use of arms and other (christian) practices, made the massacre of Custer and his men a fact.

Enough to say here that the first explorers found the Indians in the mountains, although wild and at war with themselves as well as those who planted corn in the valleys, well disposed toward strangers. But the white men and the red men who met as friends parted company forever on the field of battle,—we to return home and till the soil in peace, they to pass on to the "happy hunting ground." Yet of these wars more at another time.

It is enough to say here that since these primitive people had neither literature nor tradition we can only read their story in stone and flint as found on their old battle-fields, camps or burial grounds, by miners washing gold in gulches of the mountains or on bars of rivers. When they came or whence, these first people of Montana, no man can say; but it is clear, from various shapely implements of stone, that here was once an earlier and a more intelligent race than the first explorers found, a race that dwelt here before the great volcanic period when portions of Montana, like the California Sierra, were inundated with lava. For here, as under the lava strata of California, these implements of a higher order of workmanship than were in use in this later age were brought to light. But we grope blindly here. The Toltecs left some tablets for their Aztec conquerers to read; but here we have only these few stone implements of war and the camp, about which the speculation of one man is worth as much as that of another.

CHAPTER II.

THE OREGON RIVER—THE SHIP COLUMBIA—AND MORE OF THE GREAT EASTERN RIVER—THE BRITISH NAVY IN AMERICAN WATERS.

THE biographer of a great and good man first introduces you to his ancestry, the very fountain head of his blood and race, and so on down to the first mention of his family in history. Have patience then; for so it is with the history of a great country.

There is to be seen in the British Museum, London, a parchment patent of all the land from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to California. As California was supposed to reach pretty far south in those days, it is probable that this included Montana; and so the first flag must have been English. But this is too vague to dwell upon. Any way, the French came soon after, then the Spanish, then again the French, then the new man, the American. All these changes, so far as the remote Western border was concerned, took place without friction; but the final adjustment of the line between England and America—Montana and Canada—was a serious matter, indeed. The story of it involves the story of Oregon,—Oregon, the grandparent, on one line, of Montana.

You find the name "Oregon" far back in British archives. It is as old, almost, as the name "Canada." It is far more obscure and doubtful of origin. I could find no trace of its origin or significance in the British Museum; nor yet in the archives of Madrid, though of the Spanish name of the sister State to the south—California—both origin and significance are clearly defined there. It must be inferred from this fact that the adjoining Latin power, the Portuguese, were the first to sail up the river Oregon and give it name.

I venture to humbly insist, and entirely without proof or anything at all to bear out the assertion, further than a sort of instinct or keen discernment in word analogies that has never quite misled me, that this river, rising in Montana and wearing such a crown of gold on its majestic head as no other river of earth ever bore, was discovered by some one of the Latin powers; and further, I venture to assert that the early name of this mighty mountain-born river of gold, Oregon, signifies, Hear the waters!

If you will write this sentence down in either Latin, Spanish or Portuguese and then pronounce it, rounding it down, as time rounds down and abstracts all words not fixed fast by literature, you will have not only the sound of this word, substantially, but also the spelling of it as well; and then if there remains any lingering doubt about the origin of the name, Oregon, sail up the Columbia, or go anywhere up into the mountains and "hear the falling waters!" Then truly you must be convinced that this roaring, mountain-born river, like Montana's self, bears what once was a Latin name.

In 1791 the little American ship, Columbia, from Boston, and commanded by one Captain Gray, discovered the Columbia river. And here, again, we see the finger of fate and good fortune, for, scarce forty-eight hours later, Captain Vancouver, of the British navy, appeared in these same waters. This Captain Gray, as if to be certain before the world of American possession, here built a small vessel the first of any account ever fashioned on these shores.

The tide was rising, surging! It must touch the base of the rock-reared and gold and silver ribbed citadel soon now; for many American ships came in the northern seas, and it seemed foolish and a waste of time to the quick American mind to spend a year or so in rounding the Horn and reaching there. A new way must be made, even though it be hewn through the snow-topped battlements of the Rocky mountains.

Only one year later, in 1792, Jefferson undertook to send a competent person from Virginia to Oregon by land, avowedly to make researches in the interests of botany and so on. The enterprise was set on foot by private subscription, and the expedition actually proceeded as far as Kentucky, when the French botanist in the employ of his government was recalled.

It is claimed by some that Jefferson learned his enterprising idea from an American of Boston, Captain Jonathan Carver; but there are also those who hold that the Declaration of Independence was borrowed by Jefferson from a Mecklenburg declaration.* It is most probable that Jefferson knew nothing of Captain Carver or his laudable designs; but it is, at the same time, but equitable to set down what it is claimed that Carver said a full quarter of a century before Jefferson sent his first expedition, which, as said before, only reached Kentucky, and here it is:

"The cupidity of trade had already plunged men deep into the wilderness; and when this passion became joined with a spirit of hardihood and adventure, wide enterprises took hold on the imagination. Among men of this spirit Jonathan Carver was conspicuous. * * * Jonathan Carver, distinguished as we have before remarked, by hardihood and the spirit of adventure, was the first to conceive the project of crossing the breadth of the North American Continent from the extreme white settlements to the shores of the Pacific, and to follow it up by efforts for its accomplishment. Carver's father was an English officer in the time of William and Mary, who came over to the then colony of Connecticut, where, in 1732, his son was born. The son, in early manhood, following his own inclinations, obtained an ensign's commission in a provincial regiment during the war between France and England, in which the colonies bore an honorable part, and which was terminated by the peace of 1763, and the cession of the French province of Canada to Great Britain. Carver narrowly escaped massacre at Fort William Henry; and the peace found him captain of a company. The close of the war having laid open to the enterprising spirit of the colonists the regions of the northwest,

*Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature.

Carver determined to visit the country where are the sources of the Mississipi. In the year 1776 he left Boston and by way of Albany and Michilimackinac proceeded as far as the river St. Francis. He returned to Boston in 1768, after an absence of two years and seven months. His intercourse with the Indians during his residence among them was not devoted merely to the objects and purposes of trade, but he applied himself to the study of their languages and habits, and to collecting whatever knowledge he could of the regions beyond them. His object, he says, was to prevail on the government to establish a post near the Straits of Anian, after a journey had been effected to the shores of the Pacific. As to the information he acquired, Carver tells us, 'From the intelligence I gained from the Nandowessie Indians, whose language I perfectly obtained during a residence of five months; and also from the accounts I afterwards obtained from the Assinipoils, who speak the Chippeway language and inhabit the heads of the river Bourbon,—I say from these nations, together with my own observations, I have learned that the four most capital rivers on the continent of North America, namely, the St. Lawrence, the Mississippi, the river Bourbon and the Oregon, or the River of the West, have their sources in the same neighborhood. The waters of the three former are within thirty miles of each other; the latter, however, is rather farther west.'

"The want of means prevented any immediate farther prosecution of his design; but in the year 1774, Richard Whitworth, member of the British Parliament for the town of Stafford, who seems to have something of the spirit of a projector, united with him in it. 'He (Mr. Whitworth),' Carver says, 'designed to have pursued nearly the same route that I did; and after having built a fort at Lake Pepin, to have proceeded up a branch of the river Messorie, till, having discovered the source of the Oregon, or River of the West, on the other side of the lands that divide the waters which run into the Gulf of Mexico, from those that fall into the Pacific ocean, he would have sailed down that river to the place where it is said to empty itself, near the Straits of Anian. * * * That the completion of this scheme,' says Carver, 'which I have had the honor of first planning and attempting, will some time or other be effected, I make no doubt. Those who are so fortunate in it will reap (exclusive of the national advantages that must ensue) emoluments beyond their most sanguine expectations. And while their spirits are elated by their success, perhaps they may bestow some commendations and blessings on the person that first pointed out to them the way. These, though but a shadowy recompense for all my toil, I shall receive with pleasure.'" *

JOSEPH KEMP TOOLE, the first Governor of the State of Montana, is a native of Missouri, born at Savannah, May 12, 1851.

His ancestors were early settlers in America, and his grandfather, Benjamin Porter, his mother's father, served in the Continental army during the Revolution. Mr. Toole's father, Edwin Toole, was born in Shelby county, Kentucky, February 22, 1808. He married Miss Lucinda S. Porter, a native of his own county, born in 1812. They had a family of ten children, of whom five are living. The mother died in 1881, and the venerable father, now in his eighty-sixth year, resides with his son in Helena, still being well preserved both physically and mentally.

Governor Toole was reared in Missouri and was educated in the public schools there and in the Western Military Institute in Kentucky. He read law in Kentucky and in Helena, Montana, and was admitted to the bar in 1870, after which he was in partnership with his brother, E. W. Toole, for a number of years, and acquired a successful law practice.

Politically, Governor Toole has always been identified with the Democratic party, of the principles of which he is a talented exponent. In 1872 he was elected by his party to the position of District Attorney of the third ju-

CHAPTER III.

THE LOUISIANA PURCHASE—THE FIRST VOYAGE BY WAY OF THE LONG-SOUGHT NORTHWEST PASSAGE—SPANISH INTERFERENCE.

"Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?"

THOMAS JEFFERSON, President of the United States, purchased Montana of Napoleon the Great. "I wish to open up overland commercial relations with China and India."

These are, in substance, the words of Jefferson to Congress, when he urged an appropriation for the first trans-continental expedition made by the United States; and we find that expedition halting for the winter not far from St. Louis, at what was then the utmost reach of American civilization, because the "commandante of a Spanish garrison in the line of advance forbade its progress.

We come now, in the order and march of time, to behold the presence of the first responsible white Americans on Montana soil. This is the little band of explorers under the command of Captains Lewis and Clarke. We have seen that they were halted by the Spanish commandante west of the Mississippi for the winter; for the gaudy flag of Spain still floated over the vast cession to France, although Jefferson had already purchased the whole region, explored and unexplored, as before explained, from Napoleon. But these transactions were not only before the telegraph but also before the post had come to be of general use, and all such matters moved with slow and courtly ceremony.

The Spanish commander, having been at last officially informed that Spain no longer possessed the largest and richest half of North America, the embargo, if the figure may be allowed, was lifted and the explorers slowly ascended the mighty Missouri river. (This "Missouri" is an Indian name, meaning "muddy.")

Having exhausted the summer as well as their strength in their arduous work, we find them a few days below the junction of the Yellowstone and Missouri, not far from what is dicial district, and after serving a term of two years he was re-elected to the same office, and without any opposition whatever. In 1881 he was elected to the Twelfth Legislative Assembly of Montana, as a member to the Council from Lewis and Clarke county, and had the honor of being elected President of that body. He was elected to the Constitutional Convention which met in Helena in January, 1884, at which a constitution was adopted and the preliminary measures were taken for the admission of the Territory to Statehood. He was elected to the forty ninth and also to the fiftieth Congress of the United States, and then declined a renomination for a third term. While in Congress he took a deep and active interest in the welfare of the country and was prompt and efficient in securing the passage of the bill for the admission of Montana. In his speech in Congress on that question he made a most able and exhaustive showing of the resources of the Territory and of the right of her citizens to self government. His effort was a most talented and felicitious one and was very favorably received and commented upon. In 1889 he was elected a member of the convention that formulated the present Constitution of Montana. In the fall of that year his party gave him the nomination for Governor of the new State, and he was elected, notwithstanding that he was the only one elected on the Democratic State ticket. It was a fitting recognition by the people of his State for the efforts he had made in her behalf, which was very grate-now Montana soil; and as they carefully noted the characteristics of the soil, climate, Indians, animals,—all things, indeed, that go to make up the story and the future glory of a great commonwealth, we cannot do better by the reader than give these dauntless and determined men full place in this history by quoting liberally from their journal.

At that time the only settlement to the west of them, if we except the Jesuit Fathers hovering about the bays of San Francisco and San Diego, was that of the Russian trading post at Sitka; though we have seen that the Americans from Boston had stopped at a point near the mouth of the Oregon (which they rechristened the Columbia,—named after their ship and not the great discoverer, as is so often stated) long enough to build and launch a small schooner.

True, there were already some sort of British and French settlements far to the north, but not old enough or of force or culture or advancement enough to have taught the Indians along here what they knew of agriculture.

We note from the journal the following, as showing not only the generosity of the soil and climate but also the semi-civilization of the aborigines:

"Their lodges are circular; * * * they cultivate corn, beans, pumpkins, watermelons, squashes, and a species of tuber peculiar to themselves."

Having occasion to chastise a soldier with corporal punishment, the journal says: "This operation affected the Indian chief very sensibly, for he cried aloud during the punishment. We explained the offense and the example of it. He acknowledged that examples were necessary, and that he himself had given them by fully received, and thus he became the first Governor of the great State of Montana. Few men have a stronger hold on the hearts of the people of Montana than Governor Toole, not alone because of his distinguished efforts in their behalf, but because of his uniform generosity and kindness of disposition. On retiring from the gubernatorial chair, Governor Toole resumed the practice of his profession, and is now a member of the firm of Cullen & Toole, one of the most successful and prominent law firms in the State.

Governor Toole was married May 6, 1890, to Miss Lilly Rosecrans, the daughter of General W. S. Rosecrans. A little son has come to bless their home, whom they have named Rosecrans in honor of his grandfather. Their home is one of the most delightful ones in Helena. While Governor Toole's time is engrossed with his large law practice, he still finds some time for social matters. He is a Scotish-rite Mason.

Still in the prime of life, Governor Toole has the brightest of prospects for a prosperous and brilliant future. In order to give some glimpse of his genius, we copy the following extract from his speech in Congress, already referred to, on the admission of Montana and other territories:

"Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I want to go on record as a warm advocate of the section of this bill which provides for the admission of other Territories whenever they shall have reached a population sufficient to entitle them to a representative in Congress according to the present ratio of representation. New States add to the glory and dignity of the Republic. Their admission ought to be provided for here and now. Nothing ought longer to be left to implication; no condition of things ought to be permitted whereby this inestimable right shall be made to yield to policy or expediency in the future; the rights involved are too sacred to be made subservient to the will and pleasure of the petulant and prurient partisan. I have no fear of the character of their citizenship; they are faithful and prompt in the discharge of every duty. No jurisdiction covering the same extent of country and embracing the same number of people can boast of less crime and vice among the citizens. I speak with some means of information and with some feeling on this question. More than half of my life has been spent among the kind of men who people these Territories. I know their stern integrity and rugged honesty, their capacity for local self-government, and their deep devotion to the principles of our institutions. * * * Upon this important question I beg you to make no mistake. Do not dam up the river of progress. Do not obstruct the march of American manhood toward the destiny contemplated by the Constitution. Popular development and popular government have made us powerful and great among the nations of the earth, but we have not yet reached the zenith of our power and greatness. Let us remember that delays are dangerous; that now is the time and here the place to provide the way by which eight new stars may be added to the flag, and two millions of our countrymen in the Territories shall be enfranchised; and then rest assured that the wisdom and patriotism of our course will be vindicated by the deliberate judgment of mankind."

punishing with death; but his nation never whipped even children from their birth."

This, too, from the journal of November 29, 1803, may be of lasting interest, as seasons do not change:

"The ice continues to float in the river; the wind high from the northwest; weather cold. Our hunters arrive and bring a fine supply of thirty-two deer, eleven elk, and five buffalo, all of which we hung in the smoke-house. * * * We this day moved into our huts, now completed. This place, which we call Fort Mandan, is situated on a point of low ground on the north side of the Missouri, covered with tall and heavy cottonwoods. The works consist of four rows of huts, each row containing four rooms fourteen feet square. The latitude is 47° 21′ 47″, and the distance from mouth of the Missouri 1,600 miles.

"Dec. 1.—The wind is high, from northwest; the whole party engaged in picketing the fort. In the evening we were visited by Mr. Henderson, who came from the Hudson's Bay Company. He had been eight days on his route, in a direction nearly south."

April 7th they broke camp and set forth to cross the Rocky mountains through the heart of Montana. As this was the very first party of white Americans that ever set foot on Montana soil, it is but right and well for all concerned to follow them closely in their arduous advance. The journal says:

"April 6. Another fine day, with a gentle breeze from the south. The Mandans continued to come from the fort, and in the course of the day informed us of the arrival of a party of Ricaras on the other side of the river. We sent our interpreter to inquire into their reason for coming; and in the morning, April 7, he returned with a Ricara chief and three of his nation. The chief, whose name is Kagohweto, or Brave Raven, brought a letter from M. Tabeau, mentioning the wish of the grand chiefs of the Ricaras to visit the president, and requesting permission for himself and four men to join our boat when it descends; to which we consented, as it will then be manned with fifteen hands, and be able to defend itself against the Sioux. After presenting the letter, he told us that he was sent with ten warriors by his nation to arrange their settling near the Mandans and Minnetarees, whom they wished to join; that he considered all the neighboring nations friendly except the Sioux, whose persecution they could no longer withstand, and whom they hoped to repel by uniting with the tribes in this quarter. He added that the Ricaras intended to follow our advice, and live in peace with all nations, and requested that we would speak in their favor to the Assiniboin Indians. This we willingly promised to do, and assured them that their great father would protect them, and no longer suffer the Sioux to have good guns or to injure his dutiful children. We then gave him a small medal, a certificate of his good conduct, a carrot of tobacco and some wampum, with which he departed for the Mandan village, well satisfied with his reception. Having made all our arrangements, we left the fort about five o'clock in the afternoon.

"The party now consisted of thirty-two persons. Besides ourselves were Sergeants John Ordway, Nathaniel Pryor and Patrick Gass: the privates were William Bratton, John Colter, John Collins, Peter Crusatte, Robert Frazier, Reuben Fields, Joseph Fields, George Gibson, Silas Goodrich, Hugh Hall, Thomas P. Howard, Baptiste Lapage, Francis Labiche, Hugh McNeal, John Potts, John Shields, George Shannon, John B. Thomson, William Werner, Alexander Willard, Richard Windsor, Joseph Whitehouse, Peter Wiser, and Captain Clarke's black servant, York. The two interpreters were George Drewyer and Toussaint Chaboneau. The wife of Chaboneau also accompanied us with her young child, and we hope may be useful as an interpreter among the Snake Indians. She was herself one of that tribe; but, having been taken in war by the Minnetarees, was sold as a slave to Chaboneau, who brought her up and afterward married her. One of the Mandans likewise embarked with us, in order to go to the Snake Indians and obtain a peace with them for his countrymen. All this party, with the baggage, was stowed in six small canoes and two large pirogues. We left the fort with fair, pleasant weather, though the northwest wind was high; and, after making about four miles, encamped on the north side of the Missouri, nearly opposite the first Mandan village. At the same time that we took our departure, our barge, manned with seven soldiers, two Frenchmen, and M. Gravelines as pilot, sailed for the United States, loaded with our presents and dispatches."

For many days they struggled up the turbid waters, encountering sand-storms, sand-bars and indeed all sorts of impediments incident to floods, frosts and sudden changes of spring weather, some days making almost no advance at all, till, on the 29th of April, they began instinctively to scent the nearness of the Yellowstone river; and, from what we read in the journal, it is probable that the intrepid Captain Lewis with his four men, was the first of his daring expedition to look upon the waters of this river and press the trackless soil of Montana beneath their feet. The journal says:

"April 21.—Last night there was a hard, white frost, and this morning the weather was cold, but clear and pleasant. The country was of the same description as within the last few days. We saw immense quantities of buffalo, elk, deer, antelope, geese, and some swan and ducks, out of which we procured three deer, four buffalo calves,—which last are equal in flavor to the most delicious veal,—also two beaver and an otter. We passed one large and two small creeks on the south side, and reached at sixteen miles the mouth of White Earth river, coming in from the north. This river, before it reaches the low grounds near the Missouri, is a fine, bold stream, sixty yards wide, and is deep and navigable; but it is so much choked up at the entrance by the mud of the Missouri that its mouth is not more than ten yards wide. * * *

"April 22.—The day clear and cold. We passed a high bluff on the north, and plains on the south, in which were large herds of buffalo, till breakfast, when the wind became so strong ahead that we proceeded with difficulty even with the aid of the tow-line. Some of the party now walked across to the White Earth river, which here, at the distance of four miles from its mouth, approaches very near to the Missouri. The salts, which have been mentioned as common on the banks of the Missouri, are here so abundant that in many places the ground appears perfectly white, and from this circumstance it may have derived its name. It waters an open country, and is navigable almost to its source, which is not far from the Saskashawan; and, judging from its size and course, it is probable that it extends as far as the fiftieth degree of latitude. After much delay in consequence of high wind, we succeeded in making eleven miles, and encamped in a low ground on the south, covered with cottonwood and rabbit-berries.

"The hills of the Missouri, near this place, exhibit large, irregular, broken masses of rock and stone, some of which, although 200 feet above the water, seem, at some remote period, to have been subject to its influence, being apparently worn smooth by the agitation of the water. The rocks and stone consist of white and gray granite, a brittle, black rock, flint, limestone, freestone, some small specimens of an excellent pebble, and occasionally broken strata of a black-colored stone, like petrified wood, which makes good whetstones. The usual appearance of coal, or carbonated wood, and pumice stone still continues, the coal being of a better quality, and, when burned, affording a hot and lasting fire, emitting very little smoke or flame. There are large herds of deer, elk, buffalo and antelope in view of us. The buffalo are not so shy as the rest, for they suffer us to approach within 100 yards before they run, and then stop and resume their pasture at a very short distance. The wolves to-day pursued a herd of them, and at length caught a calf that was unable to keep up with the rest. The mothers, on these occasions, defend their young as long as they can retreat as fast as the herd, but seldom return any distance to seek for them."

The two following days the wind was so violent that they made but little progress. The party were much afflicted with sore eyes, which they supposed to be occasioned by the quantities of sand which were driven from the sandbars in such clouds as often to hide from them the view of the opposite bank. "The particles of this sand," says the journal, "are so fine and light that it floats in the air like a column of thick smoke, and is so penetrating that nothing can be kept from it; and we are compelled to eat, drink and breathe it very copiously. To the same cause we attribute the disorder of one of our watches, although its cases are double and tight; since, without any defect in its works that we can discover, it will not run for more than a few minutes without stopping.

"April 25.—The wind moderated this morning, but was still high. We therefore set out early, the weather being so cold that the water froze on our oars as we rowed, and about ten o'clock the wind increased so much that we were obliged to stop. This detention by the wind, and the report from our hunters of the crookedness of the river, induced us to believe that we were at no great distance from the Yellowstone river. In order, therefore, to prevent delay as much as possible, Captain Lewis determined to go on by land in search of that river, and make the necessary observations, so as to be enabled to proceed immediately after the boat should join him. He accordingly landed, about eleven o'clock, on the south side, accompanied by four men. The boats were prevented from going until five in the afternoon, when they went on a few miles farther, and encamped for the night at a distance of fourteen and a half miles.

"April 26.—We continued our voyage in the morning, and by twelve o'clock encamped at eight miles' distance, at the junction of the Missouri and Yellowstone rivers, where we were soon joined by Captain Lewis.

"This latter river, known to the French as Roche Jaune, or, as we have called it, the Yellowstone, rises, according to Indian information, in the Rocky mountains. Its sources are near those of the Missouri and the Platte, and it may be navigated in canoes almost to its head. It runs first through a mountainous country, but which in many parts is fertile and well timbered; it then waters a rich, delightful land, broken into valleys and meadows, and well supplied with wood and water, till it reaches, near the Missouri, open meadows and low grounds, which are sufficiently timbered on its borders. * * *

"Just above the confluence we measured the two rivers, and found the bed of the Missouri 520 yards wide, the water occupying only 330, and the channel deep; while the Yellowstone, including its sand-bars, occupied 858 yards, with 297 yards of water: the deepest part of the channel was twelve feet, but the river is now falling, and seems to be nearly its summer height.

"April 27.—Left the mouth of the Yellowstone. From the point of junction a wood occupied the space between the two rivers, which, at the distance of a mile, come within 250 yards of each other. There a beautiful low plain commences, and, widening as the rivers recede, extends along each of them for several miles, rising about half a mile from the Missouri into a level twelve feet higher than the river. The low plain is a few inches above high-water mark, and where it joins the higher plain there is a channel of sixty or seventy yards in width, through which a part of the Missouri, when at its greatest height, passes into the Yellowstone.

"At two and a half miles above the junction, and between the high and low plains, is a small lake 200 yards wide, extending for a mile parallel with the Missouri, along the edge of the upper plain. At the lower extremity of this lake, about 400 yards from the Missouri and twice that distance from the Yellowstone, is a situation highly eligible for a trading establishment. It is in the high plain, which extends back three miles in width, and seven or eight miles in length along the Yellowstone, where it is bordered by an extensive body of woodland, and along the Missouri with less breadth, until three miles above it is circumscribed by the hills within a space four miles in width.

HON. FREDERICK W. WRIGHT, State Treasurer of Montana, was born in Buffalo, New York, March 4, 1841. His ancestors were English, and settled at Buffalo early in the history of that place, where his father, William Wright, was born, and was engaged in business for many years. Frederick W. was the older of two sons, and was reared and educated in his native city.

When Mr. Lincoln made his first call for volunteers to put down the Rebellion, Mr. Wright, then only seventeen years old, was among the patriotic young men who responded to the call. He enlisted in May, 1861, in Company G, Twenty-first New York Infantry. After serving two years he was honorably discharged, and the same day on which he was discharged he re-enlisted in the service, this time in the Sixteenth New York Cavalry, with which he remained until the close of the war. He served as a non-commissioned officer, was a participant in many of the hard-fought battles of that sanguinary struggle and at a skirmish near Culpeper Court-House, August 19, 1864, was wounded and taken prisoner. After eighteen days he was paroled, later was exchanged, and in the spring of 1865 returned to his regiment. His final discharge was dated August 17, 1865. It was a detail from his regiment that followed and killed the assassin of President Lincoln. Mr. Wright participated in the grand review of the victorious army at Washington and returned to his home a veteran and a victor, at the time he was mustered out being only twenty-one years old.

The war over, Mr. Wright came west as far as Iowa, and was for a time engaged in sawmilling at Sloan Station. From there he removed to the Cheyenne River Agency, Dakota, where he was employed as Superintendent and Farmer of the agency. His next move was to Northfield, Minnesota, at which place he was engaged in the drug business for five years. In 1882 he came to Montana and took up his abode in Livingston, where he continued the drug business a short time. He was Postmaster of Livingston during the administration of President Arthur, and when Park county was formed he was appointed its Treasurer, being elected twice to succeed himself in that office. In 1892, being elected Treasurer of the State of Montana, he resigned his county office in order to enter upon the more arduous duties of his present position, in which he is now rendering a high degree of satisfaction.

Mr. Wright has been a Free and Accepted Mason for many years. He was one of the organizers of Livingston Lodge, No. 32, of which he served as Master three terms. He is a member of the Chapter, the Commandery and the Shrine, and has held the office of Deputy Grand Commander of Knights Templar of the State.

"A sufficient quantity of limestone for building may easily be procured at the junction of the rivers: it does not lie in regular strata, but is in large, irregular masses, of a light color, and apparently of an excellent quality. Game, too, is very abundant, and as yet quite gentle. Above all, its elevation recommends it as preferable to the land at the confluence of the rivers, which their variable channels may render very insecure. The northwest wind rose so high at eleven o'clock that we were obliged to stop till about four in the afternoon, when we proceeded till dusk. On the south a beautiful plain separates the two rivers, till, at about six miles, there is a piece of low, timbered ground, and a little above it bluffs, where the country rises gradually from the river. The situations on the north are more high and open. We encamped on that side, the wind, the sand which it raised, and the rapidity of the current having prevented our advancing more than eight miles. During the latter part of the day the current became wider, and crowded with sand-bars. The game was in such plenty that we killed only what was necessary for our subsistence. For several days past we have seen great numbers of buffalo lying dead along the shores, some of them partly devoured by the wolves. They have either sunk through the ice during the winter, or been drowned in attempting to cross; or else, after crossing to some high bluff, have found themselves too much exhausted either to ascend or swim back again, and perished for want of food: in this situation we found several small parties of them. There are geese, too, in abundance, and more bald eagles than we have hitherto observed, the nests of these last being always accompanied by those of two or three magpies, who are their inseparable attendants."

CHAPTER IV.

First Official Reports on the Animals, Climate, Soil and Scenery of Montana.

THE climate, like the soil of Montana, has from the first been esteemed rare and remarkable.

But to proceed across the Rocky mountains with the first men in Montana: Here is what Captain Lewis found in the great wonder-world on his approach. The picture is perfect and in such vivid setting, too, that it is pleasant to contemplate it. He seems to have seen everything—soil, wood, water, plums, grasses—everything to be seen but gold! and we fall to wondering what might have been the future history of civilization the world over had they discovered gold, silver and precious stones, these first men in Montana! The journal says:

"April 29.—We proceeded early with a moderate wind. Captain Lewis, who was on shore with one hunter, met, at about eight o'clock, two white bears. Of the strength and ferocity of this animal the Indians had given us dreadful accounts; they never attack him but in parties of six or eight persons, and even then are often defeated, with the loss of one or more of the party. Having no weapons but bows and arrows, and the bad guns with which the traders supply them, they are obliged to approach very near to the bear; and as no wound except through the head or heart is mortal, they frequently fall a sacrifice if they miss their aim. He rather attacks than avoids man; and such is the terror he has inspired that the Indians who go in quest of him paint themselves, and perform all the superstitious rites customary when they make war on a neighboring nation. Hitherto, those we had seen did not appear desirous of encountering us; but, although to a skilled rifleman the danger is very much diminished, the white bear is still a terrible animal. On approaching these two, both Captain Lewis and the hunter fired, and each wounded a bear. One of them made his escape; the other turned upon Captain Lewis and pursued him for seventy or eighty yards; but, being badly wounded, he could not run so fast as to prevent him from reloading his piece, which he again aimed at him, and a third shot from the hunter brought him to the ground. It was a male, not quite full-grown, and weighed about 300 pounds. The legs were somewhat longer than those of the black bear, and the claws and tusks much larger and longer. Its color was a yellowish brown, the eyes small, black and piercing. The front of the fore legs of the animal, near the feet, is usually black, and the fur is finer, thicker and deeper than that of the black bear; added to which it is a more furious animal, and very remarkable for the wounds which it will bear without dying.

"We are surrounded with deer, elk, buffalo, antelope, and their companions, the wolves, who have become more numerous, and make great ravages among them. The hills are here much more rough and high, and almost overhang the banks of the river. There are greater appearances of coal than we have hitherto seen, the strata of it being in some places six feet thick, and there are also strata of burned earth, which are always on the same level with those of the coal.

" * * * The game continues abundant. We killed the largest male elk we have yet seen. On placing it in its natural erect posi-

THE MONTANA UNIVERSITY, situated on the electric road near the city of Helena, had the foundation stone of its fine college building laid in 1889. In 1890 the building was completed. It is 110 x 140 feet, five stories including basement and attic, and is finished and furnished throughout. The culinary department and heating apparatus are in the basement, reception and assembly rooms on the first floor, and students' rooms on the floors above. The supply of excellent water is abundant, and its three bath-rooms on different floors are furnished with both hot and cold water. The ladies' apartments are entirely separate from those of the gentlemen. Young ladies and gentlemen meet in the recitation room, dining hall, and at socials, in which the professors participate. The whole building is heated by the hot-water system, considered by far the most equable and healthful. The walls are of brick and granite, and the building, as a whole, is a most substantial and beautiful piece of architecture. It is just three miles from the city of Helena, and the electric railroad stops at University Place, by which the grounds are hereafter to be known. This location is a choice one. Helena is in full view and the scenery in every direction is picturesque and beautiful. Good ventilation, equable heating, good water and good drainage are essential to health, and here all have been secured. The altitude is 3,800 feet. Indeed, no more suitable locality for a seat of learning could be found in America.

The University is divided into two general departments, the Collegiate and Sub-collegiate. The first embraces those courses of instruction whose graduates receive a degree, and the second department embraces the following subordinate departments: college preparatory, English normal, common school, commercial, shorthand, typewriting, military, music and art. Besides these, two courses of study are offered, the seminary and industrial science, which embrace studies from other courses; also a common-school education for those needing it. The seminary course is designed simply as a cultural course, complete in itself, for those students who may not wish to take a full college course. The industrial science course is one of great importance, as it unites the cultural with the practical and technical, and will be eminently useful to young men. It furnishes also a good preparation for admission to the best scientific schools in the East.

The trustees of the Montana University are as follows: Hon. Wilber F. Sanders, president; Hon. Richard Lockey, tion, we found that it measured five feet three inches from the point of the hoof to the top of the shoulder. The antelopes are yet lean, and the females are with young. These fleet and quick-sighted animals are generally the victims of their curiosity. When they first see the hunters, they run with great velocity: if he lies down on the ground, and lifts up his arm, his hat, or his foot, they return with a light trot to look at the object, and sometimes go and return two or three times, till they approach within reach of the rifle. So, too, they sometimes leave their flock to go and look at the wolves, which crouch down, and, if the antelope is frightened at first, repeat the manœuvre, and sometimes relieve each other, till they decoy it from the party, when they seize it. But, generally, the wolves take them as they are crossing the rivers; for, although swift on foot, they are not good swimmers.

"May 3.—The weather was quite cold, the ice a quarter of an inch thick in the kettle, and the snow remained on the hills, though it had melted from the plains. The wind, too, continued high from the west, but not so violently as to prevent our going on.

"At two miles from our encampment we passed a curious collection of bushes, about thirty feet high and ten or twelve in diameter, tied in the form of a fascine, and standing on end in the middle of the low ground: this, too, we supposed to have been left by the Indians as a religious sacrifice. The low grounds on the river are much wider than common, sometimes extending from five to nine miles to the highlands, which are much lower than heretofore, not being more than fifty or sixty feet above the lower plain. Through all this valley traces of the ancient bed of the river are everywhere visible; and, since the hills have become lower, the strata of coal, burned earth and pumice stone have in a great measure ceased, there being, in fact, none to-day.

"At the distance of fourteen miles we reached the mouth of a river on the north, which, from the unusual number of porcupines near it, we first vice-president; Rev. Jacob Mills, second vice-president; James U. Sanders, secretary, and Hon. Fred Gamer, treasurer. The following trustees were elected by the Montana Methodist Conference, with their term of office to expire in 1893: Rev. W. W. Van Orsdell, Rev. William Rollins, A. B., D. D., Hon. Fred Gamer, and J. J. Aylesworth, Esq.; term of office to expire in 1894—Rev. Jacob Mills, Rev. George D. King, A. M., Hon. J. E. Rickards and Hon. Richard Lockey; term of office to expire in 1895—Rev. F. P. Tower, A. M., D. D., Rev. Frank E. Brush, A. M., B. D., Hon. Wilber F. Sanders, and Hon. John W. Thompson. The Board of Trustees elected the following members, with terms to expire as given: 1893—H. L. Hamilton, Esq., Mrs. H. H. Barnes, and Joseph Scott, Esq.; 1894—Hon. Massena Bullard, James Maulden, Esq., and W. H. H. Dickerson, Esq.; 1895—Hon. A. G. Clark, Hon. W. A. Chessman, and Peter Winnie, Esq.

Faculty: F. P. Tower, A. M., D. D., President, instructor in ethics, psychology and philosophy; J. C. Templeton, B. S., science and mathematics; Osmer Abbott, A. B., modern languages, Latin and English; Mrs. M. S. Cummins, preceptress, modern languages, Latin and English; Miss Laura Fitch, common English; Miss Mary Jackman, principal of the shorthand and typewriting department; M. Francis Nunvar, piano, violin, organ and harmony; Miss Bessie Stevens, vocal music; Miss Mary C. Wheeler, art director and instructor; Rev. T. V. Moore, lecturer on English literature; J. J. Leiser, M. D., lecturer on hygiene; Rev. J. Wesley Hill, lecturer on special topics; Prof. R. G. Young, lecturer on didactics, etc.; Rev. F. E. Brush and Chaplain C. C. Bateman, lecturers on special topics.

The first college term commenced in September, 1890, with forty-four students enrolled. The second year the enrollment was fifty-five, and the third year it was increased to 133. Rev. R. E. Smith was the first agitator of the college. He secured 235 acres of valuable land and $15,000 in money. In 1889 Dr. Tower was elected President of the college, and since that time he has done a large amount of work toward raising funds for it, both in and out of the State, and has succeeded in putting the institution on its present auspicious basis. The cost of the college building was nearly $50,000. Measures are now being taken to liquidate the indebtedness. It is expected that the college lands will sell for sufficient to make a $100,000 endowment fund. With its present board of trustees and its able faculty, it bids fair to become one of the leading educational institutions of the State and of the country.

MONTANA'S FIRST INHABITANTS.

called Porcupine river. This is a bold and beautiful stream, 112 yards wide, though the water is only forty yards at its entrance. * * * The water of this river is transparent, and is the only one that is so of all those that fall into the Missouri. From the quantity of water which it contains, its direction, and the nature of the country through which it passes, it is not improbable that its sources may be near the main body of the Saskashawan; and, as in high water it can no doubt be navigated to a considerable distance, it may be rendered the means of intercourse with the Athabaska country, from which the Northwest Company derive so many of their valuable furs.

" * * * We saw vast quantities of buffalo, elk, deer (principally of the long-tailed kind), antelope, beaver, geese, ducks, brant, and some swan. The porcupines, too, are numerous, and so careless and clumsy that we can approach very near without disturbing them as they are feeding on the young willows. Toward evening we also found, for the first time, the nest of a goose among some driftwood, all that we have hitherto seen being on the tops of broken trees, on the forks, and invariably from fifteen to twenty feet or more in height.

" * * * May 4.—There are, as usual, vast quantities of game, and extremely gentle; the male buffalo, particularly, will scarcely give way to us, and, as we approach, will merely look at us for a moment as something new, and then quietly resume their feeding.

"In the course of the day we passed some old Indian hunting-camps, one of which consisted of two large lodges fortified with a circular fence twenty or thirty feet in diameter, and made of timber laid horizontally, the beams overlying each other to the height of five feet, and covered with the trunks and limbs of trees that have drifted down the river. The lodges themselves are formed by three or more strong sticks, about the size of a man's leg or arm, and twelve feet long, which are attached at the top by a withe of small willows, and spread out so as to form at the base a circle of from ten to fourteen feet in diameter. Against these are placed pieces of driftwood and fallen timber, usually in three ranges, one on the other, and the interstices are covered with leaves, bark and straw, so as to form a conical figure about ten feet high, with a small aperture in one side for the door. It is, however, at best, a very imperfect shelter against the inclemencies of the seasons.

"May 5.—We had a fine morning, and, the wind being from the east, we used the sails. At the distance of five miles we came to a small island, and twelve miles farther encamped on the north, at the distance of seventeen miles. The country, like that of yesterday, is beautiful in the extreme. Among the vast quantities of game around us, we distinguish a small species of goose, differing considerably from the common Canadian goose, its neck, head and beak being much thicker, larger and stronger in proportion to its size, which is nearly a third smaller; its noise, too, resembling more that of the brant, or of a young goose that has not yet fully acquired its note. In other respects—its color, habits, and the number of feathers in the tail—the two species correspond. This species also associates in flocks with the large geese, but we have not seen it pair off with them. The white brant is about the size of the common brown brant, or two-thirds that of the common goose, than which it is also six inches shorter from the extremity of the wings, though the beak, head and neck are larger and stronger. The body and wings are of a beautiful pure white, except the black feathers of the first and second joints of the wings. The beak and legs are of a reddish or flesh-colored white; the eye of a moderate size, the pupil of a deep sea-green, encircled with a ring of yellowish brown; the tail consists of sixteen feathers equally long; the flesh is dark, and, as well as its note, differs but little from that of the common brant, which in form and habits it resembles, and with which it sometimes unites in a common flock. The white brants also associate by themselves in large flocks; but, as they do not seem to be mated or paired off, it is doubtful whether they reside here during the summer for the purpose of rearing their young.

"The wolves are also very abundant, and are

HON. R. S. FORD, president of the Great Falls National Bank and one of the prominent business men of northern Montana, is a pioneer of 1864.

He was born in Simpson county, Kentucky, January 14, 1842, and is of English and Irish ancestry who emigrated to America and settled in New York previous to the Revolution. His grandfather, Robert Ford, was one of the pioneer settlers of Ohio; and his father, John C. Ford, was born there, but when a child his parents moved with him to Kentucky; when he grew up he became a carpenter as well as farmer, and married Miss Henrietta Simpson, a native of that State and a descendant of the family in honor of whom Simpson county was named. He continued to reside in Kentucky till his death, in his thirtieth year, leaving his widow with four children. Her brothers removed to Missouri in 1855, and she with her children went with them and resided there until the war came on, when she returned to Kentucky, where she died in 1873, in the fifty-fourth year of her age. In religious faith both she and her husband were Baptists: both were honest, honored and respected people.

The son, Robert Simpson Ford, was educated in the public schools of Westport, Missouri. In 1861, when the war broke out, he was nineteen years of age, and was obliged to go either into the army or to the West. By the advice of his mother he came West, arriving at Nebraska City, where he became engaged in freighting to Julesburg and Fort Laramie. During the first year he worked for wages; in 1862 he became assistant wagonmaster; in 1863 he was given charge of a train of wagons; and in 1864 he came to Montana, in charge of an ox train of merchandise. After his arrival here he continued in the freighting business, with his large ox trains, hauling freight from Cow Island to Fort Benton, and thence on to Helena and other points, for four years. During all this period he camped out most of the time, and with his wages so earned contributed to the support of his mother and the younger children.

In 1868 he returned to Kentucky to see her. He remained there till the following spring, when he went to Colorado and purchased 300 Texas cows, drove them to Montana and sold them in the Beaver Head valley that fall. Again he returned to Denver and remained there till the spring following, when he bought 700 head of cattle and remained with them till the summer of 1871, when he brought them to the Sun River valley in Montana, built a cabin a mile and a half above the point where the city of Great Falls now stands, wintered his stock there and in the spring sold them. Returning to Colorado again for still more cattle, he purchased a drove of 1,250 and wintered them at the same place; and thus he became one of the pioneers of the Sun river valley.

In the spring of 1873 he moved to within four miles of the town of Sun River, located a ranch in the Sun River valley, and continued his stock-raising and dealing in cattle. For a number of years he furnished the Government at Fort Shaw with their beef cattle, doing a large business and meeting with satisfactory success.

In 1878 he returned to his native State, Kentucky, and married Miss Sue McClanahan, a native of that State, and she returned with him to his fine ranch on Sun river. There he continued to improve his property, building a good residence and continuing to make money rapidly until 1886, at which time he sold the most of his stock and became a money lender. In 1891 he changed his residence from his ranch to Great Falls, still retaining his Sun River property.

In 1891, in company with John T. Murphy and E. G. Maclay, he organized the Great Falls National Bank, with a capital of $250,000, and he built in the city one of the fine two-story business blocks. He was elected president of the bank, and has since made the management of its affairs his principal business, for which he is specially qualified.

In politics he has always been Democratic. In 1875 his fellow-citizens of Choteau county chose him as a Representative to the Territorial Legislature, which convened the following January. After serving his term, in a manner satisfactory to his constituents, the people of Choteau and Meagher counties elected him to the Territorial Senate, and in that body he served honorably throughout his term. In 1884 he was elected County Commissioner, and also performed the many embarrassing duties of that office satisfactorily. Besides the attention which Mr. Ford has given to public affairs, he has always attended strictly to his own business matters, and hence his great success. In this way the poor boy of twenty years of age has come to the wild West and made himself independent in financial affairs and a leading man in the public welfare.

He has had five children, but only two are spared to him by the hand of death, namely, Lee McClanahan and Shirley Samuel, both at home; and it is hoped that they may live to be a blessing to their honored parents and an honor to the great State of which they are native sons.

of two species. First, the small wolf, or burrowing dog of the prairies, which are found in almost all the open plains. It is of an intermediate size between the fox and dog, very delicately formed, fleet and active; the ears are large, erect and pointed; the head long and pointed, like that of the fox; the tail long and bushy; the hair and fur of a pale, reddish-brown color, though much coarser than that of the fox; the eye of a deep sea-green color, small and piercing; the claws rather longer than those of the wolf of the Atlantic States, which animal, as far as we can perceive, is not to be found on this side of the river Platte. These wolves usually associate in bands of ten or twelve, and are rarely, if ever, seen alone, not being powerful enough singly to attack a deer or antelope. They live and rear their young in burrows, which they fix near some pass or spot much frequented by game, and sally out in a body against any animal which they can overpower, but on the slightest alarm retire to their burrows, making a noise exactly like that of a small dog.

"The second species is lower, shorter in the legs, and thicker than the Atlantic wolf. Their color, which is not affected by the seasons, is of every variety of shade, from a gray or blackish brown to a cream-colored white. They do not burrow, nor do they bark, but howl; they frequent the woods and plains, and skulk along the skirts of the buffalo herds, in order to attack the weary or wounded.

"Captain Clarke and one of the hunters met this evening the largest brown bear we have seen. As they fired he did not attempt to attack, but fled with a most tremendous roar; and such was his extraordinary tenacity of life, that, although he had five balls passed through his lungs, and five other wounds, he swam more than half across the river to a sand-bar and survived twenty minutes! He weighed between 500 and 600 pounds at least, and measured eight feet seven inches and a half from the nose to the extremity of the hind feet, five feet ten inches and a half round the breast, three feet eleven inches round the hock, one foot eleven inches round the middle of the fore-leg; and his claws, five on each foot, were four inches and three-eighths in length. This animal differs from the common black bear in having his claws much longer and more blunt; his tail shorter; his hair of a reddish or bay brown, longer, finer and more abundant; his liver, lungs and heart much larger even in proportion to his size, the heart particularly being equal to that of a large ox; and his mane ten times larger. Besides fish and flesh, he feeds on roots and every kind of wild fruit.

" * * * May 6.—The morning being fair, and the wind favorable, we set sail, and proceeded very well the greater part of the day. The country continues level, rich and beautiful; the low grounds wide, and, comparatively with the other parts of the Missouri, well supplied with wood. The appearances of coal, pumice-stone and burned earth have ceased, though the salts of tartar or vegetable salts continue on the banks and sand-bars, and sometimes in the little ravines at the base of the hills.

" * * * The game is now in great quantities, particularly the elk and buffalo, which last are so gentle that the men are obliged to drive them out of the way with sticks and stones. The ravages of the beaver are very apparent. In one place the timber was entirely prostrated for a space of three acres in front on the river, and one in depth, and a great part of it removed, though the trees were numerous, and some of them as thick as the body of a man. * * * For several days past the river has been as wide as it generally is near its mouth; but, as it is much shallower, crowded with sand-bars, and the color of the water has become much clearer, we do not yet despair of reaching the Rocky mountains, for which we are very anxious."

For nearly a century now the simple and direct story of those first explorers has stood the tests of closest observation unchallenged. Equipped with incalculable courage and endurance, calm judgment and sober observation, directed by the greatest minds the Republic has yet produced, provided with all that science had as yet laid in man's hands to work with intelligently, it would be a bold historian, nay, more, a vain and conceited one, who would attempt to intrude his own observations and opinions where these men passed and left a path of enduring light. No apology need be tendered by any historian for quoting their simplest utterance when in line with the history of Montana; for, however much his heart might be in his work and however well-informed he might be concerning it, he could never equal this narrative of theirs. For it surpasses in clear, simple truth and unostentatious brevity those books of antiquity which have always charmed every school boy who sipped at the Pierian spring of the Latins.

Here in this next quotation we almost catch our breath at the nearness which they came to the discovery of gold; for you observe they note the discovery of quartz in "numerous appearances."

"May 11," proceeds the journal, "we saw and visited some high hills on the north side, about three miles from the river, whose tops were covered with the pitch-pine. This is the first pine we have seen on the Missouri, and it is like that of Virginia, except that the leaves are somewhat longer. Among this pine there is also a dwarf cedar, sometimes between three and four feet high, but generally spreading itself like a vine along the surface of the earth, which it covers very closely, putting out roots from the under side. The fruit and smell resemble those of the common red cedar, but the leaf is finer and more delicate. The tops of the hills where these plants grow have a soil quite different from that just described: the basis of it is usually yellow or white clay, and the general appearance light-colored, and barren, some scattering tufts of sedge being almost its only herbage.

"About five in the afternoon, one of our men, who had been afflicted with boils, being suffered to walk on shore, came running to the boat with loud cries and every symptom of terror and distress. For some time after we had taken him on board he was so much out of breath as to be unable to describe the cause of his anxiety; but he at length told us that about a mile and a half below he had shot a brown bear, which immediately turned, and was in close pursuit of him; though being badly wounded, he could not overtake him. Captain Lewis, with seven men, immediately went in search of him; and, having found his track, followed him by the blood for a mile, found him concealed in some thick brushwood, and shot him with two balls through the skull. Though somewhat smaller than that killed a few days ago, he was a monstrous animal and a most terrible enemy. Our man had shot him through the center of the lungs; yet he had pursued him furiously for half a mile, then returned more than twice that distance, and with his paws had prepared himself a bed in the earth two feet deep and five feet long, and was perfectly alive when we found him.

which was at least two hours after he received the wound. The wonderful power of life which these animals possess renders them dreadful; their very track in the mud or sand, which we have found sometimes eleven inches long and seven and a quarter wide, exclusive of the claws, is alarming; and we had rather encounter two Indians than meet a single bear. There is no chance of killing them by a single shot, unless the ball goes through the brain, and this is very difficult on account of two large muscles which cover the side of the forehead and the sharp projection of the center of the frontal bone, which also is thick. The fleece and skin of this bear were a heavy burden for two men, and the oil amounted to eight gallons.

"May 12.—The weather being clear and calm we set out early. On both sides of the river the country is rough and broken, the low grounds becoming narrower. The soil of the hills has now altered its texture considerably; their base, like that of the river plains, is, as usual, a rich, black loam, while from the middle to the summit they are composed of a light brown-colored earth, poor and sterile and intermixed with a coarse white sand.

"May 14.—Toward evening the men in the hindmost canoes discovered a large brown bear lying in the open grounds, about 300 paces from the river. Six of them, all good hunters, immediately went to attack him, and, concealing themselves by a small eminence, came unperceived within forty paces of him. Four of the hunters now fired and each lodged a ball in his body, two of them directly through the lungs. The furious animal sprang up and ran open-mouthed upon them. As he came near, the two hunters who had reserved their fire gave him two wounds, one of which, breaking his shoulder, retarded his motion for a moment; but before they could reload he was so near that they were obliged to run to the river, and before they had reached it he had almost overtaken them. Two jumped into the canoe, the other four separated and concealing themselves in the willows fired as fast as they could reload. They struck him several times, but instead of weakening the monster each shot seemed only to direct him toward the hunters till at last he pursued two of them so closely that they threw aside their guns and pouches and jumped down a perpendicular bank of twenty feet into the river: the bear sprang after them and was within a few feet of the hindmost when one of the hunters on shore shot him in the head and finally killed him. They dragged him to the shore and found that eight balls had passed through him in different directions. The bear was old and the meat was tough; so they took the skin only and rejoined us at camp, where we had been as much terrified by an accident of a different kind.

"This was the narrow escape of one of our canoes containing all our papers, instruments, medicine and almost every article indispensable for the success of our enterprise. The canoe being under sail, a sudden squall of wind struck her obliquely and turned her considerably. The man at the helm was unluckily the worst steersman of the party, became alarmed, and, instead of putting her before the wind, luffed her up into it. The wind was so high that it forced the brace of the square sail out of the hand of the man who was attending it and instantly upset the canoe, which would have been turned bottom upward but for the resistance made by the awning. Such was the confusion on board, and the waves ran so high, that it was half a minute before she righted, and then nearly full of water; but by bailing her out she was kept from sinking until they rowed ashore. Besides the loss of the lives of the three men, who, not being able to swim, would probably have perished, we should have been deprived of nearly everything necessary for our purposes, at a distance of between 2,000 and 3,000 miles from any place where we could supply the deficiency!

"May 17.—We set out early and proceeded on very well. The banks being firm and the shore bold, we were unable to use the tow-line, which, whenever the bank would permit it, is the safest and most expeditious mode of ascending the river, except under a sail with a steady breeze. * * * The country in general is rugged, the hills high, with their sides and summits partially covered with pine and cedar, and their bases on both sides washed by the river. Like those already mentioned, the lower part of these hills is a rich dark loam, while the upper regions, for more than 150 feet, consist of a whitish brown sand so hard as in many places to resemble stone, though in fact very little stone or rock of any kind is to be seen on the hills. The bed of the Missouri is much narrower than usual, being not more than between 200 and 300 yards in width, with an uncommonly large proportion of gravel; but the sand-bars and low points covered with willows have almost entirely disappeared: the timber on the river consists of scarcely anything more than a few scattered cottonwood trees. The saline incrustations along the banks and the foot of the hills are more abundant than usual. The game is in great quantities, but the buffalo are not so numerous as they were some days ago. Two rattlesnakes were seen to-day, and one of them we killed; it resembled those of the Atlantic States, being about two feet six inches long, of a yellowish brown on the back and sides, variegated with a row of oval dark brown spots, lying transversely on the back from the neck to the tail and having two other rows of circular spots of the same color on the sides along the edge of the scuta: there are 176 scuta on the belly and seventeen on the tail.

" * * * Late at night we were roused by the sergeant of the guard, in consequence of fire having communicated to a tree overhanging our camp. The wind was so high that we had not removed the camp more than a few minutes when a large part of the tree fell, precisely on the spot it had occupied, and would have crushed us if we had not been alarmed in time.

"May 19.—The last night was disagreeably cold, and in the morning there was a very heavy fog, which obscured the river so much as to prevent our seeing the way. This is the first fog of any degree of density which we have experienced. There was also, last evening, a fall of dew, the second which we have observed since entering this extensive open country. About eight o'clock the fog dispersed, and we proceeded with the aid of the tow-line. The country resembles that of yesterday, high hills closely bordering the river. In the afternoon the river became crooked, and contained more sawyers or floating timber than we have seen in the same space since leaving the Platte. Our game consisted of deer, beaver and elk: we also killed a brown bear, which, although shot through the heart, ran at their usual pace nearly a quarter of a mile before he fell.

" * * * This stream, which we suppose to be that called by the Minnetarees the Musselshell river, empties into the Missouri 2,270 miles above the mouth of the latter river, and in latitude 47° 24' north. It is 110 yards wide, and contains more water than streams of that size usually do in this country.

"May 21.—The morning being very fine, we were able to employ the rope, and made twenty miles. In its course the Missouri makes a sudden and extensive bend toward the south, to receive the waters of the Musselshell. The neck of land thus formed, though itself high, is lower than the surrounding country, and makes a waving valley, extending for a great distance to the northward, with a fertile soil, which, though without wood, produces a fine turf of low grass, some herbs, and vast quantities of prickly pear. The country on the south is high, broken, and crowned with some pine and dwarf cedar; the leaf of this pine is longer than that of the common pitch or red pine of Virginia, the cone is longer and narrower, the imbrications wider and thicker, and the whole frequently covered with rosin."

And thus much for the climate, timber, soil, fish, fowl and wild beasts,—all things that interest and instruct, in truth, are here, which these bold first men of Montana beheld,—the baby State in embryo!

CHAPTER V.

Discovery and Description of the Great Falls—Remarkable Explosions—Silver!

IF the reader must regret to tear himself from the story of these first men in Montana, what must be the despair of the writer who must leave them and attempt his way alone? What with their daily encounters with ferocious wild beasts, the contemplation at night of stars as large as lilies in the cold blue north from some mountain top, their discovery of new and wondrous little flowers at their feet in fertile valleys, the abrupt mountains of snow that rose before as if to hold them at bay forever! And then that roaring continually in their ears far away and as if coming down and out from under the white and unknown world of snow! We will not attempt to write the description anent this discovery of the great falls of the Missouri, whatever the reader may say or care. For this work of theirs is not only a part of the history of Montana but of the world, and cannot be improved upon. Says the journal:

"June 13.—Having traveled seven miles after first hearing the sound, he reached the falls about twelve o'clock. The hills, as he approached, were difficult of access, and two hundred feet high: down these he hurried with impatience, and, seating himself on some rocks under the center of the falls, enjoyed the sublime spectacle of this stupendous object, which since the creation had been lavishing its magnificence upon the desert, unknown to civilization.

"The river, immediately at its cascade, is three hundred yards wide, and is pressed in by a perpendicular cliff on the left, which rises to about one hundred feet and extends up the stream for a mile. On the right the bluff is also perpendicular for three hundred yards above the falls. For ninety or a hundred feet from the left cliff the water falls in a smooth, even sheet over a precipice of at least eighty feet. The remaining part of the river precipitates itself with a more rapid current, and, being received as it falls by the irregular and somewhat projecting rocks below, forms a splendid spectacle of perfectly white foam, two hundred yards in length and eighty in perpendicular elevation. This spray is dissipated into a thousand shapes, sometimes flying up in columns of fifteen or twenty feet, which are then oppressed by larger masses of the white foam, on all of which the sun impresses the brightest colors of the rainbow. Below the fall the water beats with fury against a ledge of rocks, which extends across the river at one hundred and fifty yards from the precipice. From the perpendicular cliff on the north to the distance of one hundred and twenty yards, the rocks are only a few feet above the water, and when the river is high the stream finds a channel across them forty yards wide, and near the higher parts of the ledge, which rise about twenty feet, and terminate abruptly within eighty or ninety yards of the southern side. Between them and the perpendicular cliff on the south, the whole body of water runs with great swiftness. A few small cedars grow near this ridge of rocks, which serves as a barrier to defend a small plain of about three acres, shaded with cottonwood, at the lower extremity of which is a grove of the same trees, where are several Indian cabins of sticks, below which the river is divided by a large rock, several feet above the water, and extending down the stream for twenty yards. At the distance of three hundred yards from the same ridge is another abutment of solid, perpendicular rock, about sixty feet high, projecting at right angles from the small plain on the north for one hundred and thirty-four yards into the river. After leaving this the Missouri again spreads itself to its previous breadth of three hundred yards, though with more than its ordinary rapidity.

"The hunters who had been sent out now returned loaded with buffalo meat, and Captain Lewis encamped for the night under a tree near the falls. The men were again despatched to hunt for food against the arrival of the party, and Captain Lewis walked down the river to discover, if possible, some place where the canoes might be safely drawn on shore in order to be transported beyond the falls. He returned, however, without discovering any such spot, the river for three miles below being one continued succession of rapids and cascades, overhung with perpendicular bluffs from one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet high; in short, it seemed to have worn itself a channel through the solid rock. In the afternoon they caught in the falls some of both kinds of whitefish, and half a dozen trout, from sixteen to twenty-three inches long, precisely resembling in form, and in the position of their fins, the mountain or speckled trout of the United States, except that the specks of the former are of a deep black, while those of the latter are of a red or gold color: they have long, sharp teeth on the palate and tongue, and generally a small speck of red on each side behind the front ventral fins; the flesh is of a pale yellowish red, or, when in good order, of a rose-colored red.

"June 14.—This morning one of the men was sent to Captain Clarke with an account of the discovery of the falls; and, after employing the rest in preserving the meat which had been killed yesterday, Captain Lewis proceeded to examine the rapids above. From the falls he directed his course southwest up the river. After passing one continued rapid and three cascades, each three or four feet high, he reached, at the distance of five miles, a second fall. The river is here about 400 yards wide, and for the distance of 300 rushes down to the depth of nineteen feet, and so irregularly that he gave it the name of the Crooked Falls. From the southern shore it extends obliquely upward about 150 yards, and then forms an acute angle downward nearly to the commencement of the four small islands close to the northern side. From the perpendicular pitch to these islands the water glides down a sloping rock with a velocity almost equal to that of its fall. Above this fall the river bends suddenly to the northward. While viewing this place, Captain Lewis heard a loud roar above him, and, crossing the point of a hill a few hundred yards, he saw one of the most beautiful objects in nature: the whole Missouri is suddenly stopped by one shelving rock, which, without a single niche, and with an edge as straight and regular as if formed by art, stretches itself from one side of the river to the other for at least a quarter of a mile. Over this it precipitates itself in an even, uninterrupted sheet, to the perpendicular depth of fifty feet, whence, dashing against the rocky bottom, it rushes rapidly down, leaving behind it a sheet of the purest foam across the river. The scene which it presented was indeed singularly beautiful; since, without any of the wild, irregular sublimity of the lower falls, it combined all the regular elegancies which the fancy of a painter would select to form a beautiful waterfall. The eye had scarcely been regaled with this charming prospect, when, at the distance of half a mile, Captain Lewis observed another of a similar kind. To this he immediately hastened, and found a cascade stretching across the whole river for a quarter of a mile, with a descent of fourteen feet, though the perpendicular pitch was only six feet. This, too, HON. W. C. GILLETTE, who has been a resident of Montana ever since 1862, and is now one of the prominent ranchers of Lewis and Clarke county, is a native of Orleans county, New York, born March 10, 1832, of French Huguenot ancestry, who were among the early settlers of Connecticut.

His grandfather, Caleb Gillette, served as a soldier of the Revolution. His father, Orimel Gillette, was born in Connecticut, in 1802, and moved to New York, where he married Miss Julia Ferris, a native of the latter State. They settled in Onondaga county, where he was a successful practicing physician for many years, living to be eighty years of age. His wife died in her sixtieth year. They had two sons and three daughters. One of the sons, Orimel, was a soldier in the Union army, a member of the One Hundred and Seventeenth New York Infantry, and was killed at the battle of Fort Fisher. At present only two of the family survive, namely: Warren Caleb, the subject of this sketch, and Eliza P., who is now his housekeeper, both having remained unmarried to the present time.

Mr. Gillette, the eldest of the children, attended the public schools, and ultimately Oberlin College. In 1856 he went to Chicago, and clerked for four years in a wholesale hat store, owned and conducted by the firm of E. R. Kellogg & Company. Next he engaged in business on his own account in Galena, Illinois. In 1862 he became impressed with the idea of coming to Montana, as gold had been discovered here; and accordingly he left by the way of St. Louis in July, 1862, and came up the Missouri river; but when he and his companions arrived below the mouth of Milk river, they were obliged for the lack of navigable water to take to the land. After spending about a week in camp, they proceeded overland to Fort Benton. After traveling on the route from that place for two days, they were surrounded by a large party of Indians, who were divided among themselves what to do with the emigrants, some being in favor of making them return, and some for permitting them to go on. One of the chiefs finally succeeded in persuading the others to let the emigrants proceed. The latter, however, being in doubt what to do, held a meeting and decided to return to the camp on Milk river; and as soon as they turned their horses upon the back track the redskins objected, and compelled them to proceed to Fort Benton. At Fort Benton they remained a few days and then moved to a point in Prickly Pear cañon, where some emigrants from Minnesota, who had preceded them, were camped. At this camp they remained until their supplies, which were delayed down the Milk river, were forwarded by the steamboat company to Fort Benton. Upon the arrival of the supplies at Fort Benton they were freighted to Deer Lodge, and eventually the whole company of which Mr. Gillette was a member arrived safely at Bannack. Mr. Gillette had brought with him a little stock of miners' supplies, which he sold at Bannack, receiving gold dust in exchange.

In 1863, when gold was discovered in Alder Gulch, Mr. Gillette moved his stock of miners' supplies to Virginia City, and was in business there two years, in partnership in any other neighborhood, would have been an object of great magnificence; but, after what he had just seen, it became of secondary interest. His curiosity being, however, awakened, he determined to go on, even should night overtake him, to the head of the falls. He therefore pursued the southwest course of the river, which was one constant succession of rapids and small cascades, at every one of which the bluffs grew lower, or the bed of the river became more on a level with the plains. At the distance of two and a half miles he arrived at another cataract of twenty-six feet. The river is here 600 yards wide, but the descent is not immediately perpendicular, though the river falls generally in a regular and smooth sheet. For about one-third of the descent a rock protrudes to a small distance, receives the water in its passage, and gives it a curve.

"On the south side is a beautiful plain, a few feet above the level of the falls. On the north the country is more broken, and there is a hill not far from the river. Just below the falls is a little island in the middle of the river, well covered with timber. Here, on a cottonwood tree, an eagle had fixed her nest, and seemed the undisputed mistress of a spot to contest whose dominion neither man nor beast would venture across the gulfs that surround it, and which is farther secured by the mist rising from the falls. This solitary bird could not escape the observation of the Indians, who made the eagle's nest a part of their description of the falls, and which now proves to be correct in almost every particular, except that they did not do justice to their height. Just above this is a cascade of about five feet, beyond which, as far as could be discerned, the velocity of the

with James King. During this time they were engaged in packing goods from Fort Benton to Virginia City and Helena. This business of transportation was attended with great danger, both from the "road agents" and from the Indians. As early as 1862-'63 Mr. Gillette made various trips from Fort Benton and Bannack and return, crossing the Missouri river at or near where the city of Great Falls now stands. On one occasion the Snake Indians stole a number of his animals at what is now called Sun River, and he rode a distance of sixty miles in the night to Fort Benton to procure other horses. On his return to Bannack Mr. Gillette found that some of his horses had been recovered from the Indians by settlers who knew the animals. At another time, when wholly unarmed, he was met by two armed Indians on horseback, one of whom rode up and caught his watch-chain. Mr. Gillette caught the Indian by the wrist, and the latter then let go, backed his horse a step and brought his gun to bear upon Mr. Gillette. The latter, looking the Indian in the face, concluded that he meant business, and gave him the watch, and in this way got off with his life. After many such experiences he would sometimes conclude that he would not make such trips again; but in consideration of the profits obtainable in pursuing the business, he continued these trips until the spring of 1863.

In 1865 he and his partner, Mr. King, opened a toll road in the Prickly Pear cañon, a distance of ten miles. This was an expensive enterprise, as they had none of the machinery for doing such work as is at hand at the present day; but the task could not be delayed, on account of the necessities of the settlers and miners. These men undertook this job with two plows, which cost $175 each, and the rest of the work was done with pick and shovel. The work was finally completed, at a cost of $40,000; and in two years the tolls paid back the cost of the road, but after this the business was not so good. They continued to take toll until the charter expired, in 1875. This road proved of great value to the country, and a financial success to the men who had the energy and enterprise to carry out the improvement to a successful issue.

At length they retired from mercantile business at Helena and engaged in placer-mining at Confederate Gulch until 1877, doing a large and successful business. They employed a number of men and took out a great deal of gold, clearing up in one season $10,000.

Finally Mr. Gillette engaged in the sheep business, which he has followed for the past seventeen years. He has become the owner of 12,000 acres of ranch land, and has now 18,000 sheep, a grade of Merino, best adapted to north Montana. He has built a fine residence on his land near Craig in Lewis and Clarke county, where he and his sister now reside. Mr. Gillette has interested himself in the public affairs of the Territory and State ever since his arrival here. He is a Republican, and as such he has been elected twice to the Territorial Legislature, serving through both terms, and also to the Territorial Council, and to the Constitutional Convention which formed the present State Constitution of Montana. Attending strictly to his own business affairs and to the public duties devolved upon him, he is now enjoying a well-merited prosperity.

SCENE ON THE MISSOURI RIVER, MONTANA.

water seemed to abate. Captain Lewis now ascended the hill which was behind him, and saw from its top a delightful plain, extending from the river to the base of the Snowy mountains to the south and southwest. Along this wide, level country the Missouri pursued its winding course, filled with water to its smooth, grassy banks, while about four miles above it was joined by a large river flowing from the northwest, through a valley three miles in width, and distinguished by the timber which adorned its shores. The Missouri itself stretches to the south, in one unruffled stream of water, as if unconscious of the roughness it must soon encounter, and bearing on its bosom vast flocks of geese, while numerous herds of buffalo are feeding on the plains which surround it."

Once more we must quote from the journal of July 4, for it seems so startlingly near the discovery of silver in Montana that you can but pause and wonder; for surely from what the French mountaineer says there must have been some old tradition about the existence of silver mines in Montana even before the coming of Lewis and Clarke.

"* * * July 4.—The boat was now completed, except what is, in fact, the most difficult part, the making her seams secure. We had intended to despatch a canoe with part of our men to the United States early this spring; but, not yet having seen the Snake Indians, and not knowing whether to calculate on their friendship or enmity, we have decided not to weaken our party, which is now scarcely sufficient to repel any hostility. We were afraid, too, that such a measure might dishearten those who remained; and, as we have never suggested it to them, they are all enthusiastically attached to the enterprise, and willing to encounter any danger to ensure its success.

"We had a heavy dew this morning.

"Since our arrival at the falls we have repeatedly heard a strange noise coming from the mountains in a direction a little to the north of west. It is heard at different periods of the day and night (sometimes when the air is perfectly still and without a cloud), and consists of one stroke only, or of five or six discharges in quick succession. It is loud, and resembles precisely the sound of a six-pound piece of ordnance at the distance of three miles. The Minnetarees frequently mentioned this noise, like thunder, which they said the mountains made; but we paid no attention to it, believing it to have been some superstition, or perhaps a falsehood. The watermen also of the party say that the Pawnees and Ricaras give the same account of a noise heard in the Black mountains to the westward of them. The solution of the mystery given by the philosophy of the watermen is, that it is occasioned by the bursting of the rich mines of silver confined within the bosom of the mountains."

> " . . . . . as when Cortez and his men > Stood silent on a peak in Darien."

August 12 they had reached the hidden sources of that river, which had never before been seen by civilized man; and as they quenched their thirst at the chaste and icy fountain—as they sat down by the brink of that little rivulet, which yielded its distant and modest tribute to the parent ocean—they felt themselves rewarded for all their labors and all their difficulties. They left reluctantly this interesting spot, and, pursuing the Indian road through the interval of the hills, arrived at the top of a ridge, from which they saw high mountains, partially covered with snow, still to the west. The ridge on which they stood formed the dividing line between the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. They followed a descent much steeper than that on the eastern side, and at the distance of three-quarters of a mile reached a handsome, bold creek of cold, clear water, running to the westward. They stopped to taste, for the first time, the waters of the Columbia; and, after a few minutes, followed the road across steep hills and low hollows, when they came to a spring on the side of a mountain. Here they found a sufficient quantity of dry willow-brush for fuel, and therefore halted for the night; and, having killed nothing in the course of the day, supped on their last piece of pork, and trusted to fortune for some other food to mix with a little flour and parched meal, which was all that now remained of their provisions.

At last, after incredible toil and privation, the advance of the party met with friendly Shoshonee Indians and began progressing toward the great sea. Here is an account of a repast with the mountain sovereigns of Montana:

"August 15.—Captain Lewis rose early, and, having eaten nothing yesterday except his scanty meal of flour and berries, felt sore inconvenience from hunger. On inquiry he found that his whole stock of provisions consisted of but two pounds of flour! This he ordered to be divided into two equal parts, and one-half of it to be boiled with the berries into a sort of pudding. After presenting a large share to the chief, he and his three men breakfasted on the remainder. Cameahwait was delighted with this new dish. He took a little of the flour in his hand, tasted and examined it very narrowly, and asked if it was made of roots. Captain Lewis explained the process of preparing it, and he said it was the best thing he had eaten for a long time."

Passing on down and out of Montana to the root-diggers and fish-eating Indians that camped in dismal and dirty bands along the banks of the Snake and Columbia rivers, they encountered only hunger and incredible hardships.

Let modern men who fancy they have to endure hardships read of their regular diet, when they dined at all, on Indian dog from day to day; dogs purchased of the withered Indians, often with a man's last coat,—and such dogs!

"September 13," says the journal, "our whole stock of animal food was now exhausted, and we therefore killed a colt, on which we made a hearty supper."

"September 19.—Captain Clarke * * * found a horse, on which he breakfasted, and hung the rest on a tree for the party in the rear."

"October 2. * * Were obliged to kill one of the horses."

"October 10. * * * We made an experiment to vary our food by purchasing a few dogs." But not a murmur! Nearly half a year distant still from the ocean, and knowing they must return this same way, if they returned at all, there was no thought of retracing their steps to the mountains and prairies of Montana which they had so recently left teeming with game. They kept right on. Fish, dogs, horses, roots, dogs, fish! sometimes days and nights with nothing at all to eat!

And that is the story of nearly half a year among these withered fish and root eaters till they again went through the same terrible scenes and got back to the mountains of Montana. Here they divided and so descended both the Yellowstone and Missoula rivers, thus exploring not only the Columbia from the source to the sea, but the three great rivers of Montana to the east, from one end to the other. There is nothing so glorious and unselfish to be seen in all history.

And thus much for the observations of these daring sentinels on the extreme outposts in the service of our country, on the climate, soil, scenery and savages of Montana. In bidding these brave men a final farewell we can but turn and smile at any attempts to dignify these miserable camps of Montana Indians west of the Rocky mountains. They were mainly homeless, tentless, tribeless nomads, at best only a degree above the brutes till partly civilized. Their dogs were domesticated wolves or coyotes. Their horses, which they doubtless stole and had continued to steal from the Spanish missions far away to the south for a century or so before the coming of these first white men among them, were perhaps the first factors in what little civilization they finally attained; for the lowest savage, once mounted on a Nez Perce horse,* can but feel some sort of exaltation and idea of advancement.

We fall to wondering what could have made the difference between these Indians of the Columbia and those of the Missouri. The soil is certainly equally fertile and the climate equally favorable; if advantage is anywhere it is with the former. Perhaps the difference grew from the difference in diet,—the one subsisting on fish, taken without effort, the other on flesh and taken not without great exertion and often great peril.

*The hardy little Nez Perce horse, sometimes pied or "calico" in color, sometimes blue, and sometimes as black as coal, and always beautiful, is quite well known in a way; but few people, I fancy, know what remarkable courage and sagacity he has. In 1862 and 1863 I was engaged in carrying gold dust out of the Idaho mountains. One day when descending a steep trail on a densely wooded mountain side I found the trail blocked by a tree that seemed to have been suddenly blown down by the wind, and a newly opened trail leading off to the left. My Nez Perce pony stopped, threw back his ears and almost sat down on his haunches as I mercilessly drove my spurs into his flanks. We were often cruel in those hard, swift rides, for time was precious and peril waited on every moment spent between stations. We always dashed on a hard gallop, the load of gold dust in the "catenas" hanging down on either side of the saddle bow, the reins in the right hand and a cocked pistol in the left. I spurred until the great Spanish spurs were streaming with blood from the pony's flanks, but still he would not budge an inch in the newly cleared trail. At last, gathering up all his strength, he poised in the air and then plunged headlong on down the hill over the fallen tree. In the leap my pistol was shaken from my hand, and while I was drawing another from my "catenas" there came a rain of lead from the company of robbers lying in ambush. But the poor pony kept me in my seat, faced about for a second, as if to give me a chance to defend myself, and then plunged on down the mountain two miles to the ferry. There on the edge of the river he fell dead from a bullet wound that must have meant death from the first, for his nostrils were streaming with blood all the way down the mountain.

When the Indian war swept the Nez Perce country the Indians gathered about 5,000 horses into a valley that fronted on the steep bluffs of the Columbia river, and there, with the great white mountains at their back, prepared to make their last desperate stand. In the battle that followed they were defeated and the small fraction of them that remained unkilled put to flight. The horses, shut in by the steep mountains on one side and the steep river bluffs on the other, had to be left behind.

When the battle had closed the soldiers or the volunteers (for only a part were regulars) made a rush for the horses. But they could not lay hands on one of them or approach them. Their splendid heads, with great manes, tossed and tumbled, were in the air, and they went round and round in a circle in the pretty pent-in little valley and along the sheer edge of the bluff of the river.

And now for the first time it was noticed that they were under a boy herder. The boy was unarmed, entirely naked, and as red as copper. He rode a black stallion with a neck like a bull's, and literally mantled and clothed with mane. The boy had no bridle, but wove his hands into the mane, and thus guided the horse at will, at the head of the herd. Sometimes he laid his face down on the proud neck, and buried it in the mass of hair, which matched his own in its glossy blackness. Hundreds of men tried to stop or stay the herd in its wild flight, but tried in vain. The green grass disappeared beneath the strokes of spurning feet and dust began to rise in clouds.

The volunteers dropped on their knees here and there around the edge of the circle and began to fire at the boy. They were deadly marksmen and they had no care to spare either horse or rider. But the boy did not seem to want to be spared any more than did the horse. At last a bullet struck him in the face. His body flew high into the air, then fell and rolled in the dust.

The horses now divided as they came by. Their nostrils were distended at the smell of blood, and their eyes ablaze at the sight of their young keeper in the dust. It seemed as if they truly knew and understood all the fearful tragedy of that day and hour. On the second round after the boy fell the black leader seemed to run sidewise, his eyes fastened to his little dead master until they looked frightful from under the black mane. He plunged on around and came to the very edge of the beetling basalt bluff. Then there was the sight as of a sculptured image of a horse poised in midair; and a mad, wild cry, such as a horse makes but once, a cry indescribable, that filled the valley. Men looked away, and when they looked back the black statue was gone. Then, faithful to the leader, over the bluff into the foaming, white river went another horse; and then ten, twenty, fifty, five hundred, the whole five thousand! Not one of all the herd was left to the invading victors, and the stream was literally choked with the dead.

CHAPTER VI.

DIPLOMACY—BATTLES ON PAPER—ROBERT E. LEE—JEFFERSON DAVIS—THOMAS H. BENTON AND JOHN C. FREMONT.

WE NOW approach a period of bush-whacking warfare for Montana,—diplomacy, war on paper, plans of prime ministers and sly moves on the broad chess-board of nations at cabinet meetings, while the line between England and the United States was still plastic and not exactly established.

"Shall I tell you, my lords, how to maintain the integrity of England through all time? My lords, we must get land. My lords, we must get land! get land! get land, and never let go one single handful of sand!"

This little speech, under the great bell tower on the banks of the Thames, tells the entire and one controlling policy of England first, last, and all the time, more pointedly than can pages of my own.

Benton was fresh from the late war with England. Jackson, Jefferson, all the great men of the young giant Republic were his personal friends. Had he lacked knowledge of England's persistent policy of forever getting and getting and never letting go, these, his elders, would have told him. But it is pretty clear from his conduct that he had kept his face lifted toward Montana ever since she parted company with his adopted State and ceased to be a portion of Missouri.

We find Robert E. Lee early at St. Louis, the headquarters of our army operations, while yet young in the service. His work was none other than that of watching and confronting the British lion in the great Northwest. But the United States seemed never to have England's lust for land. Indeed, so far from desiring to "get land, and get land, and get land," she was oftentimes quite willing to let go her hold when it could be done with honor.

Of course such vacillation and conservative action encouraged England. She kept crowding down and claiming land all along the line from the heart of Montana to the mouth of the Oregon; and all the time the young Hercules, Montana, lay sleeping on in the cradle while this great serpent was gliding down from the north: the lesser one, Spain, had years before come up from the south, to strangle the infant.

Jefferson Davis and John C. Fremont were now of those sent to watch the aggressive neighbor to the north, the one from the south having long since given place to France, and France, as said before, having sold all her vast possessions to the United States through Napoleon.

But the Saxon, held at bay, was not to be shaken off so easily as were the Latins. The story of England's claims to Oregon and all the tributaries of the Oregon river, which included everything even down to the domains of Spain, is a story of shrewd diplomacy and one of dogged persistence and effrontery.

The Athenæum, London, March, 1844, tauntingly said: "Lieutenant Fremont has been appointed to the survey of the Oregon Territory. We are heartily glad of it. He will be sure to do his work well, and if our topographical engineers labor in the same style and spirit we may reckon on obtaining, through their joint efforts, an accurate knowledge of that country, so that we may be able to calculate, on safe ground, the exact amount of blood and treasure which may be prudently expended in the conquest of it."

But we must not anticipate. This man, Fremont, had been in the field some years before this date, and, as indicated by the paragraph from the Athenæum, a publication which was looked upon as a sort of governmental gazette, had already won a name not only as an explorer but also as a reliable man who was "sure to do his work well."

Let us turn back to his first expedition up the Missouri and read in his own words of Montana as he found her more than fifty years ago.

"We left St. Louis early in April, 1839, on board the Antelope, one of the American Fur Company's steamboats, which, taking its customary advantage of the annual rise in the Missouri from the snows of the Rocky mountains, was about starting on its regular voyage to the trading-posts on the upper waters of the river.

"For nearly two months and a half we were struggling against the current of the turbid river, which in that season of high waters was so swift and strong that sometimes the boat would for moments stand quite still, seeming to pause to gather strength, until the power of steam asserted itself and she would fight her way into a smooth reach. In places the river was so embarrassed with snags that it was difficult to thread a way among them in face of the swift current and treacherous channel, constantly changing. Under these obstacles we usually laid up at night, making fast to the shore at some convenient place, where the crew could cut a supply of wood for the next day. It was a pleasant journey, as little disturbed as on the ocean. Once above the settlements of the lower Missouri, there were no sounds to disturb the stillness but the echoes of the high-pressure steam-pipe, which traveled far along and around the shores, and the incessant crumbling away of the banks and bars, which the river was steadily undermining and destroying at one place to build up at another. The stillness was an impressive feature, and the constant change in the character of the river shores offered always new interest as we steamed along. At times we traveled by high perpendicular escarpments of light-colored rock, a gray and yellow marl, made picturesque by shrubbery or trees; at others the river opened out into a broad delta-like expanse, as if it were approaching the sea. At length, on the seventieth day, we reached Fort Pierre, the chief post of the American Fur Company. This is on the right or western bank of the river, about one thousand and three hundred miles from St. Louis. On the prairie, a few miles away, was a large village of Yankton Sioux. Here we were in the heart of the Indian country and near the great buffalo ranges. Here the Indians were sovereign.*

"A herd of buffalo had been discovered, coming down to water. In a few moments the buffalo horses were saddled and the hunters mounted, each with a smooth-bore single or double-barreled gun, a handkerchief bound fillet-like around the head, and all in the scantiest clothing. Conspicuous among them were Dixon and Louison. To this latter I then, and thereafter, attached myself.

"My horse was a good one, an American, but grass-fed and prairie-bred. Whether he had

* "But Montana had not been left idle and empty through all the years that lay between the going of Lewis and Clarke and the coming of Fremont. The following readable and perfectly reliable sketch by Dr. James Stuart, one of the discoverers of gold in Montana, shows that forts had been built and soil broken by the plowshares at least a decade before Fremont's time. He says:

"Ft. Union was the first fort built on the Missouri river, above the mouth of the Yellowstone. In the summer of 1829, Kenneth McKenzie, a trader from the Upper Mississippi, near where St. Paul, Minnesota, is now located, with a party of fifty men, came across to the Upper Missouri river looking for a good place to establish a trading-post for the American Fur Company. (McKenzie was a member of said company.) They selected a site a short distance above the mouth of the Yellowstone river, on the north bank of the Missouri, and built a stockade, two hundred feet square, of logs about twelve inches in diameter and twelve feet long, set perpendicularly, putting the lower end two feet in the ground, with two block-house bastions on diagonal corners of the stockade, twelve feet square, and twenty high, pierced with loop-holes. The dwelling-houses, warehouses, and store were built inside, but not joining the stockade, leaving a space of about four feet between the walls of the buildings and the stockade. All the buildings were covered with earth, as a protection against fire by incendiary Indians. There was only one entrance to the stockade—a large double-leaved gate, about twelve feet from post to post; with a small gate, three and a half by five feet, in one of the leaves of the main gate, which was the one mostly used, the large gate being only opened occasionally when there were no Indians in the vicinity of the fort. The houses, warehouses, and store were all built about the same height as the stockade. The above description, with the exception of the area inclosed by the stockade, will describe nearly all the forts built by traders on the Missouri river, from St. Louis to the head-waters. They are easily built, convenient, and good for defense. The fort was built to trade with the Assiniboins, who were a large tribe of Indians ranging from White Earth river, on the north side of the Missouri, to the mouth of Milk river, and north into the British Possessions. They were a peaceable, inoffensive people, armed with bows and arrows, living in lodges made of buffalo skins, and roving from place to place, according to the seasons of the year, occupying certain portions of their country in the summer, and during the winter remaining where they could be protected from the cold with plenty of wood. For fear of trouble with them the traders did not sell them guns; but when an Indian proved to be a good hunter and a good friend to the traders by his actions and talk, he could occasionally borrow a gun and a few loads of ammunition to make a hunt. The principal articles of trade were alcohol, blankets, blue and scarlet cloth, sheeting (domestics), ticking, tobacco, knives, fire-steels, arrow-points, files, brass wire (different sizes), beads, brass tacks, leather belts (from four to ten inches wide), silver ornaments for hair, shells, axes, hatchets, etc.—alcohol being the principal article of trade, until after the passing of an act of Congress (June 30, 1834) prohibiting it under severe penalties. Prior to that time, there were no restrictions on the traffic. But notwithstanding the traders were often made to suffer the penalty of the law, they continued to smuggle large quantities of spirits into the Indian country, until within the last few years (i. e., 1873). St. Louis was the point from which the traders brought their goods. They would start from there with Mackinaw boats, fifty feet long, ten feet wide on the bottom and twelve feet on top, and four feet high, loaded with about fourteen tons of merchandise to each boat, and a crew of about twelve men, as soon as the ice went out of the river, usually about the 1st of March, and would be six months in getting to Ft. Union, the boat having to be towed the greater part of the way by putting a line ashore, and the men walking along the bank pulling the boat. Every spring, as soon as the ice went out of the river, boats would start from the fort of St. Louis, each boat loaded with three thousand robes, or its equivalent in other peltries, with a crew of five men to each boat, arriving at St. Louis in about thirty days. All the employes in the Indian country lived entirely on meat—the outfit of provisions for from fifty to seventy-five men being two barrels of flour, one sack coffee, one barrel sugar, one barrel salt, and a little soda and pepper. After the fort was established, and proved to be a permanent trading point, large quantities of potatoes, beets, onions, turnips, squashes, corn, etc., were raised, sufficient for each year's consumption. The wages for common laborers were two hundred and twenty dollars for the round trip from St. Louis to Ft. Union, and back again to St. Louis, taking from fifteen to sixteen months' time to make it. Carpenters and blacksmiths were paid three hundred dollars per annum. The traders (being their own interpreters) gained his experience among the whites or Indians I do not know, but he was a good hunter and knew about buffalo, and badger holes as well, and when he did get his foot into one it was not his fault.

"Now I was to see the buffalo. This was an event on which my imagination had been dwelling. I was about to realize the tales the mere telling of which was enough to warm the taciturn Renville into enthusiastic expression, and to rouse all the hunter in the excitable Froniére.

The prairie over which we rode was rolling, and we were able to keep well to leeward and out of sight of the herd. Riding silently up a short slope, we came directly upon them. Not a hundred yards below us was the great, com-were paid five hundred dollars per annum. The store and warehouse, or two stores, were built on each side of the gate, and on the side next to the interior of the fort the two buildings were connected by a gate similar to the main gate, the space between the buildings and stockade filled in with pickets, making a large, strong-room, without any roof or covering overhead. In each store, or stores, about five feet from the ground, was a hole eighteen inches square, with a strong shutter-fastening inside of the store, opening into the space or room between the gates. When the Indians wanted to trade, the inner gate was closed; a man would stand at the outer gate until all the Indians that wanted to trade, or as many as the space between the gate would contain, had passed in; then he would lock the outer gate, and go through the trading hole into the store. The Indians would then pass whatever articles each one had to trade through the hole to the trader, and he would throw out of the hole whatever the Indian wanted, to the value in trade of the article received. When the party were done trading, they were turned out and another party admitted. In that way of trading, the Indians were entirely at the mercy of the traders, for they were penned up in a room, and could all be killed through loop-holes in the stores without any danger to the traders. The articles brought by the Indians for trade were buffalo-robes, elk, deer, antelope, bear, wolf, beaver, otter, fox, mink, martin, wild-cat, skunk, and badger skins. The country was literally covered with buffalo, and the Indians killed them by making "surrounds." The Indians moved and camped with from one to four hundred lodges together—averaging about seven souls to the lodge; and when they needed meat the chief gave orders to make a "surround," when the whole camp, men, women, and the largest of the children, on foot and on horseback, would go under direction of the soldiers, and form a circle around as many buffalo as they wanted to kill—from three hundred to one thousand buffalo. They would then all start slowly for a common point, and as soon as the circle commenced to grow smaller, the slaughter would begin, and in a short time all inside the circle would be killed. The buffalo do not, as a general rule, undertake to break through unless the circle is very small but run round and round the circumference next to the Indians until they are all killed.

"Ft. Union burned down in 1831, and was rebuilt by McKenzie in the same year. The new fort was two hundred and fifty feet square, with stone foundation, with similar buildings, but put up in more woman-like manner, inside of the stockade. The fort stood until 1868, when it was pulled down by order of the commanding officer at Ft. Buford, five miles below Union.

"Robert Campbell and Sublette built a trading-post where Ft. Buford now stands, in 1833. They also, the same year, built a trading-post at Frenchman's Point, sixty miles above Union, the next year (1834). They sold out to the American Fur Company, who destroyed both posts the same year. Campbell went to St. Louis and went into business on Main street. Sublette went to the Green river country in command of a party of trappers.

"In 1832, the first steamboat, named the Yellowstone, arrived at Ft. Union. From that time, every spring, the goods were brought up by steamboats, but the robes, peltries, etc., were shipped from the fort every spring by Mackinaws to St. Louis.

"In the winter of 1830, McKenzie, desirous of establishing a trade with the Blackfeet and Gros Ventrees,* sent a party of four men—Burger, Dacoteau, Morceau, and one other man—in search of the Indians, and to see if there was sufficient inducement to establish a trading-post. The party started up the Missouri river with dog-sleds, to haul a few presents for the Indians—bedding, amunition, moccasins, etc. They followed the Missouri to the mouth of the Marias river, thence up the Marias to the mouth of Badger creek, without seeing an Indian, finding plenty of game of all kinds, and plenty of beaver in all the streams running into the Missouri. Every night when they camped they hoisted the American flag, so that if they were seen by any Indians during the night they would know it was a white man's camp; and it was very fortunate for them that they had a flag to use in that manner, for the night they camped at the mouth of Badger creek they were discovered by a war party of Black-feet, who surrounded them during the night, and as they were about firing on the camp, they saw the flag and did not fire, but took the party prisoners. A part of the Indians wanted to kill the whites and take what they had, but through the exertions and influence of a chief named Good-Woman, they were not molested in person or property, but went in safety to the Blackfoot camp on Belly river, and stayed with the camp until spring. During the winter they explained their business, and prevailed upon about one hundred Blackfeet to go with them to Union to see McKenzie. They arrived at Union about pact mass of animals, moving slowly along, feeding as they went, and making the loud incessant grunting noise peculiar to them. There they were.

"The moment's pause that we made on the summit of the slope was enough to put the herd in motion. Instantly as we rose the hill, they saw us. There was a sudden halt, a confused wavering movement, and then a headlong rout; the hunters in their midst. How I got down that short hillside I never knew. From the moment I saw the herd I never saw the ground again until all was over. I remember, as the charge was made, seeing the bulls in the rear turn, then take a few bounds forward, and then, turning for a last look, join the headlong flight.

the 1st of April, 1831, and McKenzie got their consent to build a trading-post at the mouth of the Marias. The Indians stayed about one month, then started home to tell the news to their people. McKenzie then started Kipp,* with seventy-five men and an outfit of Indian goods, to build a fort at the mouth of the Marias river, and he had the fort completed before the winter of 1831. It was only a temporary arrangement to winter in, in order to find out whether it would pay to establish a permanent post. Next spring, Col. Mitchell (afterward colonel in Doniphan's expedition to Mexico) built some cabins on Brule bottom, to live in until a good fort could be built. The houses at the mouth of the Marias were burned after the company moved to Brule bottom. Alex. Culbertson was sent by McKenzie to relieve Mitchell, and to build a pocket-stockade fort two hundred feet square on the north bank of the Missouri river, which he completed during the fall of 1832. This fort was occupied for eleven years, until Ft. Lewis was built by Culbertson on the south side of the Missouri river, near Pablois' Island, in the summer of 1844. Ft. Brule was then abandoned and burned. In 1846 Ft. Lewis was abandoned, and Ft. Benton was built by Culbertson, about seven miles below Ft. Lewis, and on the north bank of the Missouri river. It was two hundred and fifty feet square, built of adobes laid upon the ground without any foundation of stone, and is now standing (1875), occupied as a military post. The dwellings, warehouses, stores, etc., were all built of adobes. The Piegans, Blackfeet and Blood Indians, all talking the same language, claimed and occupied the country from the Missouri river to the Saskatchawan river. Prior to the building of the winter-quarters at the mouth of the Marias, they had always traded with the Hudson Bay Company at the Prairie Fort or Summerset House, both on the Saskatchawan. There was a bitter rivalry between the Hudson Bay Company and the American Fur Company. The Hudson Bay Company often sent men to induce the confederated Blackfeet to go north and trade, and the Indians said they were offered large rewards to kill all the traders on the Missouri river, and destroy the trading-posts. McKenzie wrote to Gov. Bird, the head man of the Hudson Bay Company in the north, in regard to the matter, and Bird wrote back to McKenzie, saying: "When you know the Blackfeet as well as I do, you will know that they do not need any inducements to commit depredations."

*James Kipp (J. H. B.).

"At the time the Blackfeet commenced to trade on the Missouri, they did not have any robes to trade: they only saved what they wanted for their own use. The Hudson Bay Company only wanted furs of different kinds. The first season the Americans did not get any robes, but traded for a large quantity of beaver, otter, marten, etc. They told the Indians they wanted robes, and from that time the Indians made them their principal article of trade. The company did not trade provisions of any kind to the Indians, but when an Indian made a good trade, he would get a spoonful of sugar, which he would put in his medicine-bag to use in sickness, when all other remedies failed.

"In 1842, F. A. Chardon, who was in charge of Ft. Brule, massacred about thirty Blackfeet Indians. The Indians had stolen a few horses and some little things out of the fort from time to time, and Chardon concluded to punish them for it. He waited until a trading party came in, and when they were assembled in front of the gate, he opened the gate and fired upon them with a small cannon loaded with trade balls. After firing the cannon, the men went out and killed all the wounded with knives. The Blackfeet stopped trading, and moved into the British Possessions, and made war on the post, and were so troublesome that Chardon abandoned Brule in the spring, went to the mouth of the Judith, and built Ft. F. A. Chardon on the north bank of the Missouri river, a short distance above the mouth of Judith river, which was burnt up when Culbertson built Ft. Lewis and made peace with the Blackfeet.

"In 1832, McKenzie sent Tullock, with forty men, to build a fort at the mouth of the Big Horn river. Tullock built the fort named Van Buren, on the south side of the Yellowstone, about three miles below the mouth of the Big Horn river. It was one hundred and fifty feet square, picket stockade, with two bastions on diagonal corners. In 1863, I saw the location. The pickets showed plainly; they had been burned to the ground, and several of the chimneys were not entirely fallen down. The fort was built to trade with the Mountain Crows, an insolent treacherous tribe of Indians. They wanted the location of their trading-post changed nearly every year, consequently they had four trading-posts built from 1832 to 1850, viz; Ft. Cass, built by Tullock, on the Yellowstone, below Van Buren, in 1836; Ft. Alexander, built by Lawender, still lower down on the Yellowstone river, in 1848; and Ft. Sarpey, built by Alexander Culbertson, in 1850, at the

"As they broke into the herd the hunters separated. For some instants I saw them as they showed through the clouds of dust, but I scarcely noticed them. I was finding out what it was to be a prairie hunter. We were only some few miles from the river, hardly clear of the breaks of the hills, and in places the ground still rough. But the only things visible to me in our flying course were the buffalo and the dust, and there was tumult in my breast as well as around me. I made repeated ineffectual attempts to steady myself for a shot at a cow after a hard struggle to get up with her, and each time barely escaped a fall. In such work a man must be able to forget his horse, but my horsemanship was not yet equal to such a proof. At the outset, when the hunters had searched over the herd and singled out each his fattest cow, and made his dash upon her, the herd broke into bands which spread over the plain. I clung to that where I found myself, unwilling to give up, until I found that neither horse nor man could bear the strain longer. Our furious speed had carried us far out over the prairies. Only some straggling groups were in sight, loping slowly off, seemingly conscious that the chase was over."—"Memoirs of my life," by John Charles Fremont: page 45.

True, this expedition was not directly under the command of Fremont, but he seems to have been the soul of it. Nor can it be asserted that he literally set foot on what is now Montana soil in this or any subsequent expedition. But it was Montana atmosphere he breathed, so to speak, and this was Montana work he was upon.

The only histories that we read are the histories that are readable, but exactness must take precedence of interest. To utter history not absolutely exact is as base as to utter debased coin; and yet to halt at a State line and leave out the great men who have not been bodily with us would make dull work. We must have reasons as well as results. Benton, of Missouri, as before stated, and Houston, of Texas, had served together in our last great battles with England, and were alert to her designs. But there were men of older States in the Senate who neither dreaded nor suspected England's persistent ambition to clutch and hold fast all beyond the Rocky mountains down to the lines of Spain, but, on the contrary, stood up in the Senate ready to concede anything, anxious to conciliate, fearing only to offend England.

And so we find Fremont, with all his courage and audacity of enterprise, leaning heavily on Benton for support, and Benton, leaning on Houston and all such as he could rally around him in the Senate in support of those vast interests which Jefferson had bequeathed to his country when Harrison fell from the front and Tyler stood timidly at the nation's head of affairs.

mouth of the Rose Bud. Ft. Sarpey was abandoned in 1853, and there have not been any trading forts built on the Yellowstone since, up to the present time (1875). Kenneth McKenzie, after Lewis and Clarke, was the pioneer of the upper Missouri. He was a native of the highlands of Scotland. When young, he came in service of the Hudson Bay Company to Hudson's Bay. In 1820 he quit the Hudson Bay Company and started to explore the country from Hudson's Bay to Red river and Lake Winnipeg; thence to the Lake Superior country; finally concluded to locate on the upper Mississippi. In 1822, he went to New York, and got an outfit of Indian trade goods on credit, and established a trading-post on the upper Mississippi, and remained in that part of the country until 1829, when he came to the Missouri and established Ft. Union. He was in charge of all the Northwestern fur trade till 1839, when he resigned—Alexander Culbertson taking his place—and went to St. Louis, where he went into the wholesale liquor trade, and lived there until he died, in 1856 or 1857. He was a man of great courage, energy, good judgment, and great executive ability."—DR. JAMES STUART, in Vol I., Historical Society of Montana.

Let us turn and bide a brief moment with one who may truly be called the father of Montana and all of her sisters of the vast Northwest.

Consider Thomas Jefferson, on an Indian pony, making his way across Montana from the head-waters of the Oregon, to those of the Missouri, for this the author of the Declaration of Independence not only long contemplated but actually undertook, at least by proxy, and proceeded on his way around the world as far as Siberia, when his further progress was arrested by Russia.

This is what Mrs. Jessie Benton Fremont says on this subject, than whom no one was ever better informed in State secrets; for she stood very close to her eminent father, who was the bosom friend of the great statesman, and knew all the lofty aspirations for the glory of the Republic of the one and of the other. Says Mrs. Fremont, in her Biographical Sketch of Senator Benton, page 15:

"Mr. Jefferson's intention to secure for his country the Asiatic trade by an overland route across our continent so directly governed the three lives written of in this book that I give here to this point some detail, though nothing befitting his foresight and perseverance.

"Before the American captain, Captain Gray, of Boston, had actually found the mouth of the Columbia, in 1790, Jefferson, then our Minister

THOMAS GALE MERRILL, one of Montana's pioneers of 1863, and one of her prominent citizens and miners, was born in Michigan, at Comstock, near Kalamazoo, June 9, 1839. He comes of English ancestry, his forefathers having settled in New England early in the Colonial period.

His father, Thomas W. Merrill, was born in Sedgewick, Maine, in 1803, removed to Michigan when a young man, and there, at St. Clair, in 1833, was married to Miss Sarah A. Oakes, a native of Vermont and a daughter of Judge David Oakes, of Bennington, Vermont. Thomas W. Merrill was a prominent Baptist minister and was actively identified with the early educational affairs of Michigan. To him belongs the distinction of having started the first school of languages at Ann Arbor, out of which has since grown the State University of Michigan. Later in life he removed to Kalamazoo county, was one of the founders of the Baptist College at Kalamazoo, was the first teacher in this institution, previous to its incorporation, and continued as one of its trustees up to the time of his death, which occurred in 1876. During his long and useful career he organized numerous Baptist churches in various parts of Michigan. All through the troublesome days of the great Civil war he took a deep interest in the oppressed and on the side of the Union, and did effective work in moulding public sentiment in the North. His wife died November 8, 1845. They had a family of six children, four sons and two daughters, of whom three are now living, the subject of this sketch being the youngest of the six.

Thomas G. Merrill was educated in the college at Kalamazoo, where he completed a classical course in 1860. He had just finished his education, and, when the war came on, in response to the President's first call for troops, he entered the army and served in the Third Minnesota Volunteers, in Tennessee.

After coming out of the army Mr. Merrill taught school in Minnesota, and subsequently had charge of the seminary at Taylor's Falls, Minnesota. From there he came to Montana and located the first ranch in the Prickly Pear valley. This was a part of what is now the Child's ranch in East Helena. He obtained the charter for Montana City in 1864, and before Helena was started this was a thriving and prosperous town. For some time Mr. Merrill was engaged in placer mining on the Prickly Pear, and took out considerable gold. To him belongs the credit of having organized the Monarch Gold & Silver Mining Company, one of the first quartz-mining companies that were organized in the Territory. They built the mill on Clark creek, six miles southeast of Helena. Out of that company grew the Heckla Consolidated Mining Company, of Gleudale.

Mr. Merrill returned East in 1869. For some time he was engaged in mercantile pursuits at St. Paul, Minnesota, and from there went to Lansing, Michigan, and established the Lansing Chair Factory, which he with others operated about one year, during this time also being largely engaged in real-estate transactions, and continuing the latter occupation until 1880. That year he went to St. Paul, and in 1882 organized the Merrill Discovery Company, its object being to locate mines in Montana, and at once returned to Montana. The company soon obtained fifty-four mining properties and made a dividend of them among its stockholders. In 1887 Mr. Merrill learned that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company had selected and certified for patents to 2,000,000 acres of the best mineral land in Montana. He at once set himself to work to frustrate their designs and organized a movement to prevent their securing these valuable tracts. For five years he strongly opposed the railroad company, and their case was decided in 1894 in the Supreme Court of the United States in favor of the people.

Thomas G. Merrill

to France, met in Paris the English traveler, Ledyard, who was about to explore the Nile. Mr. Jefferson turned him from this to what both felt to be a fresher and more useful field of discovery. I have listened to such talks; and can fancy the fascination to the born explorer in listening to Jefferson's theory that the snow-clad Rocky mountains which shed their waters to the east in such a mighty stream as the Missouri, must have a corresponding water-shed and great river to the west. No explorer had trod its banks, no navigator found its mouth; but where Jefferson thought such a river should be, is the Columbia.

"Jefferson obtained for Ledyard the passport which carried him to Saint Petersburg, where he received the permission of the Empress Catherine to traverse her dominions in a high northern latitude to their eastern extremity; then he would cross the sea from Khamschatka, or at Behring's Straits; and, descending the northwest coast of America, come down to the river which they were certain must have its head opposite that of the Missouri; ascend it to its source in the Rocky mountains, and then follow the Missouri to the French settlements of the upper Mississippi, thence home.

"By what petty intrigue, or whose small mind overthrew such a grand plan, we cannot know—

Primarily, Montana owes its first debt of gratitude to the Hon. Thomas G. Merrill, who by agitating the question, in and out of season, finally aroused public sentiment to a point of organizing an association for mutual defence in the grave dangers that threatened.

Besides his connection with the mining companies above mentioned, Mr. Merrill is also interested in various other valuable mining properties. He and a partner own the Liverpool silver mine, located a mile and a half from Clancey. This mine is now yielding them over $12,000 per month.

Mr. Merrill has all his life affiliated with the Republican party; but owing to the great questions which now affect the interest of the West, he is independent in his views, and hopes to participate at an early day in the organization of a party that will revolutionize the politics of the country in the interest of the people, unless one of the old parties shall declare, unequivocally, in favor of an enlarged volume of good money and the full restoration of silver to a place as money as it was at the beginning of 1873.

Governor Sidney Edgerton, Montana's first Governor, appointed Mr. Merrill the first County Clerk and Recorder for Jefferson county, which then embraced the territory from the summit of the main range of mountains to the eastern boundary line,—an area larger than all of Great Britain. When the Midwinter Fair, held in San Francisco, California, in 1894, became an assured fact, Governor Rickards cast about for the man who was best able to fittingly represent Montana on that auspicious occasion, and his choice finally fell upon Mr. Merrill, who was appointed on January 4, 1894; and so happy was this selection that through Mr. Merrill's efforts the young State covered herself with glory, and Montana day at this great fair was an event long to be remembered. On this day Mr. Merrill caused to be distributed as souvenirs more than twenty-eight pounds of Montana sapphires, making many thousands of valuable presents of precious stones. Everything which Montana had promised was fulfilled, and admiring words for Montana were heard on all sides; and the newspapers particularly were profuse in their praise.

In his extemporaneous speech in reply to Director General M. H. de Young, Mr. Merrill spoke in part as follows: "Montana is the most useful of the treasure States of the West. Its product of silver has exceeded that of all other States. Last year the gold and silver taken from the mines amounted to $32,000,000. Colorado, which came next, yielded $27,000,000 last year. Ten years ago attention was turned to Montana's copper, and in the production of that metal it leads all the rest of the United States. This exposition represents the grandest effort made for the advancement of the West, and it has been crowned with glorious success."

The great success of the commissioner's efforts can scarcely be properly appreciated, and to his untiring energy is due the fact that through the Midwinter Fair much more is now known of the State of Montana than people ever knew before. Great surprise was exhibited at the figures of Montana's resources, and mining men and experts, thousands of whom visited the fair, were attracted by Montana's exhibit, and seemed unwilling to leave it, as it was the largest and most complete mineral exhibit made by the State, containing over 30,000 pounds of specimens.

Mr. Merrill was married in 1870, in St. Paul, Minnesota, to Miss Annie E. Torbet, a native of Ohio and a daughter of Rev. A. M. Torbet, a Baptist minister. They are the parents of five children: Charles O., Frank T., George A., Sarah M. and Annie Grace. They reside at Helena, where Mr. Merrill holds prominent rank with the leading citizens of the State. He is a member of the Montana Club, of Helena.

very small causes aid to determine the fate of great events—but all the large thought of Jefferson, the enterprise of Ledyard, and the intelligent co-operation of the Empress Catherine were defeated when Ledyard, who had already reached Siberia, was overtaken by an order revoking his permission, and conducted back 'as a spy' out of Russia."

Turning from the noble aspiration of Jefferson, we come back to Fremont in his camp under command of Nicollet. His picture of the Indians at home as they appeared fifty years ago, and their perfect hospitality, is pleasant to look upon.

"This was to be our starting-point for an expedition northward over the great prairies, to the British line. Some weeks were spent in making the remaining preparations, in establishing the position and writing up journals, and in negotiations with the Indians. After the usual courtesies had been exchanged our first visit to their village was arranged. On our way we were met by thirty of the principal chiefs mounted and advancing in line,—a noble-looking set of men showing to the best advantage, their fine shoulders and breasts being partly uncovered. We were conducted by them to the village, where we were received with great ceremony by other chiefs, and all their people gathered to meet us. We were taken into a large and handsome lodge and given something to eat, an observance without which no Indian welcome is complete. The village covered some acres of ground, and the lodges were pitched in regular lines. These were large, of about twenty skins

HON. LEVI J. HAMILTON, ex-Mayor of Butte City, is a native of Ohio, born in Attica, Seneca county, December 15, 1853. On the paternal side he is of Scotch-Irish descent, and on the maternal side English. The combination of such strains generally result in the highest development of manhood. Mr. Hamilton's ancestors settled in America about the time of the Revolution, and also became early settlers in Hardin county, Ohio, where his father, Davidson Filson, was born, in 1825. He married Miss Margaret Carson, the daughter of Col. Samuel Carson, who served as a Colonel in the war of 1812. Of their ten children six are still living. The father died in 1892, in the sixty-seventh year of his age, and the mother still survives, now in her sixty-ninth year, residing in Seneca county, Ohio. She is a member of the Methodist Church, as was also her husband, and he was a farmer by occupation. In the earlier history of the family they were Presbyterians.

Levi, their son, was brought up on his father's farm in Seneca county, attending the public school, also the Republic Normal School and the normal school at Valparaiso, Indiana. He taught a graded school for two years, then read law in the office of William M. Kilpatrick, who was then the prosecuting attorney for Shiawassee county, Michigan. After this he studied law at the Michigan State University at Ann Arbor, and began to practice. After serving one term as Circuit Court Commissioner, his attention was turned to the settlement of the Territory of Dakota. He removed to Pierre and practiced there three years, up to 1884, at which time he came to Butte and established himself in the practice of his profession, which he has continued to the present time.

Betimes he began to take an active part in the politics of the country, as a Republican, which he had always been, and in 1885 he received the appointment of City Attorney, to complete a vacant term. After this he was elected Police Magistrate, and after serving a term in that capacity, was nominated and elected Mayor of the city. This was for the first term after the re-incorporation of the city. He filled one term in this capacity, with satisfaction to the public, and was then nominated by his party as a candidate for the office of District Judge, to run for election against Judge McHatton. The result of the election was contested, and to avoid the injury to the public involved in the long delays necessary to a judicial adjustment, both the candidates resigned, and Governor Toole, being a Democrat, appointed Judge McHatton to the position of District Judge. In the State campaign of 1892, when Governor Rickards canvassed the State, Mr. Hamilton canvassed a large portion of the State with him, doing effective work for his party.

He has since devoted his time to the practice of his profession. He is also interested in considerable city property, and was one of the platters of the Vanderbilt addition to the city of Butte; and he and others donated to, and aided in, the establishment of the School of Mines on this property.

August 26, 1879, Mr. Hamilton married Miss Eliza S. Lahring, a native of Brooklyn, New York, who at the age of five years removed to Byron, Michigan. She is the daughter of John F. Lahring. Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton have one daughter, named May, and born in 1883.

Mr. Hamilton has never joined any of the societies here, devoting his whole attention to his practice. He is a gentleman of pleasant manner, thoroughly reliable, and is well spoken of everywhere he is known.

or more. The girls were noticeably well clothed, wearing finely dressed skins nearly white, much embroidered with beads and porcupine quills dyed many colors; and stuffs from the trading-post completed their dress. These were the best formed and best-looking Indians of the plains, having the free bearing belonging with their unrestrained life in sunshine and open air. Their mode of life had given them the uniform and smooth development of breast and limb which indicates power, without knots of exaggerated muscle, and the copper-bronze of their skins, burnt in by many suns, increased the statue-like effect."

CHAPTER VII.

BENTON IN THE SENATE—FREMONT IN THE FIELD OF EXPLORATION—THE NORTHWEST PASSAGE TO INDIA—STILL HALTING THE BRITISH LION.

"THERE is the East. There is the road to India."

Senator Benton seems to have constantly fretted under the taunts and claims of England with reference to the great Northwest. "Our fur traders and trappers are being driven out: some have been killed!" he cried.

True, when he stood up in his place in the Senate so often, pointing with his long, strong arm away beyond the mountains of Montana, and cried with firm-set lips, "There is the East. There is the road to India," he meant all he said and well deserved to have his utterance on his statue as it is. But he meant more than that: he meant to drive back the British from the north, as his old comrade in arms, Andrew Jackson, had driven them back from the South at the battle of New Orleans.

He could not and he did not rest until he had an expedition on its way to take absolute possession of Jefferson's purchase in its entirety.

The indifference to our Northwest possessions in and beyond the Rocky mountains at that time reads strangely now. One senator honestly voiced the sentiment of the Eastern States in a prolonged protest against sending out to take possession of the land when he exclaimed, "I wish to God we did not own it!"

The renewal of the joint-occupation of the Columbia had effectually discouraged American enterprise, and infused new life into the English occupation; their encroachments were continued in various forms, now open, now covert; they even built upon the Columbia River a cordon of forts ostensibly for "defense" against Indians, who were in reality allies of the Hudson's Bay Company, and made fur-trading and trapping impossible to Americans.

Every measure proposed by their Western friends for protection was met by opposition, curious to read to-day. Even so late as '43 the ignorance, the indifference, the blindness to the value of our Pacific territory—the heedless inattention to the evidence of living history as to England's pertinacious designs on that coast, is shown in the debates on every bill. On one giving lands to settlers, while a Senator from Ohio (then a very western State), Mr. Tappan, supported the measure and said 50,000 settlers with their 50,000 rifles should be given lands to colonize the banks of the Oregon, there was open expression that this would give offence to England.

Mrs. Fremont says in this connection: "My father admitted England might take offense. She probably had already made up her mind to take offense, whatever we might do; but that was not the question: had England a right to take offense? That was the only question. Of course no more fit man than Fremont could have been found to lead this expedition with its double purpose. He had earned the right to be at the head of it; besides, there were good reasons for having a discreet and wise man there."

Fremont, born and bred a Carolina gentleman, a natural geometrician, astronomer, a born student of great theories from the cradle to the grave, he had grown up in battle harness and spent his life in the saddle and by the camp fire, remote from books, in the home of the savage. Yet with all his hardships, rude housings with rough men, I remember that his voice was ever soft and low and kindly, his manners courtly and graceful as a cavalier's of old, even to the most humble and in things most common-place. To his last days he was a courtly figure, straight as an Indian, and elastic as a boy in his body as in his mind. But feeble all mention of mine to show his nature compared to this from his own soul, said of his wife, in his old age. No man can say such lovely things of woman without himself having a most gentle and lovable heart.

"I went with the eldest of the sisters to a school concert in Georgetown, where I saw her. She was then just in the bloom of her girlish beauty, and perfect health effervesced in bright talk, which the pleasure of seeing her sister drew out.

COL. WILLIAM H. EWING, a veteran of both the Seminole and Mexican wars, and one of Montana's highly respected pioneers, was born in Millersburgh, Bourbon county, Kentucky, July 11, 1818. His ancestors were early settlers of Virginia and Maryland, and his forefathers, on both his paternal and maternal side, were participants in the Revolutionary war. Colonel Ewing's father, William M. Ewing, was born in Hamilton, Ohio, in 1796; was married in 1817 to Miss Mary Reed, a native of Pennsylvania, born in 1799. After their marriage they resided in Kentucky for a time, two of their children being born there, and from Kentucky removed to Ohio, where two more children were added to their family. William M. Ewing died in Ohio in 1824. His widow survived him until 1852, when she passed away in the fifty-third year of her age.

Young Ewing was just merging into manhood when trouble arose with the Seminole Indians in Florida. He enlisted for service in the war and went to the seat of action. He served under Colonel Zachary Taylor and Colonel Dick Gentry. On Christmas day, 1837, they fought the battle of Okechobee and whipped the Seminoles, the loss to the United States being sixty men. The Colonel and seven men were killed in Mr. Ewing's company.

Mr. Ewing remained in Florida until October, when he returned North. A few years later, when the trouble with Mexico arose, he again enlisted his services. But previous to this he was employed as clerk in his uncle's store in London, Missouri. It was in Colonel Willick's Battalion, Company I, that Mr. Ewing entered the ranks for the Mexican war, and soon afterward he received the appointment of Colonel's Bugler, in which capacity he served until after the American victory at the city of Mexico. He had been mustered in at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, and served for some time in New Mexico, where his term of enlistment expired and where he re-enlisted in Company C, Santa Fe Battalion. They continued in New Mexico until October of 1848, and then marched to Independence, Missouri, where he was mustered out in November, same year. He participated in the battle at Touse and also the battle of Santa Cruz. He was with the forces that wintered on the Rio Grande, and it was there that they received news that the city of Mexico was taken and hostilities ended. Before this news reached them, however, they had gone on forced marches to Santa Cruz and had captured that city. The war over, Colonel Ewing returned to Independence, Missouri, and was honorably discharged.

Soon after the Mexican war the subject of our sketch started from Missouri across the plains to California, and landed at Los Angeles on Christmas, 1848. He went to the mines at Rough and Ready, below Nevada City, and in a short time made about $12,000. From there he went on the Gold Lake stampede and lost the most of his money. He continued to mine and trade until 1854, when he returned to Santa Fe. The following year he went on to Missouri and from there to Kansas, and opposite the

"Naturally I was attracted. She made the effect that a rose of rare color or beautiful picture would have done. Months passed before, in the vacation time, I saw her again, at her father's house, which already I had come to frequent. She was happy in the return to her home, and my first impressions of her were made in the unreserve of family life, where the real nature most readily expresses itself. Her beauty had come far enough down from English ancestry to be now in her that American kind which is made up largely of mind expressed in the face; but still it showed its Saxon descent. At that time of awakening mind the qualities that made hers could only be seen in flitting shadows across the face, or in the expressions of incipent thought and unused and untried feeling. So in writing here I give what after-knowledge made known to me. Nor would it be possible to disentangle the interwoven threads of memory and confine impressions to the time when they were made. These are features which convey to us a soul so white that they impress with instant pleasure, and of this kind were hers. As, too, in the daily contact there are others from which to receive pleasant words or kindly acts gives the sort of agreeable surprise we feel when suddenly we come upon patches of bright, parti-colored phlox growing on naked rocks. The phlox loves the naked sand or rock, but the difference is in the warmth it finds there. In the human rock thereis no heart to replace the sun."—Memoirs of my Life, by John Chas. Fremont: pp. 68-69.

"It reads almost like dramatic romance to say that Captain Robert E. Lee was instrumental in providing the poorly equipped expedition of John C. Fremont with its only piece of artillery, the only piece of artillery that was ever placed in the field to be used in the defense of Montana city of Leavenworth he located a tract of land, on his Florida war warrant, took up his abode upon the same, and continued to reside there several years and afterward sold for $6,000. In 1856 he was married to Mrs. Rebecca B. Hill, a widow with two children. Her maiden name was Taylor. Of her children we record that Mary B., formerly the wife of David M. Goodwin, now Mrs. Edward Crawford, resides near her stepfather; Sallie L., now deceased, was the wife of J. W. Hopkins; and the adopted son, Philip, lives in the Flathead country in Montana.

It was in 1864 that Colonel Ewing crossed the plains the second time, this time coming in an ox train, his outfit consisting of four wagons and a carriage, and bringing his wife and son. The other children were left to attend school. The date of their arrival at Virginia City was September 7, 1864. The Colonel brought with him a lot of goods, a part of which he sold at a good profit at Virginia City, and the following spring brought the rest of his goods to Helena, where he disposed of them. He then engaged in the livery business in Helena, and from the fall of 1865 until 1871 did a successful business. In 1871 he sold his horses and carriages and rented his building, and the following year the building was burned, his loss being several thousand dollars. In 1868 he purchased a squatter's right to 320 acres of land in the Prickly Pear valley, four miles north of Helena, this tract costing him $1,500. Later he purchased 160 acres more, for which he paid $400, and this latter piece of land he gave to his son when he became of age. In the spring of 1870 he rented his farm, and, accompanied by his wife, made a trip to California, remaining in the Golden State from July until December. Then they went East and spent the rest of the winter, and in the spring came back to Montana. Although he had bought his farm in 1868, it was not until the spring of 1872 that he moved to it. Here he has since resided, and his career as a farmer has been a successful one, his principal products being hay and grain, which always finds a ready market in Helena. In 1890 he sold 160 acres of his farm for $75 per acre, and the rest of his land he now rents, the income from it together with the interest on his money affording him a comfortable support. He also receives a small pension for the service he rendered during the Mexican war.

Mrs. Ewing died December 29, 1888. She was a most estimable woman, and during their early pioneer life as well as later years of prosperity she proved herself a helpmate in the truest sense of that word. December 8, 1890, the Colonel married Mrs. Mary E. Bates, his present companion, whose daughter is named Ester.

Colonel Ewing has never joined a church or society of any kind. He has been a life-long Democrat. A veteran of two wars, a pioneer of several States, and a man who has traveled extensively, he has many pleasing reminiscences which he relates in a manner that is instructive as well as entertaining. Few of the pioneers of Montana have a larger circle of friends than Colonel Ewing.

and her immediate sisters, against a foreign foe. But this is veritable history. Here is what the author of the first emancipation proclamation says of his first meeting with Lee, long after the great Captain had passed away:

"'At St. Louis I met for the first time Gen. Robert. E. Lee, then a captain in the United States Engineer Corps, charged with improvements of the Mississippi river. He was already an interesting man. His agreeable, friendly manner to me as a younger officer when I was introduced to him first made a more enduring impression than usually goes with casual introductions.'"—From "Memoirs of my Life," by John Chas. Fremont: p. 31.

And yet the most dramatic feature in the story of that first field piece on the plains remains to be told. Let it be told, and at length, as it deserves to be, in the words of that brave and brilliant woman, the explorer's wife:

"Coming home from school on an Easter holiday, I found Mr. Fremont part of my father's 'Oregon work.' It was in the spring of '41; in October we were married, and in '42 the first expedition was sent out under Mr. Fremont. Mr. Nicollet died during the summer, regretting he could have no part in this great and useful development of the country which had been part of France.

"This first encouragement to the emigration westward fitted into so large a need that it met instant favor, and a second was ordered to connect with it further surveys to the sea-coast of Oregon. At last my father could feel his idea 'moved.' Of his intense interest and pride and joy in these expeditions I knew best, and when it came in my way to be of use to them. Mr. Fremont was at the frontier getting his camp and animals into complete traveling condition when (as with Ledyard) there came an

CHARLES Q. JOHNSON, County Clerk and Recorder of Silver Bow county, residing at Butte City, is a native of Utah, born in Manti, April 7, 1865. The ancestry of his family are remotely German, removing at one period to Sweden and finally to America. His father emigrated from Sweden to this country when a young man, but married in Sweden he had married Johana Johnson, and on coming to this country he brought her and their two children,—a son and daughter,—first settling in the State of Missouri; later they removed to Colorado, but finally settled in Utah. Mr. Johnson was a carpenter and cabinetmaker, and at length became also a dealer in furniture; he died at Salt Lake in 1887. Of their twelve children five are living.

Charles Q., the eighth in the above family, received his education at the Salt Lake Collegiate Institute, and began to take care of himself at the age of sixteen years, his first position being that of office boy in Wells & Fargo's bank for two years, in the meantime, however, attending night school, and acquiring a knowledge of bookkeeping, penmanship and a business education generally. In 1883 he came to Butte, and in July accepted a clerkship for C. B. Trowbridge & Company, wholesale liquor dealers. After filling this position for three years, he became assistant bookkeeper and collector for J. Caplice & Company, and continued with them a year. In 1887 he went to Anaconda, where he was for a year in the employ of W. B. Dodridge & Company, general merchants, being their bookkeeper and purchasing agent. Next he entered the employ of the Montana Union Railroad Company, first as freight clerk, then baggagemaster and finally ticket agent. The road is now the Union Pacific and the Northern Pacific. At the end of five years, November 8, 1892, he was elected Clerk and Recorder of Silver Bow county. He had always been an active and enthusiastic Republican, and had always taken an active and efficient part in the politics of this county. That year there were three tickets in the field, the Populist element then being an unknown quantity; but he received a plurality of 351 votes, which was largely ahead of his ticket.

June 19, 1885, Mr. Johnson married Miss Maggie Noble, a native of California; they have a son, named Floyd Frederick. After his father's death in 1887 at Salt Lake City, Mr. Johnson brought his mother and younger brother to Butte, and she resided here until her death, April 10, 1893, in the sixty-fifth year of her age. In religious faith both she and her husband were Lutherans. Mr. Johnson is a member of the Masonic fraternity, in which he is now receiving the degrees of the Scottish rite. He is also a member of the P. O. S. of A. and of the National Union. He has a pleasant home in the Ophir addition on South Main street. He is a capable and obliging officer, his railroad service training him to be accurate and systematic. Thus he has made some very desirable changes in the methods of keeping the county records. Mr. Johnson is a genial, kind-hearted man, and as such has made hosts of friends in Silver Bow county.

order recalling him to Washington; where he was to explain why he had armed his party with a howitzer; that the howitzer had been charged to him; that it was a scientific and not a military expedition, and should not have been so armed; and that he must return at once to Washington and 'explain.'

"Fortunately I was alone in Saint Louis, my father being out of town. It was before telegraphs; and nearly a week was required to get letters either to the frontier or to Washington. I was but eighteen, an age at which consequences do not weigh against the present. The important thing was to save the expedition, and gain time for a good start which should put it beyond interference. I hurried off a messenger—the mails were slow—to Mr. Fremont, writing that he must start at once and never mind the grass and animals: they could rest and fatten at Bent's Fort; only, go, and leave the rest to my father; and that he could not have the reason for haste, but there was reason enough.

"To the Colonel of the Topographical Bureau who had given the order of recall I answered more at leisure. I wrote him exactly what I had done and to him gave the reason; that I had not sent forward the order nor let Mr. Fremont know of it, because it was given on insufficient knowledge, and to obey it would ruin the expedition; that it would require a fortnight to settle the party, leave it, and get to Washington—and indefinite delay there—another fortnight for the return, and by that time the early grass would be past its best and the underfed animals would be thrown into the mountains for the winter; that the country of the Blackfeet and other fierce tribes had to be crossed, and they knew nothing of the rights of science. When my father came he entirely approved my wrongdoing and wrote to Washington that he would be responsible for my act; and that he would call for a court-martial on the point charged against Mr. Fremont. But there was never further question of the wisdom of arming his party."

HON. JOSEPH P. WOOLMAN, one of the pioneers of Montana, and one of Helena's most respected citizens, is a native of Woodstown, Salem county, New Jersey, born February 5, 1841. His ancestors came from England to America in 1678, William Woolman, the great-grandfather of John Woolman, the noted Quaker preacher of New Jersey, being the progenitor of the Woolmans in America. Joseph P. Woolman's father, named James Woolman, was born in New Jersey in 1804, married Miss Ann Pedrick, a native of the same State, and reared a family of nine children, of whom seven are still living. He and his good wife attained the ages of seventy-six and seventy-five respectively. Both were members of the Society of Friends, and by occupation he was a farmer and leather manufacturer.

Joseph P. was the fourth born in his father's family, and was reared in his native town, working on his father's farm until nineteen years of age. His education was finished at the Pennsylvania State Normal School at Millersville. After he had completed his education, he spent one year in New Jersey teaching school, and at the end of that time went to Philadelphia, where he accepted a position as salesman in a wholesale and retail dry-goods establishment. In 1864 we find him en route across the plains with a mule outfit, for the gold fields of Idaho, but instead of going to the mines he stopped in Utah, where he spent the winter engaged in teaching school near Salt Lake. The following year he came to Helena, and after working a short time as a day laborer in the placer mines of Last Chance Gulch, was engaged for several years in mercantile pursuits. Later, he opened a boot and shoe store here, which he conducted a number of years successfully. Recently he has disposed of this business and is now devoting his time largely to the sheep and cattle industry. He is also the possessor of considerable real estate and has mining interests, being one of the owners of the once famous Jay Gould and other mines. Mr. Woolman has seen the whole growth of the city of Helena and has done his part toward advancing her prosperity and supremacy as the Queen City of Montana.

In politics, Mr. Woolman has always been a Republican. He served two years as chairman of the Republican Territorial central committee. He has creditably served his adopted State in several positions of prominence and trust. In 1876 he was Montana's representative at the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, and was appointed a Commissioner from Montana to the Paris Exposition of 1878. In 1879 he was appointed by Governor Potts, and confirmed by the Territorial Council, as Auditor of the Territory of Montana, and was reappointed by Governors

We find Fremont even in his third expedition, which took him first to California, pushing and pressing to the extreme this same idea, the possession of the entire Louisiana purchase. Not waiting to recruit his horses at Sutter's fort on the Sacramento, he bought fresh ones and started for Oregon through the then pathless wilderness. He had hardly more than crossed the Oregon line when he was furiously attacked by savages one night and had one-third of his force slain by Indians armed with steel-pointed arrows purchased from British traders in Oregon. Fremont in his report of the affair to the Government directly charges the English traders at the mouth of the Umpqua river with furnishing the Indians with weapons of their own manufacture, and says "Kit Carson pronounces them the most beautifully warlike arrows he ever saw."

War having been declared between Mexico and the United States, Fremont was called back from his work of watching the aggressive English to take possession of California. In bidding him farewell, permit me to give his picture of a gentleman who once had not only all Montana, Crosby and Carpenter to succeed himself in the same office, and served in all a period of eight years. In 1894, he acted as chairman of the Executive Committee in the ocation of the permanent capital of the State in the contest between Helena and Anaconda.

He was married in 1880 to Mrs. Sarah E. Glendinen, a native of Ohio and a daughter of Thomas and Eleanor McGavran. Mrs. Woolman died in 1890, and he was again married, in 1893, to Mrs. Cornelia M. Goodwin, a native o Delaware and a daughter of William H. and Eleanor Ann Swiggette.

HON. TILGHMAN H. CLEWELL came to Montana in 1863 and for three decades has been one of her most respected men.

Tilghman H. Clewell was born in the State of Pennsylvania, November 12, 1833. His forefathers came to this country from Alsace-Lorraine, Germany, and settled in Pennsylvania at an early day, and his father, Christian Clewell, was born in Pennsylvania. Christian Clewell married Miss Diana Klotz, also a native of the Keystone State, and some time after their marriage they removed to Ohio and settled in Tuscarawas county, where three of their children were born. The mother died when Tilghman H. was four years old, and after her death he made his home with his grandmother Klotz. He received a common-school education in Ohio, and at an early age was employed as clerk in a general merchandise store in Tuscarawas county, where he remained until 1855. That year we find him in Iowa, also engaged in clerking, and in the spring of 1857 he went to Omaha, Nebraska, and made his home in that city until 1860. News of the gold discovery in Colorado at that time caused him to cross the plains and seek his fortune in the West. He drove a mule team all the way, and in addition to this service payed $25 for his passage. His first mining experience was at Missouri City, but was soon afterward taken sick. Upon his recovery he secured employment as clerk and manager of a store, continuing thus occupied there for three years. In 1863 the Salmon river gold excitement brought him to this place, now a part of Montana. His mining operations at Bannack, however, were unsuccessful, and his next move was to Last Chance Gulch, as Helena was then called. He discovered gold at Wilson creek, secured a good claim and met with success, taking out in a single day as high as $140. He continued to operate this mine for some time and made considerable money. Next he went to the Park diggings, but there he met with indifferent success, and soon afterward he opened up a small stock of general merchandise at Park City, where he conducted business for eighteen months, until the camp was deserted and it was no longer profitable to remain. In 1881 he purchased a book and stationery business in Helena, which he has since conducted successfully. He has for a number of years been more or less interested in quartz mining and still has valuable property in the mining districts.

Mr. Clewell's political views have always been in harmony with the principles advocated by the Republican party. He has faithfully served the public in several positions of prominence and trust. In 1877 he was elected a member of the Territorial Legislature, and in 1880 was appointed Postmaster of Vestal, in which position he served until coming to Helena. In 1885 he was elected Treasurer of Helena, the following year was elected to fill the same office, and for two years he served as Alderman for his ward. In 1891 he was appointed Postmaster of Helena by President Harrison, and in this position he is still serving, rendering a high degree of satisfaction. For years he has been a worthy member of the Masonic fraternity, having attained the thirty-second degree in the Scottish Rite, and also being a member of the Shrine.

Mr. Clewell was married in 1878 to Miss Eliza Collins, a native of Ohio and a daughter of James Collins of that State. Mr. Clewell's residence is one of the attractive homes in Helena.

but also all the plains and mountains for a playground. He says in his Memoirs, page 74, of Kit Carson:

"I was pleased with him and his manner of address at this first meeting. He was a man of medium height, broad-shouldered and deep-chested, with a clear, steady blue eye, and frank speech and address; quiet and unassuming. It will be anticipating to speak here of Carson in connection with after events, but I give one incident to illustrate the simple honesty of his character.

"He had gone to Washington with despatches from me in 1847, and was staying at the house of Senator Benton, welcomed there as my friend. Mr. Benton was in the West, but Carson's modesty and gentleness quickly made him a place in the regard of the family, to whom he gave back a lasting attachment. At one time during his stay he was seen to be troubled in mind, and our young friend, Midshipman Beale, being asked to find what had quenched Carson's good spirits, ascertained that he felt it was wrong to be among such ladies when they might not like to associate with him if they know he had had an Indian wife. 'She was a good wife to me. I never came in from hunting that she did not have the warm water ready for my feet.' She had died long since, and he was now married to a daughter of Beaubien. But his straightforward nature would not let him rest while there was anything concealed which he thought ought to be known to the family who were receiving him as a friend. It was the child of his

HON. WILLIAM MUTH, one of Helena's most enterprising young business men, was born in Wheeling, West Virginia, October 2, 1851. John G. Muth, his father, a native of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, born in 1813, came to America and settled in Virginia in 1833, spending the rest of his life at Wheeling, where he was largely engaged in buying and packing pork. At Wheeling he was married to Miss Elizabeth Bayha, a native of Wheeling and a daughter of German parents. They had five children, four of whom are still living. He died in his seventy-third year, and his wife is still living. They were members of the Lutheran and Presbyterian Churches respectively.

William Muth was the third born in his father's family, and was reared and educated in his native city. In 1869 he located in Leavenworth, Kansas, where he was engaged in business in the employ of W. C. Lobenstein. He came to Helena in 1873 to represent his firm, and was so well pleased with the country and the business outlook that he decided to locate here permanently, and since that date he has been prominently identified with the growth and development of this city. In connection with his merchandising he also invested in mining property, at one time owning an interest in the Belmont mine and other claims. In 1886 he sold both his mercantile establishment and his mining interests and invested his means in real estate. He has since been dealing in real estate extensively, on his own account and also on commissions. He has been interested in all the additions to the city on the west side to the Broadwater Hotel. In 1889 he was one of the builders of the first street motor line in Helena, running between the city and the Broadwater Hotel. This is now an electric road. He is also one of the men engaged in the project to dam the Missouri river, making a water power, and to transmit the power by electricity to Helena and utilize it in lighting the city, running the street cars and operating all the various machinery of the city. This is one of the grandest enterprises ever projected, and when accomplished will do more for Helena than anything before undertaken. Of its success Mr. Muth and his associates are very sanguine. He is one of the directors of the Board of Trade, of which he served as president in 1892.

Mr. Muth is in politics a Democrat, and as in every thing else with which he has had to do, so in politics has he been ever ready to promote the success of his party. He has been twice elected and served two terms as a member of the City Council, has had the honor of serving one term in the Territorial Legislature, and was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1889, which prepared the State Constitution. At the present writing, 1893, he is a member of the Board of County Commissioners of Lewis and Clarke county. During the year in which Mr. Muth was president of the Board of Trade of Helena the location of the United States Military Post near Helena was secured, and an appropriation of $250,000 was made for it by the Government. The citizens of Helena purchased and presented to the Government 1,000 acres of land for its site. Work has since been commenced upon it. Mr. Muth is an active member of the following organizations: The Montana Club of Helena and the Knights of Pythias.

November 25, 1874, he was married to Miss Estella Hoyt, a native of Vesper, New York, and a daughter of Philetus Hoyt, one of Helena's prominent merchants. Mr. and Mrs. Muth have four children—Mary Elizabeth, Roy V., William Herbert and John Freeman.

Indian wife that he had just placed in the shelter of the St. Louis convent-school when we first met."

And here we take final leave of Thomas Jefferson, the father of Montana, and Thomas H. Benton, the godfather of Montana; also of Gen-

HON. CORNELIUS HEDGES, one of Montana's widely-known and highly esteemed citizens, was born in Westfield, Massachusetts, October 28, 1831. Of him and his ancestry we make record as follows:

The ancestors of the Hedges family were among the earliest settlers of Long Island. Later they resided in Connecticut and Massachusetts, acting well their part in the development of New England. Judge Hedges' maternal grandfather, Jacob Noble, served as a Colonial soldier during the struggle for independence. The Nobles were nearly all members of the Congregational Church, and by occupation were chiefly farmers, raising their own wool and making their own cloth. The father of Judge Hedges was Dennis Hedges. He was born in Middletown, Connecticut, in the year 1799, and was married in Westfield, Massachusetts, to Miss Alvena Noble, whose birth occurred in that place in 1801. They had a family of four children, three daughters and one son, this son being Cornelius, subject of our sketch. Dennis Hedges was a blacksmith by trade, at which he worked during the early part of his life. He and his good wife lived happily together for over fifty years, their ages at death being seventy-six and seventy-four years respectively. And we here state that Judge Hedges had the pleasure of returning East and being present at the celebration of their golden wedding.

Cornelius grew up in his native town, attending the academy there and subsequently entering Yale College, at which latter institution he graduated with the class of 1853. After that he taught school and read law, and in 1856 graduated in the law department of Harvard College, being then admitted to the bar by the Supreme Court of the State of Massachusetts. Having completed his law studies, he emigrated to Independence, Iowa, where he entered upon his professional career and soon worked himself into a successful practice. He continued in Independence until 1864. A portion of this time, however, he was engaged as publisher and editor of the Independent Civilian. In the latter part of 1864 he crossed the plains with a mule team, his objective point being Virginia City, Montana. On this long and tedious journey he was traveling with Henry Clark and Timothy Wilcox, and many were the difficulties they had to meet and overcome. On one occasion, while fording a river, their teams came near drowning. On his arrival at Virginia City he worked with the pick and shovel, mining at Alder Gulch, meeting, however, with only moderate success. Learning of the gold excitement at Last Chance Gulch, he came to Helena, arriving at that camp January 16, 1865. Here instead of going into the mines to dig, he engaged in the practice of his profession. In the fall of 1866 he returned to the States, but in the spring of the following year he came back to Montana with his family, making the trip this time by steamboat up the Missouri river. He continued his law practice at Helena, and soon after his return here was appointed United States Attorney by President Grant. In 1872 he was appointed Superintendent of Public Instruction of the Territory, in which capacity he served six years and did much to shape the educational affairs of the country. He also served as Probate Judge five years. In 1883 he was reappointed Superintendent of Public Instruction. At the first State election in 1889 he was elected a member of the State Senate, and held the office four years. Judge Hedges is therefore not only familiar with every phase of progress and advancement of the new State, but also to him belongs the honor of having assisted in its early law-making. He was one of the organizers of the Montana Historical Society, of which he served as secretary for a number of years, all along taking the deepest interest in the association. In 1870 he was one of a party of ten that made an expedition to the National Park, and to him belongs the credit of suggesting that it be preserved for a national park.

Judge Hedges was made a Mason in Iowa in 1859, and during the whole of his life in Montana he has been one of the most active members of the order, giving it much of his time and attention. In 1865 he was one of the charter members of Helena Lodge, No. 1, and was elected its first Master. This lodge was one of the three that united in forming the Grand Lodge of Montana in 1866. He was Grand Master in 1871, and the following year he was elected Grand Secretary, which office he has since filled with great acceptability to the fraternity. Few men, if any, in Montana are better posted on Masonry than Judge Hedges. The Helena Library is another institution in this city that owes much to the persistent energy of Judge Hedges. He helped to organize it and is now acting as its president.

For a number of years he has been largely interested in the sheep industry in Montana. At this writing he and his son have in the Musselshell country no less than 10,000 head of sheep, and during the present year (1893) expect to largely augment that number. The Judge also has a number of important mining interests in the State.

Judge Hedges was happily married in 1857 to Miss Edna L. Smith, a native of Southington, Connecticut, born in 1836, daughter of Wyllys Smith, a descendant of early New England settlers. They have had eight children five of whom are living, viz.: Wyllys, Henry, Edna C., Emma M. (now Mrs. John M. Woodbridge) and Cornelius, Jr.

Judge Hedges began his political career as a Democrat, and his first presidential vote was cast for James Buchanan, but when the civil war came on he joined the Republican party and became one of the very strongest adherents to its principles. He has led a good and upright life and has gained the highest regard of a wide circle of the best men of the State.

eral Fremont, the son-in-law and fellow Senator of Benton.

The present generation can hardly realize the strained relations between the two great Saxon powers which prevailed during these early years. Fortunately it was fought out on paper, covertly, by deep and determined statesmen on either side to the final end, and without any great noise before the busy world; yet the cry went up from the few pioneers in Oregon for years, "Fifty-four, forty or fight;" and these Oregonians met more than once under their pines in mass meeting and resolved again and again that they were "not subjects of England but citizens of the United States."

So late as the winter of 1858–9 half of Oregon and Washington was turned into a military camp on the question of the line against which Montana banks to the north; and school-boys paraded their play-games and fought their games of football with eager anticipation of the approaching struggle with England; for she had now laid claim to and taken possession of the island and waters of San Juan in the straits of Fuca. General Scott, Commander-in-chief of our armies, was sent out to the scene of trouble; and however little this may have meant in other parts of the Republic, his coming made with us a blaze of excitement by the Oregon. I was teaching school near Vancouver, Washington, when General Scott, with Harney, landed there

THE CASCADE BANK, of Great Falls, Montana, was established April 24, 1889. It was incorporated under the laws of Montana by the following substantial moneyed business men of Helena and Great Falls: S. E. Atkinson, Peter Larson, Jacob Switzer, William Chumasero, John J. Ellis and F. P. Atkinson. Its original stock was $40,000. At its opening several prominent citizens were on hand, anxious to make the first deposit. Thus the Cascade Bank made its auspicious start, and from the first became one of the popular and successful financial institutions of Great Falls. Since then its course has been one of continued prosperity, and it now ranks as the oldest banking institution in the city. The capital stock was increased to $75,000 in 1891, and it made a good record by going safely through the financial panic of 1893. Its business is of a general character. It receives accounts of individuals and corporations, makes collections throughout Montana and the whole Northwest, makes drafts on banks both in this country and Europe, and invests money for non-residents. The condition of the bank according to the report January 2, 1894, is as follows:

RESOURCES.

Loans and discounts		$196,232.17
Furniture and fixtures		2,278.38
County and city warrants		3,777.35
Due from other banks	$50,779.10
Cash on hand	53,421.13	104,200.23
		$306,488.13

LIABILITIES.

Capital stock	$ 75,000.00
Surplus	15,000.00
Undivided profits	9,322.95
Demand deposits	168,025.54
Time deposits	39,139.64
	$306,488.13

The present officers of the bank are S. E. Atkinson, president; J. Switzer, vice president; F. P. Atkinson, cashier; and W. W. Miller, assistant cashier. All these officers are gentlemen of strict integrity and marked financial ability. President Atkinson has for fourteen years held responsible positions in the two largest national banks of Montana. Vice President Switzer is a man of large means and has for many years been identified with Montana's growth and development, and to F. P. Atkinson belongs the credit of being one of the best posted banking men of the State.

S. E. ATKINSON, president of the Cascade Bank of Great Falls, Montana, dates his birth in Carrollton, Ohio, November 17, 1848.

Mr. Atkinson is of English descent and traces his ancestry back to Stephen Atkinson, his great grandfather, who emigrated from England to this country at an early day, bringing with him a charter from the Crown Government to manufacture woolen goods in Maryland. His son Isaac, the grandfather of our subject, moved to Western Pennsylvania and thence to Ohio and became one of the pioneers of Carroll county, where he was for a number of years engaged in operating woolen and flouring mills and also in merchandising. He served in the Ohio Legislature and was prominently identified with the early history of that State. Robert J. Atkinson, his son and the father of S. E., was born in Western Pennsylvania and was married to Miss Matilda Jackson. He became a prominent lawyer and was Third Auditor of the United States Treasury under the administrations of Presidents Pierce, Buchanan and Lincoln. He died in the fifty-second year of his age. His good wife still survives him, she having now (1894) reached her three-score years and ten. Their family of three sons and three daughters are all living.

on his way to San Juan. My school-boys would not and could not be kept in place, but marched in a body to the wharf to offer their services to the hero of Lundy's Lane; and their schoolmaster with them. We were coldly received, and I, having already begun to write for the press, described General Scott as "an austere old stiff, with no fight in him."

Of course the trouble blew over soon, and Scott returned to Washington, leaving the United States in possession of the disputed land and waters, and the question still in the hands of diplomats, and the United States meantime growing stronger and more determined each year. Then came the Civil war, a revelation of our terrible strength; and finally, in 1872, we find England willing to arbitrate the long standing dispute about our lines to the north. The emperor of Germany was agreed upon as arbitrator, and we chose George Bancroft, the historian, to advocate our interests at the court of his friend, the emperor, Gladstone urging the claims of England. Finally, after long delay and much diplomacy, the conqueror of Paris decided in our favor, and gave us the islands and the waters of San Juan. Thus we see that the ink is scarcely yet dry on the decree which establishes, let us hope for all time, our line to the north of Montana and other parts of the United States purchased by Thomas Jefferson of Napoleon the Great.

Stephen Eugene, the subject of this article, being the oldest.

Mr. Atkinson had excellent educational advantages in his youth. He graduated in the Columbian College, Washington, D. C., in June, 1871, and that same year entered law school. The death of his father at this time, however, changed his plans, and instead of continuing his law course he returned with his mother and the rest of the family to their home in Ohio. The following six years he was employed as assistant secretary of the Jefferson Fire Insurance Company at Steubenville, Ohio.

B. F. Potts, an uncle of Mr. Atkinson, had served as a general in the Union army and was a friend of General Grant. When Grant became President he appointed General Potts Governor of the Territory of Montana. Here be it stated that Mr. Atkinson had had no communication with his uncle until 1878, when he received a telegram saying that a position in the First National Bank of Helena awaited him if he would come to Montana. He immediately started for the West, making the journey by way of the Union Pacific to Ogden and thence by the overland stage to Montana. He accepted the position of bookkeeper in the First National Bank of Helena and served in that position five years. The Montana National Bank was then organized. He was offered the position of assistant cashier in it, which he accepted and in which position he served eight years, until 1889. At that time he and his brother, F. P. Atkinson, organized the Cascade Bank at Great Falls. He was made president of the bank at its organization, but continued to reside in Helena until 1891. Since that year he has made his home in Great Falls. He has been identified to some extent with the growth and development of Great Falls ever since it was incorporated, visiting it frequently, and especially has he been interested in its prosperity since he located here permanently. His business career has brought him in contact with many leading men of the State, and by all who know him he is most highly esteemed for his excellent qualities.

DR. JOHN W. FRIZZELL has been identified with the medical profession of Great Falls, Montana, since 1891, and as one of the leading physicians and representative citizens of the place it is appropriate that some personal mention be made of him in this work.

Dr. Frizzell was born in Warrensville, near Cleveland, Ohio, February 5, 1854, and when two years of age was adopted by Russell Frizzell, by whom he was reared as an own son. Russell Frizzell was born on his father's farm in Canaan, Essex county, Vermont, in the year 1803, and when he grew up was married to Mary Jane Badger, a native of Canada. After their marriage they removed to Ohio and settled on a farm near Cleveland, which they improved and which they subsequently sold to Thomas Garfield, an uncle of James A. Garfield. They then removed to Newburg, but finally returned to the neighborhood which they had left, and there they passed the remainder of their lives and died, his death occurring January 18, 1886, and hers a few years later. They never had any children of their own and upon the little orphan intrusted to them they bestowed the fondest affection and did for him the same as if he had been their own. In return for their loving care the Doctor was everything that a dutiful son could have been.

Dr. Frizzell received his early education in the public schools, and when he was eighteen began to teach. He taught school off and on for about twenty terms in his own and neighboring districts. From the time he was twelve years old he suffered from a lameness in one of his legs, and, although he had the best medical treat-

CHAPTER VIII.

ARGONAUTS OF THE NEW WORLD—EARLIEST DISCOVERIES OF GOLD DUST—VIRGIN GOLD FOUND BY CORTEZ AND HIS MEN IN THE AZTEC TEMPLE TO THE SUN—THE GOLD BELTED COUNTRY—FIRST GOLD FOUND IN CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.

FROM a remarkably rare publication, perhaps the finest that has yet appeared west of the Rocky Mountains, I clip the following account of the early discoveries of gold in California, as it finds fit place in this connection:

"The huge foundation stones of this vast State were, from the first, set in solid gold. As in the building of Solomon's temple, the silver thereof was not accounted. Indeed, it was more than a dozen years later that the mountains of silver that lay within the lines of California, before she gave Nevada and other Territories to the Union, were really discovered. The Spanish engineers had pierced Mexico to the heart, the miners of Spain had followed their veins of silver for miles up and down the Andes, but they never had touched the Sierras. And so the discovery of silver in California was as entirely an American discovery as was that of gold. And the stranger falls to wondering why silver was discovered so much later. Let us explain this. Gold had been washed and worn down from the mountains by centuries of attrition with boulders, gravel and debris, to where it was finally found in the lower levels of the foot-hills by the farmers and mill hands of General Sutter. Having found these particles of detached gold in this one spot at the base of the California Sierra, they searched and found it in thousands of other similar places, till finally they pursued it up the mountains to its very source and fountain-head ment, he failed to improve as he grew older; and as the schoolroom was very confining he thought it best to adopt a profession that would give him more exercise, and chose that of a physician. He accordingly went to Cleveland and entered the office of Prof. H. F. Biggar, under whose instruction he studied three years, and at the same time also attended lectures at the Cleveland Homeopathic Hospital College, where he graduated in 1884. After his graduation he returned home and took care of his parents until their death, after which he settled up their business and came West.

It was on the 19th of June, 1891, that Dr. Frizzell landed in Great Falls, and immediately after his arrival here he opened his office at No. 317 Central avenue, where he has since continued practice and met with satisfactory success. He brought with him to this place a pair of thoroughbred horses which he raised in Ohio and which he now uses in making his professional rounds. He is thoroughly identified with the city and its interests and has made many friends since coming here.

Dr. Frizzell was married September 25, 1881, to Miss Emily May Conkey, a native of the town in which he was born and a daughter of Lafayette Conkey, her father's farm adjoining the Frizzell place. They have had two children, one of whom is living—Rex Russell, eight years old.

The Doctor is a member of the Masonic fraternity and is W. M. of the lodge of Great Falls.

COL. JOHN G. EVANS, ex-Postmaster of Butte City, Montana, and now engaged in the book and stationery business in this city, was born in Wales, December 23, 1852. His ancestors as far back as known were Welsh people, and his parents, David and Margaret (Griffiths) Evans, passed their lives and died in Wales. David Evans was a farmer in early life, but later became a merchant. He died in 1876, in the seventy-second year of his age, and his wife died in 1881, also at the age of seventy-two. Five of their eleven children are still living, John G. being next youngest of the family, and the youngest now living.

Colonel Evans was reared and educated in his native town Maesteg, and there learned the grocery business. In 1875 on the mountain tops. Yet, in all this ardent search they found no silver. A million men came and went, searched the Sierras through, poured out life like water, worked as men never worked before, dug through and washed down mountains of silver, so to speak, but still silver remained practically undiscovered.

"Yet particles of silver had been washed and worn down from the mountains by flood and stream for centuries just the same as gold had been washed and worn down. But silver is perishable, corroding like iron. Diamonds, and all precious stones perish by flame and attrition; silver rusts and rots; but a particle of gold, even the smallest particle, whatever fortune overtakes it, remains as perfect to the end of time as when it was placed in its rocky bed by the finger of God. And this is the reason why we old miners found gold so readily and followed it to its source in the mountains; and this is the reason why we did not find silver till so many years later, and found it even then only by compulsion. That is, we found gold so mixed and charged with silver that an ounce of gold dust which was at first sold for sixteen dollars proved to be worth only seven dollars, the larger part he emigrated to America, believing that this country offered better advantages for an ambitious and enterprising young man than did his own, and upon his arrival here located at Salt Lake City, not with the intention of becoming a Mormon but to accept a clerkship in the store of Walker Bros. After he had been with this firm five years he was given the management of a store on the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad. Some time later he returned to Wales on a visit and remained six weeks, and upon coming back to the United States he took up his abode in Butte City. That was in 1882. For one year he managed the store of J. B. Meredith, and the following year he opened a general merchandise store in Anaconda for David Cohen, Sr. After this he was engaged with Robert Grix in the book and stationery businesss up to 1889, at which time he received the appointment of Postmaster of Butte City from President Harrison, and entered upon the duties of the same. For four years and two months he rendered most efficient service as Posmaster, giving general satisfaction both to the Department and to the citizens of Butte, and on the first of April, 1894, turned the office over to his successor with everything in the best of running order.

Soon after retiring from office, he opened at No. 43 West Broadway, his present book and stationery business. Here, in addition to books and stationery, he keeps a full line of fancy articles; and, as he is so well known and popular in Butte City, he starts out in this business with the bright prospect for success.

Mr. Evans was married, December 25, 1887, to Mrs. Gussie Grant, widow of W. F. Grant, and daughter of James Carty, of Halifax, Nova Scotia. She had a daughter by her former husband—Fultie Grant—and she and Mr. Evans have two sons, W. Vivian and John Roscoe.

In politics, Mr. Evans has always been an active Republican. He is a Past Supreme Representative of the K. of. P., belongs to the Uniform Rank of the Order, and is a member of the staff of Major General Carnahan, with the title of Colonel.

Hon. Alexander C. Botkin, Lieutenant Governor of the State of Montana, is a native of Wisconsin, born at Madison, October 13, 1842. He is of Scotch-Irish ancestry.

His father, Alexander Botkin, was born in Kentucky, of Irish parents, March 4, 1801, and was married to Miss Jane R. Sinclair, a native of Scotland. They had three sons, of whom Alexander C. is the youngest.

Alexander C. Botkin was reared and educated in his native county, graduating in the University of Wisconsin in 1859, and receiving the degree of Master of Arts in 1862. From 1862 to the close of the war he served as paymaster's clerk. In 1866 he graduated in the law department of the University at Albany. Between 1869 and 1874 he served as city editor first, and afterward managing editor of the Chicago Times. From 1874 to 1878 he was editor in chief of the Milwaukee Sentinel, and in 1878 he was appointed United States Marshal for the district of Montana by President Hayes. In this capacity he served until 1885, and from 1886 to 1890 was City Attorney of Helena. He has also been the candidate of the Republicans for delegate to Congress for Montana. In 1892 he received the nomination for Lieutenant Governor of the State and was elected in the ensuing election by 2,300 majority, running some 1,300 ahead of his ticket. He is the member from Montana of the Republican National Committee, by all of this showing that he has led a useful and influential life in the affairs of not only his own State but also of the whole country.

In 1872 he was happily united in marriage to Miss Harriet E. Sherman, a native of Woodbury, Connecticut, and a daughter of George P. Sherman, she being a resident of Milwaukee at the time of their marriage. They have a son and daughter, Alexander W. and Alice Sinclair.

Lieutenant Governor Botkin has practiced law in Montana since 1885 and has been connected with many cases of note, one of which was the first case brought before a court of last resort, involving the question whether the provisions of the Australian ballot law were mandatory.

being silver. And great was the lamentation of the miners at the supposed loss. Some of them abandoned their work in despair; others pushed on and pierced the earth deeper, till finally the grosser metal asserted itself almost entirely. And thus we laid bare, almost by accident, the shining silver foundations of a sister State. 'Silver hath a vein, but gold the place where they fine it.'

"It is worthy of note that all the gold of California, or rather all the gold mines of California, to be found on the surface, of any great account, were found almost at once. This fact strongly attests the valor, the daring, the superhuman endurance of the Argonauts. There was not a single mountain pass that was friendly to their approach. The plains were parched and arid; no maps, no foot-prints or marks of man—only the gleaming snow-peaks to guide them. A grave in the sand in the rear, two graves, three graves; then the mountains at last, and a shower of poisoned arrows from painted savages to receive the few haggard survivors! Never since the most magnificent conception of the siege of Troy has there been gathered together such a race of heroes as came here by land and by sea in the days of old. Time has leveled the graves of their innumerable dead. Romance has glorified and cast a glamour of mingled pathos and splendor over their fearful daring and self-denial. But the world will never know how many a poor Penelope wove and unwove her twenty years away, and looked out with dimmed eyes each day and night for her unreturning wanderer.

"California alone was broader in those days than all the storied world of ancient times. The best part of a year was consumed in reaching these shores. Peril and privation began when the journey began. And so it was that cowards did not start, and the weak and faint fell by the way. See what a situation! 'In those days there were giants in the land, . . . mighty men of power and renown.' Of such metal were

He was sole counsel for the prevailing party, and the decision of the court sustained his side of the case. His management of these cases have shown him to be a man of wide experience both in law and on general subjects, and he is posessed of a comprehensive mind, all of which have given him a leading position in the profession. Notwithstanding that he lost the use of his lower limbs by paralysis in 1879, and has never since recovered their use, he is still in the enjoyment of full mental vigor and is conducting his legal business as well as filling the office of Lieutenant Governor of the State of Montana.

Hon. Louis Rotwitt, Secretary of State of Montana, was born in Germany, July 23, 1838, his ancestors being natives of that country. He was educated there, acquired the druggists' business, and when nineteen years of age came to the United States. Upon his arrival in this country he settled at Leavenworth, Kansas, where he was employed as clerk in a general merchandise store from 1857 until 1859. He then removed to St. Louis, Missouri, where he continued in the drug business up to 1861. The Civil war then burst upon the country, and in July, 1861, he enlisted in the service as a member of General Fremont's body guard, in which he served until said command was mustered out. He then went East to New York, and followed the drug business both there and, later, at Baltimore. From the latter place he returned to St. Louis and accepted a position as cashier and bookkeeper in an importing house.

In 1866 Mr. Rotwitt came to Helena, Montana, brought with him a stock of general merchandise, opened a store on South Main street and another one in New York Gulch, and continued to operate the same, also being interested in placer mining, until 1872. Afterward he was in business at Cañon Ferry, where he remained until 1879, but spent the winter of 1873 at Deer Lodge. During the year 1880 he turned his attention to mining and worked hard to secure a rich find, which, however, seemed to elude him. In the fall of that year he was elected County Clerk of Meagher county, and served so acceptably that he was re-elected five times. In 1889 he was elected to the State Constitutional Convention, and that same year was elected to the office of Secretary of State. Thus he has the honor of being the first Secretary of the great State of Montana. In 1892 he received a re-election and is now serving his second term. In 1876 and 1877 he served as a member of the Territorial Legislature.

Mr. Rotwitt is one of the most popular pioneers of Montana. In all the positions of public trust and importance to which he has been called he has performed faithful and efficient service, and by his many noble traits of character he has won hosts of friends.

the men who not only conquered an area of the earth larger than all the world of ancient times, but pierced the earth to the heart and wrung from her the precious secrets of her bosom. Not a gorge not a gulch, not a peak was left unexplored. And yet a lingering tradition lay in the minds of some of these restless men in the region of Yreka, beyond Mount Shasta, as late as the season of 1853–4, that a portion of the Modoc was still unprospected. Fremont had met with serious trouble here. On one occasion he had left nearly one-half his detachment buried under some bay trees by the way; and but for Kit Carson neither the daring explorer nor one of his party would have survived the attack of this terrible and war-like tribe. Disaster even more fearful than this had overtaken many a daring party of Argonauts here; and so it came to be believed, from the very peril of it, that not only was the place entirely unprospected but surely rich in gold. A prospecting party was suddenly and secretly formed. It set out at midnight. The best men in Yreka were either of the party, arms in hand, or behind it with money and moral support. The writer, although but a lad, because of much experience with Indians was as a great favor let into the secret and permitted to share the perils and prospective fortunes of the bold and excited band. Three days, or rather three nights and the first half of a day, found us in a pleasant pine wood looking down into a deep gulch where water rippled and sang among mossy pebbles that lay at the roots of tiger lilies whose flaming heads tossed level with the shoulders of the tallest man in our party. Surely no wild man, no wild beast even, had ever passed this way. Surely no tame man —and this was the all-important thing to us— had ever struck a pick into this virgin lily land.

"Guns in hand, our strongest-hearted men were stationed behind the pines on the hills round about. The weary mules and horses were tied fast in the thicket of dwarf tamarack hard by. And even the brown nose of one poor old and eloquent mule, old enough to want to be talkative,

HON. WILLIAM YOUNG PEMBERTON, Chief Justice of the State of Montana, is a native of Tennessee, born at Nashville, in the year 1843.

He comes from English and Scotch ancestors who were early settlers in the colony of Virginia. His parents were William and Martha (Brooks) Pemberton, and he is one of their four sons, two of whom died in childhood. He is their youngest child and is now the only survivor of the family.

Judge Pemberton was reared in Missouri by his aunt, Mrs. Rebecca E. Williamson, with whom he remained until his twenty-first year. He was educated at Masonic College, Lexington, Missouri, and graduated at the Cumberland Law School, Lebanon, Tennessee, with the class of 1861. In 1863 he came West and located in Virginia City, Montana, and engaged in the practice of his profession, his practice at that early day extending to all parts of the Territory. In 1865 he took up his abode in Helena, becoming one of its early settlers. He did not, however, remain in the town long, for in 1868 he returned to Missouri, and in that State and in Texas he resided until 1880. In 1880 he came back to Montana, and has since made his home in Butte City. In 1882 he was elected District Attorney of the West Side District, being re-elected to succeed himself in 1884. In March, 1891, he received the appointment of District Judge of the district including Butte, in which capacity he served until January 1, 1893, when he entered upon the duties of his present office, that of Chief Justice of Montana, to which he had been elected the previous fall.

Judge Pemberton was married in 1865 to Miss Clara M. Hutchison, a native of Missouri, and a daughter of John C. Hutchison. The Judge and Mrs. Pemberton have three sons and two daughters, namely: Warren T., John W., Alice M., Early P. and Lulu. Mrs Pemberton is an invalid, and at this writing is in Missouri, hoping a change of climate will benefit her health. The children are with her.

Judge Pemberton has been a Democrat all his life. He has been active in all the campaigns ever since he was old enough to participate in politics, has done much toward advancing the principles of his party and takes a pardonable pride in its triumphs. He is thoroughly posted in law, has a retentive memory, and comes to his conclusions in a calm and deliberate way. He has interested himself both in placer and quartz mining, and has done much toward developing this great interest in the Northwest. Socially, he is a Royal Arch Mason.

was tied as tight as a drum with a buckskin string from one of the men's leggings. And then with whisperings, cautious words of warning, with hope, with fear, but with hope largely dominant, the remainder of us with pick, shovel and pan stole carefully down to the cool, sweet stream, and stood half hidden among the glorious wild lilies, looking for a place to begin.

"And now let me note this fact—pardon the time and space, but I must write it down. As we go farther along you will know the reason why. The leader of our party among the lilies down there with a pick on his shoulder was a giant in stature and in strength, as I now remember him; the water singing there, the lilies nodding there, the long shadows of the pines pitching away across and up the steep hill beyond, tawny with its carpet of fallen quills the men, muskets in hand, watching warily above! No one spoke. We waited for the strong man to begin, to make his choice of the spot where first to sink his pick, for so much depends on this; and no man, if the party is experienced in prospecting, ever intrudes a word upon the leader at such a moment. At length the man fixed his eyes on a little spot down the stream, and stepping briskly forward buried his pick to the handle in a place where he did not break a single lily or even disturb or soil the singing water. And that is all there is to say of this

HON. HIRAM KNOWLES, ex-Supreme Judge of the Territory of Montana, and now Judge of the United States District Court, is a native of Hamden, Maine, born January 18, 1834.

His parents, Dr. Freeman Knowles and Emily (Smith) Knowles, were both born in the State of Maine when it was a part of Massachusetts. Their ancestors came from England to this country and settled in New England at an early day, Richard Knowles having located in Eastham, Massachusetts, in 1639. They were for many generations a family of sea captains, and Judge Knowles' father commanded a ship for a number of years before he settled down to his profession, that of a physician, which he practiced the remainder of his life. He and his wife had six children, Judge Knowles being their only son. The family removed to Illinois in 1838, and in 1840 located in Lee county, Iowa. The father died at the age of seventy-three years, and the mother at fifty-eight. They were Unitarians in their religious views, and were most worthy people.

Judge Hiram Knowles received his education at Antioch College, Ohio, and graduated in the law department of Harvard College, Cambridge, Massachusetts. In 1862 he came West. After practicing law in Nevada three years he removed to Idaho, where he remained one year. In 1866 he came to Montana. Here he prospected and mined and practiced law, and in 1868 was appointed Judge of the Supreme Court of Montana, which office he filled acceptably for eleven years. He then continued the practice of law for ten years. In 1890 he was appointed Judge of the United States District Court. His appointment was confirmed February 21, 1890, and in this office he still continues. While in Nevada he was District Attorney and Probate Judge, and in Montana, in 1889, was a member of the Constitutional Convention which formulated the present Constitution of the State of Montana. Thus, in a few words, we have recorded the public career of one of Montana's most active citizens. Possessed of rare mental attainments and accurate knowledge of law, he has discharged the duties of his high official positions in a manner to command the confidence and esteem of not only the bar of Montana, but also of all the people of the State. In his relations with his fellow citizens he is kind-hearted, liberal, magnanimous; and, notwithstanding that the whole of his early life was spent on the frontier amid scenes of hardships and privations, and where the rougher and coarser side of life is indulged in, still Judge Knowles has come through it and is a good representative of the American citizen and gentleman. In his religious views he is a Unitarian. Fraternally, he is an A. O. U. W. and a Scottish-rite Mason. Politically, he has been an ardent Republican all his life, and when not on the Bench he has used his voice to advance the principles of the party. He served as a member of the first Republican State Convention, which nominated the first State officers for Montana, and he has been deeply interested in all that pertains to the welfare of the great State with which he has cast his destiny. In 1884 he was a candidate for Delegate to Congress, but was beaten by ex-Governor Toole.

Judge Knowles was married April 12, 1871, in Athens, Missouri, to Miss Mary C. Curtis, a native of Lima, Ohio, born December 27, 1844. They have three daughters and a son. The daughters are Eloise, Hilda and Lucretia. The son is Curtis. They have a pleasant home in Missoula. Judge Knowles takes pleasure in the thought that he twice crossed the plains with teams, first to California, then to Nevada and subsequently came to the Territory of Montana, then an undeveloped wilderness, inhabited by savage tribes and alive with buffaloes. In his short life he has seen the grand march of civilization and development which has come to this then wild and unsettled region.

silent man, this Argonaut; he did not crush a single flower or disturb a single note in the long, lone melody of the waters, singing only for Him who divided the waters from the dry land. And there was one there who loved him as a brother for that. And how he wrestled then, and grappled with his work! He took the shovel from the man at hand, as he stood there, knee-deep in the loosened soil, and threw it hastily in a heap high up on the brown leaves on the bank. Then again the pick, and then again the shovel, till he stood breast deep. Then again the pick was buried to the eye. There was a dull, rusty, rasping and sullen sound, as if the man might have struck a coffin lid. He lifted up the pick slowly, held it up, and then with his

HON. ROBERT H. HOWEY, one of Helena's prominent lawyers, dates his birth in Carroll county, Ohio, April 8, 1842. He is of Scotch-Irish descent. Some of his ancestors settled in Pennsylvania previous to the Revolution, and from there the family has spread out over various States in the Union. The parents of Robert H. were Ebenezer and Julia Ann (Shaw) Howey, the former born in Pennsylvania in 1810, and the latter in Carroll county Ohio, in 1820. The Shaws were an old colonial family, and Mrs. Howey's grandfather, Nathan Shaw, served as a soldier in the Revolution, as First Lieutenant of the First Battalion, Cumberland county, New Jersey, Militia. He fought in the Battle of Trenton and in various other engagements in that war. Her father also served in the war of 1812. Mr. Howey's parents had five children, of whom only two are now living. The father died in 1861. The mother still survives, now in her seventy-third year.

Robert H. Howey received his education in the public schools of Ohio and in Rural Seminary, afterward known as Harlem Springs College. He also took a course in the McNeily Normal School, Hopedale, Ohio, where he graduated in 1862, receiving the degree of B. A. Then he began the study of law, under the instructions of Eckley & McCoy at Carrollton. It was during the Civil war that he was engaged in the pursuit of his studies, but when Morgan made his famous raid through the State of Ohio young Howey dropped his studies and joined the Home Guards.

Mr. Howey was admitted to the bar of the District Court of Ohio at Steubenville in 1867, and there engaged in the practice of his profession. Later, however, he accepted the position of Professor of Mathematics in Harlem Springs College. Of this college he afterward became president. In 1872 he entered the Western Theological Seminary at Alleghany, where in due time he graduated with high honors. After his graduation, in April, 1874, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Steubenville and was commissioned by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions to take charge of a church at Unionville, Missouri. He at once went to Unionville, assumed charge as pastor, and through his instrumentality a church edifice was soon built. Later he was principal of the public schools at Unionville. He continued there until February, 1879, when he came to Montana and accepted the position of principal of the Helena city schools, serving as such for five successive years. At the end of that time he was appointed by Governor Potts as Superintendent of Public Instruction for the Territory of Montana, and served as such most efficiently until February, 1883, and while acting in this latter capacity he was appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to select the university lands for Montana. He selected for that purpose seventy-two sections. Few, indeed, have done more to advance the educational interests of Montana than has Mr. Howey. Aside from what has already been mentioned, he was largely instrumental in securing the passage of the compulsory educational law and the law permitting women to vote at school elections. He also has the honor of having organized the Territorial Teachers' Association. From 1885 until 1891 he served very effectively as a member of the Helena School Board. It was during that period that the splendid high-school building and nearly all the other excellent school buildings were erected.

For two years Mr. Howey was business manager of the Independent Publishing Company. Since then he has devoted his time to the practice of law, and has also dealt in real estate to some extent on his own account, having made a number of investments and built several residences in Helena. He has served two terms in the City Council, where his services have been of the utmost importance. While a member of the Council he served as Chairman of the Committee on Sewerage, and also on the Committee on Water Works, and it was during his term that the present systems of both sewerage and water works were put in. In 1888 Mr. Howey was elected Judge of the Probate Court, and in the fall of the following year he was elected a member of the first State Legislature of Montana, which proved to be the celebrated "Dead-Lock" Legislature, which, after a long and hard-fought battle, resulted in the election of Senators Power and Sanders. Thus a very brief account of Mr. Howey's life is given, it being one alike of credit to himself and of vital value to the State of his adoption.

Mr. Howey was married March 14, 1870, to Miss Laura E. Spencer, of Cadiz, Ohio, a graduate of Beaver College, Pennsylvania, with the class of 1868. She was at the time of their marriage, and for several years after, engaged in teaching instrumental and vocal music. Since their coming to Helena she has been president of the W. C. T. U. of Montana, and has delivered numerous lectures and organized many unions in Montana. She represented the Montana W. C. T. U. in the national convenleft hand pushed off and down the long, sharp point of the pick, and with that same rusty, dull and rasping sound, an old sardine box! Prospected? Why, the place had been pierced as full of holes as a tom iron. Men had even sat here and placidly eaten sardines; and, as said before, vast and savage as the Argonauts first found California, they laid her secrets bare to the core, even before they sat down to rest.

"May I record the fact that no man in our party murmured or spoke at all. Swear? Swearing was not as frequent then as now. Those early men, if we except the invasion from the penal colonies of Britain, were gentlemen.

"The man with the pick threw down the sardine box, climbed out of the prospect hole, and pick on shoulder, plucking a single lily as he passed and breathing its languid perfume, climbed on up to where the wondering comrades were gathering around the horses preparatory to the return home. And I do not now recall that one word of explanation was given to those on the hill. They read our faces.

"One more incident in this account of a single prospecting trip. Although it is but a single adventure, it is one of a thousand, of ten thousand, and ten thousand more not at all dissimilar. As we rode silently and warily back in tions held at Nashville and Chicago. She was also one of the organizers of the Working Woman's Home in Helena, and gave it much valued assistance for a number of years; has for a number of years been a member of the Relief Society of Helena, looking after the poor and visiting the poorhouse and prisons, and in this way doing all in her power to ameliorate the wretched conditions of humanity. She is the Alternate Lady Manager of the World's Fair, and also has charge of the Montana Women's Department. In all her efforts in behalf of the part taken by Montana at the great Exposition she has met with eminent success. Governor Rickards appointed her a member of the State Board of Charity, and by the board she has been elected its Secretary; and on her is devolving the duty of visiting all the public institutions of the State and report on their condition to the Governor. Like her husband, she is a worthy member of the Presbyterian Church of Helena. In connection with Mr. Howey's life, it should be further stated that he is Past Master of the A. O. U. W. at Helena.

JUDGE HENRY N. BLAKE was born in Boston, Massachusetts, June 5, 1838. The progenitor of the Blake family in America emigrated from England to Massachusetts in 1630, and became one of the prominent factors in the early history of Dorchester. He served as Recorder and Clerk of "ye Writs" of Suffolk county. Several of his descendants were also prominently identified with the early history of the colonies, and one of the third generation of the family, James Blake, Jr., wrote a book entitled "Blake Annals," a history of Dorchester from 1630 to 1753. Jonathan Blake, the great-grandfather of our subject, was an Adjutant in the Revolution and served in five campaigns in that war. His family consisted of nine children, of whom the oldest, James Blake, was Judge Blake's grandfather. Down to the third James Blake the men of the family had all been Deacons and Elders. James Howe Blake, our subject's father, was born December 7, 1804. He was engaged in the millin business the most of his life, and his death occurred in 1864. November 26, 1829, he married Miss Mary Nichols, with whom his life was happily blended until the time of his death. She survived him until 1885. They had five children. One of their sons, William Edward, lost his life while in the Union ranks serving in defense of his country. Their daughter, now Mrs. Frank Farington, resides in Boston. Having briefly sketched his ancestry, we now turn to the life of Hon. Henry N. Blake, who was the fourth born in his father's family.

Henry N. Blake graduated in the Dorchester high school and also in the Law School at Harvard, receiving the degree of LL. B. from the latter institution in 1858. He began the practice of his profession in Boston. In April, 1861, when the first call was made for volunteers to put down the rebellion, he enlisted in Company K, Eleventh Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and rose successively from the rank of private to that of Sergeant, First Sergeant, Second Lieutenant, First Lieutenant and Captain. He continued in the service until June, 1864, when he was mustered out, having during that time participated in twenty of the battles in which the Army of the Potomac was engaged. At the first battle of Bull Run he was slightly wounded, and May 12, 1864, at the battle of Spottsylvania Court House, he was wounded severely, his serious injuries resulting in his being mustered out of the service.

In 1866 Mr. Blake removed to Montana. He came up the river to Fort Benton, and from there went to Virginia City, where he took up his abode and entered upon the practice of his profession, and where for twenty-three years he was engaged in the practice of law, except when he served as Judge, and a short period, from August, 1866, until January, 1867, when he was editor of the Montana Post. The Judge has decided literary talents. Soon after the war he wrote a book entitled "Three Years in the Army," it being a history of his regiment, and a very interesting one. April 22, 1869, he single file through the long, rustling rye grass, a shower of arrows struck us. We saw nothing more, heard nothing more. But one of our party fell dead from his horse, an arrow buried to the feathers in his breast; in fact, the point of the arrow came entirely through and out at the back, doubtless having passed through his heart, for the man never spoke. We carried the body back with us. And this made the first miner's grave in Yreka—the first, so far as I can find out, in all that part of northern California—the grave of the strong man who would not crush a tiger lily nor soil the singing water.

"Hear some testimony other than that of rude and primitive writers for those earlier men. Is it because virtue is more picturesque in the

was appointed United States Attorney for Montana Territory. This position he resigned in March, 1871, in order to accept the office of District Attorney for the First Judicial District of the Territory, consisting of the counties of Madison, Beaver Head and Yellowstone, this appointment being made by the Governor to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Hon. W. L. McMath. In 1871 he was elected by the people to succeed himself, and served a term of two years. January 9, 1872, he was appointed by the Supreme Court as reporter of its decrees, and he prepared the first volume of Montana's Reports. He assisted in the preparation of volumes two and three. In 1874 he was elected a member of the Montana Legislative Assembly. Being appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the Territory, August 10, 1875, he resigned his position in the Legislative Assembly in order to enter upon the duties of the latter office. He served on the bench until March 2, 1880. Then he was elected a member of the Legislature, and served during the years 1880, 1882 and 1886. He was elected District Attorney of the First Judicial District, comprising the counties of Madison, Gallatin, Yellowstone, Custer and Dawson, and in March, 1889, he received the appointment of Chief Justice of the Territory, the duties of which office he performed until November 8, 1889, at which time the Territory was admitted into the Union as a State. At the first State election, held in October, 1889, he was elected Chief Justice of the State, and served until January, 1893. Upon his retirement from the bench, he resumed the practice of law, to which he has since given his attention. At the election in 1892 he was again nominated for the same position by his party, the Republicans, but as the People's party and the Democrats united on Hon. William Y. Pemberton, the result was that Judge Blake was defeated.

January 27, 1870, Judge Blake was married, in Boston, to Miss Clara J. Clark, a native of Massachusetts and a daughter of Benjamin F. and Mary (Choate) Clark, of that State. They have two daughters, Bessie M. and Nellie A.

The Judge is a member of both the G. A. R. and the Loyal Legion. Of the former he is Past Commander. Much more might be said of the life and character of Judge Blake, but the above sketch, although brief and imperfect, will serve as an index to his career.

HON. WILLIAM G. PREUITT, one of Montana's representative citizens, dates his birth in Madison county, Illinois, March 31, 1843.

Mr. Preuitt comes from Colonial ancestors. His grandfather, Solomon Preuitt, was born in Alabama, and in the year 1800 removed to Illinois, settling in Madison county, where he lived to the advanced age of eighty-nine years. In Madison county our subject's father, James Preuitt, was born, married and spent his life. His wife, whose maiden name was Malinda Storkey, was a native of Tennessee, her ancestors having long been residents of that State. Two sons were born to them: Elias K., who resides at the old home place in Illinois, and William Green, whose name heads this sketch. The latter was reared on his father's farm, spent his boyhood days in attendance at the common schools, and when he reached the age of twenty years he engaged in the hay and grain business in Dorsey, Illinois.

Mr. Preuitt arrived in Helena in the year 1866. He came to the Territory a poor young man, making the journey on foot, and upon his arrival here his first job of work was that of driving oxen on a ranch. Soon afterward, however, he secured a clerkship in a wholesale liquor store in Helena, in which he continued for four years. He then returned to Illinois, and that year, 1870, was married to Miss Willie M. Hundley, daughter of Colonel William B. Hundley and A. (Lucket) Hundley, the former a native of Kentucky and the latter of Virginia.

Coming back to Helena with his wife soon after his marriage, Mr. Preuitt resumed his former position and subsequently purchased an interest in the establishment. In 1879, in company with his father-in-law, he purchased the business, and continued it successfully until 1887. That year he sold out. Several years previous to this he had been engaged in the stock business and had become one of the noted breeders of thoroughbred horses and graded cattle. This business he still continues, being the owner of an 880-acre stock ranch. At this writing (1894) he is also engaged in the hardware business, being a member of the firm of Sturrock & Preuitt, owners of one of the largest hardware establishments in the city.

Mr. Preuitt's elegant residence, located on the corner of Eighth avenue and Rodney street, is one of the finest homes in Helena. He and his wife have four children, all natives of this city. Their oldest son, Hundley H., has charge of his father's cattle interest. Elias K. is in his father's store. The other two are Willie M. and Payton L.

Fraternally, Mr. Preuitt is a member of the A. O. U. W.; politically, he has been a life long Democrat. In 1876 convict from the penal colonies, or the unlettered Texan, that boorishness and outlawry have so conspicuous a part in the literature touching those early times? Bear in mind that a every notable portion of the men of those days came from Harvard and Yale and many other institutions and centres of social advancement. Read the story of those who came to the surface as judges, legislators, governors, United States senators and so on, from swinging a pick in the mines. Let it be written down and never again forgotten in the deluge of cheap fiction, that the early men of California were often men of culture as well as courage.

"It may not generally be known that those men built cities miles and miles in length in those days. Yet it is strictly true. It is to be admitted that those cities had but one street, that there were no street improvements, no sewers, no gas, no gas bills. But still the long, winding lanes of houses that wound up and down and beside the banks of the stream where lay the miners' 'claims' have quite as much right to be called cities as have so many new stations and groups of houses to-day.

"Last summer the writer returned to one of those wood-built cities, where he worked as a miner more than thirty years before. Pine trees had grown up in the lower end of the one long street, and an Indian woman with a miserable little babe asleep on her back was burning pine cones and hulling out the nuts with her black fingers for the San Francisco market. A little further along two Chinamen were tearing out the stones that had formed the hearth of what had once been the most imposing house in this whilom populous 'city.' The briars were thick and rank over the heap of stones that once had been the 'honest miner's' chimney. But the gnome-like little brown men crept close down to the earth and scraped up all the dust and ashes and debris to be washed in their 'rocker' which sat on the edge of the once turbid but now peaceful stream close by. They were searching for the few imperishable little crumbs he was elected one of the County Commissioners of Lewis and Clarke county, in which capacity he rendered efficient service, and he also had the honor of serving three years as Treasurer of the Territory of Montana, having received his appointment from Governor S. T. Hauser. His interest in the stock business has already been referred to. He is the Secretary and Treasurer of the Stock Growers' Association. The Board of Stock Commissioners of Montana has elected him its Secretary, and in addition to his other business he also has the duties of this office devolving upon him. Like most of the prominent men in the North and West he has also been interested to some extent in mining. Viewing his business career as a whole, it is one of marked success and entitles him to a place among the leading men of his State.

WILLARD H. WINTERS, County Auditor of Silver Bow county, Montana, is a native of Minnesota, born in Sauk Center, July 6, 1868, of German ancestry, but the last three generations were native Pennsylvanians. His grandfather, Oscar H. Winters, was born in the Keystone State in 1798, learned the jeweler's trade and has conducted it throughout a long life: he is now (1894) in New York city, ninety-six years of age. His son, Oscar Winters, father of Willard H., was born in Pennsylvania in 1833, married Miss Ann Roberts, a lady of English descent, whose people came to America previous to her birth: she was born in 1835. They had six children, all of whom are living. Mr. Oscar Winters is a farmer and land-owner at Sauk Center.

Willard H., the fifth child, was educated in his native city, in the public schools and in the academy there. In 1885 he came to Montana, and for three years was bookkeeper for his brother, who was a railroad contractor. In 1889 he was engaged at Thompson Falls taking out lumber for the railroad; and in 1890 he came to Butte and opened a grocery business, in company with S. S. Fletcher, but in two years he sold out and engaged in the real-estate business, in partnership with E. W. Wynne, buying and selling city property, and were very successful. In addition to their real-estate purchases they have built upon and otherwise improved various lots, and have thus aided in the improvement of their chosen city.

In 1892 Mr. Winters was elected, on the Republican ticket, Auditor of the county, and he is now filling that position; but he also continues his real-estate business. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and of the P. O., S. of A. Mr. Winters is a talented and thoroughly reliable business man, deserving the high estimate in which he is held by his fellow-citizens in Silver Bow county.

of gold which had fallen from the rich miner's hand into his fire-place

In the days of old,
In the days of gold.

Creeping up the bank amid briars and weeds and crooning to himself, came an old man with a beard like snow, as I neared the extreme end of this once famous mining town. He had a pan under his arm, and with that old politeness and confidence of the genuine gold miner who made the days that are behind California splendid with glory, he set it down on a rock before me, shook his palsied old white head feebly at sight of the few grains of gold there, and muttering something about 'striking it rich by and by,' took up his pan and tottered on up to his

HON. JOHN S. TOOKER, of Helena, Montana, is a native of the State of New York, born in Seneca county, January 7, 1835.

Mr. Tooker descended from the English and Dutch, his ancestors being among the earliest settlers of America. His father, Rev. Elifit Tooker, a Baptist minister, was born in Rhode Island; his mother, whose maiden name was Sarah Smith, was a native of Seneca county, New York, a descendant of one of the early Dutch families that settled in that State. They had a family of ten children, of whom only four are now living. The mother passed away in 1840, and the father survived her until 1853.

John S. Tooker, being left an orphan at an early age, was reared from his fifth year by his brothers. They removed to Lansing, Michigan, when the capital was located there, and at that place the subject of our sketch received his early training and served an apprenticeship in a foundry and machine shop. He grew up with the city and became one of her most successful manufacturers.

In 1856 he reached his majority, and, being a lover of liberty and a hater of oppression, and believing that human slavery was a great stain on the Republic, he espoused the cause of the Free-soil party, and cast his first presidential vote for General John C. Fremont. Although he was sneered at for supporting Fremont, young Tooker had the courage to stand by his convictions. When the Republican party was founded, he became prominent in that movement and aided in its organization. When Fort Sumter was fired upon his patriotism was roused to a high pitch, but his business relations prevented, as he thought, his participation in the war. The following year, however, the country's need became so great that he entered into an engagement with his partners, promising to pay them $5 a day while he was absent, and in October, 1862, we find his name enrolled among the list of volunteers. He went out as a member of Company G, Sixth Michigan Cavalry, having entered the service as a private. He was soon afterward made Orderly Sergeant. With his regiment he followed the fortunes of the war for a year and nine months, fighting with all his might in the same line he had voted. His horse falling when he was on it, resulted in a severe sprain which disabled him from active duty, and his brave career was ended by his honorable discharge in March, 1864. He returned to Lansing, Michigan, and as soon as he had sufficiently recovered he resumed business. His business grew to large proportions and ere long he became one of the most prominent men in the city. Three times he was elected Mayor of Lansing. He was also chosen to represent in the State Senate the counties of Clinton and Ingham. While serving his constituents in this latter capacity he was made chairman of the Committee on Railroads, and was the introducer of the bill for the new State Asylum, besides making himself efficient and active in all the measures intended to benefit his State. In 1883 he was appointed by President Arthur to the position of Secretary of the Territory of Montana, and accordingly came direct to Helena to enter upon the duties of his office. During his term he was also for a part of the time acting Governor. When Mr. Cleveland was elected, Mr. Tooker resigned his office to give place to the party in power.

Upon first coming to Montana, Mr. Tooker interested himself considerably in mines and mining, with varied success, and has still valuable mining property. He is now Clerk and Recorder of Lewis and Clarke county, to which position he has been elected three times in succession. All the business of the county goes through his office and has his best attention.

October 5, 1858, Mr. Tooker married Miss Emma L. Hayes, a native of Farmington, Michigan, a daughter of Dr. W. H. Hayes. Her father is one of the prominent men of Michigan, being now a resident of Lansing. He is a Methodist minister, an ex-Mayor of Lansing, and has served as a member of the State Legislature. Mrs. Tooker died in 1869, leaving an only son, Clyde J., now a business man of Montana. In 1873 Mr. Tooker married, at Lansing, Miss Agnes Edwards, a native of Fort Plain, New York, and a daughter of C. T. Edwards, a well-known citizen of Lansing.

Mr. Tooker has long been a member of the Masonic fraternity, and since 1862 has been a Knight Templar. He is also a member of the G. A. R. Mr. Tooker is eminently a self-made man. His early educational advantages were limited, but such were his natural endowments that he became thoroughly informed on all general topics and has filled positions of great responsibility in a manner alike creditable to himself and to his constituents. And he has always been actuated by a high moral standard and a deep sense of what is just. Those who know him best appreciate him most highly.

old cabin, which, like himself, seemed sinking down very close to the bosom of our common mother.

"The transition from placer or surface mining in California to tunnel underground mining was a slow but very serious matter. No more warm, sweet sunlight for the strong brave man toiling his solid sixteen hours daily for his loved ones far away in the east. No more fervid skies for him forever, no more green trees moving in the wind on the steep hills above. No more birds, butterflies, lilies, buttercups; no more life, no more light, nothing—nothing at all now but the damp, dark, dismal, dripping mine with its creaking engines, crumbling walls, crashing timbers, disasters, death! And even hydraulic

ALBERT S. HOVEY, United States Deputy Mineral Surveyor for the States of Montana and Idaho, was born in Perry, Ohio, September 8, 1850, and resided there during the earlier years of his life. He received his education in the common schools of Ohio and Michigan, graduating at Willoughby College, where he took the classical course, and afterward attending the University of Michigan, taking a special course in civil engineering. He began work as deputy county surveyor at Cleveland, Ohio, under C. H. Burgess, and then became Assistant United States Surveyor and Inspector, under Major John M. Wilson, on harbor work and inspector of harbor improvements. He afterward made a complete survey of all that part of the Ohio canal bed which is within the Cleveland city limits for the Valley Railroad.

Mr. Hovey came to Montana July 3, 1882, where he became chief mineral clerk in the Surveyor General's office in Helena, under General Harris and afterward under General Green, and afterward formed a partnership with A. E. Cumming and opened an office as general civil and mining engineers. In 1891 he engaged in partnership with Paul S. A. Bickel, in the same line of business. The firm have their principal office in Helena, their field of operations extending throughout Montana and Idaho, Mr. Hovey being Deputy United States Mineral Surveyor for both States. He is an active member of the Montana Society of Civil Engineers and is treasurer of the organization.

GEORGE E. HOWE, the Silver Bow County Surveyor, was born in Dover, Massachusetts, May 9, 1845, of English ancestry who for many generations have resided in America. His grandfather, Eli Howe, was a farmer in the State of Maine, reared a numerous family, was a Universalist in his religion and lived to the age of eighty-nine years. His father, Alonzo Howe, was born in Maine, in 1805, married Miss Nancy Andrews, a native of his own State and the daughter of William Andrews. He also was a farmer, and he and his family were Universalists. After their marriage they continued to reside in Massachusetts and later in Maine. Mr. Howe was a carpenter and cabinet-maker. He and his wife lived to an advanced age, rearing nine children, of whom six are living.

George E., the eldest of the children, was educated at the Hebron Academy in Maine, and was seventeen years of age when the great civil war began. At the first he was restrained from enlisting, but in September, 1862, he enrolled himself as a soldier in the service of his country, namely, in Company B, Twenty-third Maine Volunteer Infantry. For the first nine months he served in the Army of the Potomac in the defense about Washington. As his term expired he re-enlisted, this time in the Seventh Maine Battery, and served in the Ninth Army Corps, in the Army of the Potomac, and participated in engagements from the battle of the Wilderness to those around Petersburg. Being then taken sick, he was sent to the hospital, and when convalescing he was placed on detached duty at Alexandria, and finally witnessed the grand review of the grand, victorious army of the republic at Washington. Honorably discharged, he returned to his home at Bethel, Maine, where he attended school two years.

Going to Illinois, he was chief engineer of the Indianapolis, Bloomington & Western Railroad for seven years. Next he went to Kansas as chief engineer of the Fort Scott & Wichita Railroad. After this he went to Missouri, where for four years he was in charge of railroad work on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy lines, and two years on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad. Going to New York he surveyed a line from Fort Chester to New York city,—a line, however, that was never built. Next he had charge of the construction of the iron bridge across the Monongahela river at Pittsburg.

In February, 1891, he came to Butte City and was engaged in surveying railroad lands and also in general surveying. In the campaign of 1892 he was elected, on the Populist ticket, County Surveyor for Silver Bow county, in which position he is now serving. Mr. Howe has been a Republican up to 1891, when, seeing the radical changes needed in the affairs of the country which he had no hopes of seeing made by that party, he had the manhood to go with the party that most nearly accorded with his political ideas.

Mr. Howe is a member of the Masonic fraternity, has taken all the York rite degrees and fourteen of the Scottish rite. He is now secretary of the Populist State Central Committee. Both himself and wife are active members of the Christian Church, where he is Superintendent of the Sunday-school and a Deacon of the church. Mr. Howe, being a man of superior intelligence and a spirit of independence, thinks for himself and has therefore a principle for all his conduct, which is honorable and challenges the respect of all parties excepting the most vicious.

mining, a sort of a half-way line between these two, was very perilous. But these bold and enduring men had come to California for a purpose, and when the gold had gone from the surface of the earth and down beyond the reach of the great hydraulics to some extent, they did not hesitate for a single day to follow it down, down, down to where the heat is so considerable to-day in some places that even the miner can hardly endure to lay his hand upon the rocky floors and walls of his sombre world. Of the thousands and tens of thousands who thus boldly descended into the earth, how few now survive! Only a solitary man in each ten thousand I should say ever came up and back to the world with the coveted gold on his broad shoulders. When you look you find such types of physical and mental strength as John Mckay, Senator Hearst, Senator Stewart, Senator Jones, all old miners who have come back to us up out of the earth,

JOSEPH C. TEMPLETON, B. S., Professor of Science and Mathematics in Montana University, is a native of the State of Missouri, his birth occurring May 6, 1858.

Professor Templeton is of Scotch descent. As early as 1730 some of his ancestors emigrated from Scotland to this country and settled in Pennsylvania and South Carolina, being among the first settlers of the latter State. They were prominently identified with the early history of the Colonies and were participants in the Revolution and also in the war of 1812. In the latter war our subject's grandfather was wounded. His father, John Wesley Templeton, was born in North Carolina in February, 1820; and his mother, whose maiden name was Mary Frances Crittenden, was a native of Virginia, her grandfather, Pryor Crittenden, having been a Revolutionary soldier. The Crittendens were of English origin, but came from the north of Ireland to Virginia at an early date. Professor Templeton's father was by occupation a farmer and merchant, and his life was one that was in every way above reproach. Both he and his wife were earnest Christians and were devoted members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to which church the Templetons have belonged for many years. He died in 1889, in his sixty-ninth year; his wife in 1892, in her sixty-fifth year. Their family was composed of three daughters and two sons, the son Joseph C. being the third born.

In the academy at Elkton, Kentucky, Professor Templeton received his early education. He began teaching in the country schools in 1876, and taught school and went to school alternately for several years. Then he entered the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio, where he graduated in 1885 with the degree of B. S. After his graduation he accepted the position of assistant teacher of mathematics in Glasgow Normal College, Kentucky, and soon was promoted to teach the class of higher mathematics. He continued thus occupied for two years and a half. Then he resigned his position there in order to come to Montana and take charge of the Miles City public schools. He was at the head of the public schools in Miles City from January, 1888, until 1890, at which time he came to Helena to take the Professorship of Natural Science and Higher Mathematics in the Montana University, which was then just starting. He and Mrs. Cummins, also a professor of the university, now have the entire management of the inside work of the school.

From the time of teaching his first school when a boy up to the present time, Professor Templeton has been constantly studying or teaching. As the years passed by and he graduated in the National Normal University, one of the greatest educational institutions in the country, he became an enthusiast in his profession and has not been satisfied with anything less than the best methods of teaching, to which he has given so much study. For several years he has been a very efficient worker in teachers' institutes and has been highly complimented for his enthusiastic efforts in this line. A prominent educator said of him: "Professor Templeton is fully abreast with the current of educational thought. He is a gentleman, a scholar and a Christian, and, what is no less to the point in his relations with his fellow man, he so impresses all with whom he comes in contact. As a gentleman, he is courteous, discreet, refined, tactful; as a scholar, thorough, progressive, cultured, enthusiastic; as a Christian, earnest, consistent, manly." The above, coming from one who is thoroughly acquainted with the Professor and who is a close observer, serves as a most excellent index to his character and stamps him as a man most eminently fitted for the high profession which he has chosen for his life work. Professor Templeton has been very successful in the lecture field. Among his popular lectures are the following: "Social Fog and Sunshine," "Victor Hugo," "Thomas Carlisle," "Lord Tennyson."

In 1886 Professor Templeton married Miss Margaret Enlow, a native of Bridgeport, Ohio, and a daughter of John Enlow, a merchant of Bridgeport. They have three children, Eugene, Joseph Tower and Ruric Ruskin.

Professor Templeton is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and is, in politics, a Prohibitionist. He has made some speeches in favor of the principles of his party, and was its candidate for Lieutenant Governor of the State of Montana. It was, however, reluctantly that he accepted the nomination, as he was opposed to having a State ticket and did not canvass the State, but is a thorough temperance man and would do anything to aid in successfully wiping out the great evil. Since coming to Montana he has made some inves ments in mines.

our old men now. Look upon them with your hat in your hand. They are our heroes, our very few survivors; they and a gray old comrade here and there along the foothills of the Sierras, or blown at rare intervals up and down the world, are all that is left to all now of our sixty times six hundred who descended into the earth a quarter of a century ago and battled there for years.

"My own experience in the underground world of California was brief and bitter; so bitter that reason was almost overthrown, and I dwell upon it now only with pain and terror.

"In the winter of 1854 I was employed to push a tub along a wooded track underground. It was a new tunnel; everything about it new, experimental. The mouth of the low, narrow tunnel opened out toward the sun and the swift, clear Klamath river. I was employed because I was so small. The two men worked on their knees and breasts. On the fifth day the hillside slid in and one of the men was crushed. The

GEO. L. TRACY, a representative Helena business man, was born in Utica, New York, in 1844. He is a descendant of the Norwich, Connecticut, family of Tracys. They came West in 1855, and he secured his business education in Chicago, first in the old house of H. W. Hinsdale & Company, and later was with Reid, Murdoch & Fischer. For twenty-eight years he was a commercial traveler.

In 1879 Mr. Tracy came to Montana as a pioneer representative of a Chicago house, and for nine years traveled through Montana and other portions of the Northwest and became thoroughly acquainted with every business house of any note throughout this part of the country. In 1887 he established his present business at Helena. Since that date he has handled all kinds of groceries at wholesale direct from the manufacturers, importers and packers to his customers in Montana, Idaho and eastern Washington. He has offices in Helena, Butte and Spokane, in charge of competent salesmen, and covers the whole country by traveling men. From the start his business has been a success. He is widely and favorably known throughout the States mentioned and has by the most honorable business methods secured the good will of the people with whom he has so long dealt.

Mr. Tracy is a thorough business man, a courteous and agreeable gentleman, and is a Knight Templar and Thirty-second Degree Scottish Rite Mason.

THOMAS E. CRUTCHER, an attorney of Helena, is a native of Kentucky, born February 22, 1839, in Hardin county. His ancestors emigrated from Wales to the colony of Virginia in the seventeenth century. James Crutcher, the great-grandfather of the subject of our sketch, emigrated from Virginia to Kentucky shortly after the close of the Revolutionary war, two of his sons, Anthony and John, having fought in that war. John, the younger of the two, lived to the age of ninety-one, and is well remembered by our subject. Isaac, one of the younger sons of James Crutcher and the grandfather of Thomas E., was born in Kentucky, as was also his son, Burr H., the father of Thomas E. His mother, whose name before marriage was Hester Brandenburg, was a descendant of the noble family of that name in Germany. Her ancestors were also early settlers in Virginia, whence the family removed to Kentucky. The subject of our sketch was the sixth of eleven children born to Burr H. Crutcher and Hester, nee Brandenburg, his wife, only five of whom are now living. His mother died in the fall of 1887, aged seventy-nine years. His father is still living, at the age of eighty-nine.

Our subject was reared to manhood in his native State, prepared for college under a private tutor, and graduated at Centre College in his native State, in the class of 1861, just at the breaking out of the great civil war. His sympathies from the beginning were strongly with the South, but out of deference to the wishes of his father, who was an intense Unionist, he refrained from taking part in the struggle until 1864, becoming a member of Cowan's Mississippi battery, and giving his support to the Southern cause until the conflict was ended. Among the engagements in which he participated were those of Franklin and Nashville, escaping without a wound.

After the war he resumed the study of law, which he had begun previous to his enlistment in the army, and in 1867 was admitted to the bar, having been pardoned by President Andrew Johnson in 1866, and restored to all civil and political rights. He began his professional career in Kentucky, practicing at Owensboro in that State, and while there was elected City Attorney of Owensboro, in which capacity he served two years. He resigned his position there and removed to Vicksburg, Mississippi, in 1873, at which place he was married to Miss Alice O. Balfour, a direct descendant of Col. Felix Oswald of Revolutionary fame. He acquired a lucrative practice in Vicksburg, taking but little part in politics, though he was elected a delegate to the national Democratic convention which met in St. Louis in 1888. His health failing him in Mississippi, he removed to Helena in 1889, arriving here during the time the constitutional convention was in session, where he has since continued his practice.

In 1893 he was elected Judge of the Police Court of the city of Helena. He is a member of Knights of Pythias and Elks and several other benefit societies. While at Vicksburg he served as Vestryman for several years of the Episcopal Church, and is a member of that church in Helena.

water came in. My head was caught up between two timbers, lifting my face above the water. I could hear the man groaning, till the water reached where he lay—then was the end. But as one of the men was out of the tunnel getting timbers and I happened to be near the mouth of the tunnel with my tub at the time of the slide, I was dug out by the man who escaped on the same day. I set this down as one example in a thousand that almost any surviving miner might narrate from his underground life in California. But it was from these small beginnings that the great hydraulics, tunnels, drifts, shifts, and underground cities of California and Nevada grew. It is some comfort however to know that experience and improved machinery

EDWARD WONES KNIGHT, second vice-president of the First National Bank of Helena, and one of the representative business men of this city, was born in Madison county, Indiana, May 21, 1838, a lineal descendant of James Knight, who landed at Plymouth in the Mayflower. The Knights were among the early settlers of Frederick and Baltimore, Maryland, and Mr. Knight's branch of the family later became settlers in Kentucky, Mississippi and Indiana. Among them were men of integrity and worth who were connected with all the early history of the country. Mr. Knight's father, Henry William Knight, was born in Brookville, Indiana, in 1812; was married in 1834 to Miss Mary E. Martin, a native of Lawrenceburg, Indiana, born in 1818. They became the parents of six children, Edward W. being the second child and oldest son. The mother died in her thirty-second year, and the father lived to be sixty-two. Both were worthy members of the Presbyterian Church, and for many years he carried on a hardware and tin business.

During the early boyhood days of Edward W. Knight his parents resided in Louisville, Kentucky, where he received his academic education, and where he was for a time employed as bookkeeper in a bank. Later, having inherited from his mother several thousand acres of land in Virginia and Kentucky, the care and disposal of this property led him into a study of law, particularly in land cases. He was for two years engaged in making disposition of this property, and in the meantime he read law under the instructions of Judge Hauser, of Kentucky. After this he continued his studies under a Scotch barrister and banker, and became interested in the purchase of a large quantity of school land in Wisconsin. In 1858 he began a regular law course at Louisville, Kentucky, and after completing it he entered upon the practice of his profession.

In 1859 Mr. Knight was married at Falmouth, Kentucky, to Miss Theodosia Hauser, a native of that place and daughter of Hon. Samuel T. Hauser. For a time after their marriage he resided on a farm near the city, and practiced law in that circuit. Later he became interested in the organization of the First National Bank of Helena, and in 1873 he came to Helena to aid in its management. Up to 1876 he served in the capacity of bookkeeper and assistant teller, and from 1876 up to the present time he has filled the position of cashier in the institution. While residing at Falmouth he served two terms as Mayor of the city. Upon his arrival in Montana he at once became identified with her growth and development and has embraced every opportunity offered to that end. While so doing he has acquired a very wide and favorable acquaintance, his reputation extending throughout the whole State. He has the honor of having been the second Mayor of Helena. He has been for many years a member of the Board of Education, and while acting in that capacity has had much to do with shaping the educational affairs of the city, the educational standard and advantages of Helena being equal to any of the Western cities. He helped to organize the first electric-light company, of which he was elected president, and he also aided in the organization of the Board of Trade. He is now a stockholder in the present electric light and gas company in the city.

Politically, Mr. Knight has affiliated with the Democratic party all his life. He is not, however, an active politician, and has never been an office-seeker, but was in 1893 one of the Commissioners of Lewis and Clarke county, and is chairman of the board. Both he and his wife have long been prominent members of the Presbyterian Church, he having served the church in various official capacities as well as having been for ten or twelve years the efficient Sabbath-school superintendent. He was made a Master Mason about the time he reached his majority and has been an enthusiastic Mason ever since, giving much of his time and attention to the order. He has advanced in its mysteries until he is now a Knight Templar in the York rite and has attained the thirty-second degree in the Scottish rite. He is Past Eminent Commander of Sir Knight Templars. He is also a Noble of the Mystic Shrine, a member of the Benevolent Order of Elks and the K. of P.

Mr. and Mrs. Knight have had eight children, of whom five are living, namely: Edward W., Jr., a graduate of Booneville College, Missouri, and now occupying the position of receiving teller in the First National Bank of Helena; T. H., a business man of Helena; Stella, wife of Herbert Nickerson, a business man of Helena; Henry W., a student in the Military Academy of Missouri; and Barbara P., a member of the home circle. They occupy one of the most delightful homes in the beautiful city in which they live.

Such is a sketch of the life of one of Helena's representative business men, and although brief and imperfect it serves as an index to his active and useful career.

have combined to make underground work far less perilous than of old.

"There are several mining camps in the Sierras that claim the distinction of having had the first great tunnel. But no man can say certainly where and when we first went 'underground. My recollection is that Grass Valley and the beautiful environs of Nevada City saw the miners first descend into the earth in any considerable bodies. And as this fine region was about the first to open the doors of the under world and burst the rich coffers that had lain hidden there ever since the finger of God set them down on the day of creation, so it promises to be among the last to show any signs of decay. Indeed so far from declining in any way this place is walking

HON. ROBERT C. WALLACE, who has long been identified with Helena and who is ranked with her successful business men, was born Ayrshire, Scotland, February 26, 1837, a descendant of Lowland Scotch Presbyterian ancestors.

His parents, John and Agnes (Craig) Wallace, continued to reside in Scotland until 1844, when they emigrated with their family of six children to America, and settled in Detroit, Michigan. In Detroit John Wallace, a physician, practiced his profession until 1863, when he removed to Berlin, that State. At the latter place he still resides, having attained the ripe old age of ninety-one years. His wife died in 1858, at the age of fifty-four.

Robert C. Wallace was seven years old when his parents located in Detroit. In the public schools of that city he received his education and after leaving school was employed as clerk in the store of G. & R. McMillan, of Detroit, with whom he remained seven years. After that he spent five years in the employ of H. H. & R. F. Wright. In the summer of 1860, in company with one of his brothers, he opened a grocery in Detroit. But about this time the trouble between North and South arose, Fort Sumter was fired upon, and a call was made for volunteers to protect the old flag. He enlisted in the First Michigan Volunteer Infantry for a term of three months, and at the expiration of that time returned to his home and resumed business; but in 1862, when the call for soldiers became urgent, he again enlisted, this time in the Fifth Michigan Cavalry, with which he served until the close of the war. He participated in many of the battles of the Army of the Potomac, and on one occasion, in the spring of 1863, at a skirmish at Hawkhurst Mills, he was taken prisoner, was exchanged that summer and rejoined his regiment. He entered the ranks as a private, and for meritorious service was repeatedly promoted, coming out of the army with the commission of Major.

The war over, Mr. Wallace secured a position as traveling salesman for a wholesale tobacco house, but remained with that firm only a short time. Then he accepted a clerkship on the steamers running between Detroit and Lake Superior, the Dubuque and Ontonagon. He was thus occupied until the spring of 1869, when he decided to seek his fortune in the West. He accordingly came to Helena. Here he was successively engaged in mining, farming and clerking. While employed in the latter capacity he saved his wages, and in the spring of 1871 started a small business of his own. In 1873 he formed a partnership with James L. Davis, which partnership continued for a period of ten years, when Mr. Wallace purchased the interest of Mr. Davis, and from that time up to the present has conducted the business in his own name. Prosperity has attended him on every hand. Not only in his grocery business has he been successful, but also in his investments in mines and real estate. He owns both city and ranch property, among the former being the attractive residence which he and his family occupy and which was built by him.

Mr. Wallace has always been affiliated with the Republican party. When Helena was incorporated he had the honor of being elected as her first City Treasurer. In 1883 he was elected to the Territorial Legislature, and served in that capacity. He was also elected Alderman of Helena, which office, however, he resigned in order to give his undivided attention to his own personal affairs. He was made a Mason in Detroit in 1864. Also he belongs to the A. O. U. W., G. A. R., Loyal Legion, and Caledonia Club of Helena.

In 1875 he married Miss Ellen M. Shaw, a native of Michigan and a daughter of F. B. Shaw. She died in 1890, leaving two children, a son and daughter, David R. and Margurette.

In his business life Mr. Wallace has met with satisfactory success. As a business man, a soldier and a citizen, his whole career has been characterized by the strictest fidelity, and to-day he is ranked with the leading men of Helena.

HON. HENRY M. PARCHEN, who is noted as one of Helena's most liberal and enterprising business men, is a native of Prussia, born June 13, 1839. His parents were George and Mary Parchen. They were members of the Lutheran Church, and both Mr. Parchen's father and grandfather followed the occupation of miller and were mill owners.

In 1848 Mr. Parchen's father and mother and their four children emigrated to America, and upon their arrival here they settled at Town Line, New York, fifteen miles east of the city of Buffalo. They continued to reside there until 1861, when they removed to Nebraska and purchased a farm, and upon this farm the elder Mr. Parchen still resides, now in his eighty-eighth year. All his children are still living.

The subject of our sketch was the youngest child in his father's family. He remained at home until he was right along in the line, and almost if not quite at the head of California progress and improvement.

"But what mutations this place has seen, to be sure! There was a world of wild flowers, birds in abundance, glorious oak trees, grass. Then the placer miner came, washing up the buttercups by the roots, soiling cool, clear trout streams. The fishes turned on their sides and died. The oak trees fell in a single season. The birds disappeared. For the first year after the pickax struck in the grass roots of this region you would have said, "A cyclone has struck California!"

"Then a woman came; then the baby; then a neat little cottage blossomed on the hillside, with some morning-glories growing about the door; then another woman came, and this one fourteen, and up to that time his education was limited to the common schools. After he started out to do for himself he took a thorough course in a Bryant & Stratton business college, and after completing his course was employed as clerk in a general merchandise store in Buffalo. In 1857 he went to Marshall county, Indiana, and accepted a position as bookkeeper for a mercantile and manufacturing company. In 1862 we find him in Colorado, serving as bookkeeper at the Planter's House in Denver. The following spring he became the lessee of the Massasoit House at Central City, Colorado, and for some time was engaged in the hotel business. On account of failing health, he sought a change of climate and occupation, and we next find him with the mercantile firm of Erfurt, Busch & Co., of Virginia City, Montana, where he filled the position of book keeper until the spring of 1865. At that time, in company with Dr. Wernigk and Louis Keysser, he opened a drug and grocery store in Helena, and in the fall of that same year he bought out the interests of his partners, and took W. S. Paynter into business with him. The firm of Parchen & Paynter did an extensive and successful business. In 1868 they disposed of the grocery department, and for nine years longer did a wholesale and retail drug business, and while their business operations were growing and profitable they met with heavy losses by fire both in 1869 and in 1874. In the meantime they had established a branch store at Deer Lodge City, and this branch of business was also destroyed by fire. These losses were most discouraging to them, but Mr. Parchen undauntedly decided to continue business, and in 1874 purchased his partner's interest, and continued the establishment alone under name of H. M. Parchen & Co. Under his able management the business prospered until it became the leading wholesale and retail drug house in the State of Montana.

Mr. Parchen took a prominent part in the construction of three of the Northern Pacific branch roads from Helena. He is a director and a large stockholder in the Helena Gas Company, the Helena Electric Company, and the Helena Electric Railway Company. He is also largely interested in mines and smelting works, and has by persistent business industry acquired a large fortune, to which he is most richly entitled.

From the time of his settlement in Helena Mr. Parchen became interested in and identified with all the interests of the city and State, and has founded with his money and influence many enterprises intended to promote the growth and development of this section of the country. Thus he has acquired the name of being one of Montana's most liberal and enterprising citizens. Mr. Parchen was one of the organizers of the Helena Board of Trade, of which he had the honor of being the first president, and of which he has since served as president. He began life as a Democrat, and in 1860 voted for Hon. Stephen A. Douglas for President of the United States; but after Mr. Lincoln was elected and the great Rebellion was inaugurated he joined the ranks of the Republican party, the principles of which he has since endorsed. Notwithstanding the great demands of his business on his time, he has served in several important positions. For three years he was one of the County Commissioners of Lewis and Clarke county. He was also elected to and served as a member of the Twelfth Session of the Territorial Legislature. Mr. Parchen has also given a portion of his time to sociality, and has long been prominently connected with the Masonic fraternity, both York and Scottish rites. He has been Grand Treasurer of the Grand Lodge of the State for twenty-three years, has held the highest offices in all the branches of the order except the Chapter

JOHN POTTER, to whom belongs the distinction of being the first Postmaster of Helena, and who is now (1893) one of her most respected citizens, is a native of the State of Maine. He was born in Somerset county, that State, February, 17, 1834, a descendant of English ancestors who settled in New England long before the Revolution.

Joseph Potter, his father, was born in Reidville, Maine, in 1798, son of William Potter, who was also a native of the Pine Tree State. Joseph Potter married Ellen Wheeler, also a native of Maine and of English extraction, and they reared a family of eight sons and three daughters. Eight of this number are still living. Indeed, the family have been noted for longevity. The father reached the advanced age of ninety-two years, and the mother was seventy-two at the time of her death. The latter was a member of the Congregational Church.

John Potter was the ninth born in the above family. He was reared to manhood in the town of Athens, in which he had been born. He finished his education in the Somerset Academy, and after completing his course there was engaged in teaching school for four or five years. In 1855 he sought a new field of operation in the western part of Minnesota, which at that time was on planted a rose-bush. The next year a man from New York planted some fruit trees; the second year they bloomed and actually bore fruit; then the birds came back. The miners had now disappeared underground. The plow turned the soil above their heads and cows stood ruminating under the few remaining oaks. And now, when looking over this fair land only last month for the purpose of making these sketches, it was almost impossible to distinguish this portion of California from the richest and oldest hill regions of Pennsylvania. And singular as it may seem to the stranger, I must set down the fact that the largest and most heavily-laden orange tree I have seen this side of Sorrento on the bay of Naples, is to be found in these same foothills the frontier. After clerking in a hardware store for a while, he engaged in the lumber business on his own account, cutting logs and rafting them down the Mississippi and other rivers. Also while there he took claim to a tract of land and platted the town of Osakis, named after a lake near it. This place has grown to be a town of about 2,000 inhabitants.

In 1862 we find Mr. Potter en route across the plains for Montana, the journey being made by way of the Red river to Fort Benton, in company with a party of fifty-two men. Although they had some trouble with the Indians, they reached their destination in safety, landing at Deer Lodge in August. Gold had just been discovered, and they camped there. Mr. Potter mined for three years at Bannack and Alder Gulch (now Virginia City). He and three others, Charles Wyman, Washington Wyman and Joseph Bowers, camped and mined together, were very successful in their mining, and often took out $300 per day; but like nearly all miners they invested in other mines, hoping for big returns but instead losing all they had.

August 29, 1865, Mr. Potter was appointed as first Postmaster of Helena, and two years later received the second appointment, the latter being from President Andrew Johnson. Previous to the establishment of the postoffice at Helena, the mail was brought by express at the rate of $1 per letter. As soon as the Helena office was opened it at once did a large business, people coming to this point from a radius of 150 miles to receive their mail. Often after the arrival of the mail 200 men could be seen standing in line, each waiting his turn at the delivery. Often some one would pay an other $1 for his chance. Stamps were paid for in gold dust, one grain of gold for a three-cent stamp. In two years and a half the office became one of the first class. It was then located on Main street, two doors north of the present store of Gans & Klein, and was in a two story frame building, 22 x 60 feet. Mr. Potter had a bedroom in the back part of the office, where he slept, and the upper story was used for a courtroom and was occupied by the district Judge and his clerk. The Helena postoffice was the second one established in Montana. Mr. Potter continued as postmaster for about five years, his successor being Mr. Crounse.

In 1864 Mr. Potter had been appointed Justice of the Peace by Governor Lyon. Subsequently he was appointed United States Court Commissioner for Madison county by Governor Edgerton. In the meantime he had given his attention to the study of law, and in 1872 he was admitted to the bar. In 1873 he removed to Gallatin county, and at Hamilton engaged in the general merchandise business, under the firm name of Potter & Small. Shortly after they established themselves in business Mr. Small died, and from that time up to 1891 Mr. Potter continued alone. Then, after a successful career, he retired from active business.

During nearly the whole of his history in Montana Mr. Potter has been more or less interested in mines and mining. He is now one of the owners of the Whitelatch, a good gold mine, and of the Iron Mountain, a valuable silver claim. He was one of the owners and developers of the Potter & Cockrell mine. During his early life in Montana he was a member of the Vigilant Committee, and as such rendered efficient aid in helping to put a stop to the lawlessness and crime throughout the various mining camps.

April 21, 1869, he was married in Helena to Miss Sarah Elizabeth Small, a native of Holton, Maine. They have had six children, three of whom died in infancy, the others being as follows: Melville Mortimer, now engaged in the mail service between Helena and Butte City; and Clarence and Elma, who are at home.

Mr. Potter has long been identified with the Republican party and also with the Masonic fraternity. He was one of the organizers of Morning Star Lodge, A. F. & A. M., of Helena, and was Deputy Grand Master of the Territory for three terms. He is now a Knight Templar. Mr. Potter built a residence on Rodney street, Helena, in 1868, and since then has from time to time made other investments in real estate in this city. He is a fair representative of the Montana pioneers. During his long and useful career here he has won the respect and esteem of hosts of friends.

THE NEW YORK DRY GOODS COMPANY, one of Helena's leading mercantile firms, had its origin in Minneapolis in 1884, founded there by the same gentlemen that now compose it. After three years of successful business in Minneapolis, believing that the city of Helena and the State of Montana offered a better field for their enterprise, they, in 1887, came to this city and opened the business on the corner of Main and State streets, where for six years they have been doing a successful and constantly increasing business. Their present accommodations proving insufficient for the increasing demands of their trade, they are now (1893) about to remove into their commodious new quarters, Nos. 48, 50 and 52 South Main street, one of the of the Sierras, not very far from the once flourishing mining town of Oroville. It grows on an old mining claim.

"Auburn is another mountain town that has more than held its own in the swift mutations of time in California. I recall this wooded and watered spot as a place of 'flumes.' Whatever Auburn may have seemed to others in the early days, I can think of it only as a place where flume on top of flume encircled the pine-set hills from base to summit. Many of these flumes carried water to the rich gravel 'claims' that lay in and about Auburn. The larger number however were long deep 'sluices' or flumes for conveying dirt, gravel, débris and so on from the gravel claims down to the great valley be-best locations in the city, where they will have the largest wholesale and retail establishment in Montana. In 1890 the firm incorporated under its present title, The New York Dry Goods Company, with the following officers: Henry Loble, president; Robert Heller, vice-president; H. Flegelman, secretary and treasurer; and George Frankford, manager. All of these gentlemen are full of business enterprise and push, all having been reared from childhood in the dry-goods business.

Mr. Loble, the president of the company, was born in Hungary in 1860, and was reared and educated there. In 1882 he came to the United States to live and do business under our free institutions, and has become thoroughly identified with the country of his adoption. For a year and a half he was in business in New York city, learning the values of goods from the manufacturers and large jobbing houses, and becoming acquainted with American methods of business. He then went to Minneapolis and entered the firm with which he has since been connected. In 1891 he was married to Miss Hattie Marks, a native of Diamond City, Montana. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., F. & A. M., the A. O. U. W., and several benevolent societies.

Robert Heller, vice-president of the above named company, dates his birth in Austria, in 1860. He came to America in 1881, and was in business in Milwaukee and St. Paul until he became a member of the present firm in Minneapolis. He was married in 1889, to Miss Antonette Greenbery, a native of Roumania. Mr. Heller is very much devoted to his business, and as yet has found little time for social affairs. He is, however, a member of the American Legion of Honor.

Herman Flegelman, secretary and treasurer of the firm, is a native of Roumania, his birth occurring in 1861. It was in 1882 that he severed home ties and came to America, believing this to be the best place in which to enter upon a business career. He has been with his firm since its organization in Minneapolis. Mr. Flegelman was married and has two children, his wife being deceased.

George Frankford came West in 1864, and since that date has been engaged in merchandising most of the time in Colorado, Wyoming and Montana. In 1886 he became connected with the firm of which he is now manager. He is a man of fine personal appearance, is thoroughly posted on what constitutes a successful business man, and thinks more of making and keeping a customer than he does of making a sale, and since he has been a resident of Helena he has made many warm friends here.

All the members of the firm are men of the highest probity, devoted to their business, pulling together for the success of the firm, and are justly entitled to the large volume of business they have acquired. They have a mail order department, receive orders from Montana and adjoining States, and in this line also are doing an extensive business.

ERNEST SPRUILLE BRADEN, Helena, Montana.—The subject of this sketch was born in Indianapolis, Indiana, April 3, 1860, and was the eldest child of William and Martha B. Braden, nee Burford. His great-grandfather Braden was a native of Ireland, who became a resident of Pennsylvania, where the father was born in 1821. His mother was a native Kentuckian, and a descendant of the old Virginia and English family of Ruckers. Mr. William Braden was in the blank book and publishing business in Indianapolis from 1844 until his death in 1880.

Spruille attended the public schools in Indianapolis until 1875, when he went to England, and aboard H. M. S. Worcester, where he was known among the other cadets as "the American." Her Majesty's Ship Worcester, an old four-decker, was the man-of-war Frederick William, that went into the fight at Trafalgar bay under Nelson. The vessel is now used as a school ship for the education of young men for the mercantile marine. The government is quick to foster any plan that may help her commercial projects on the seas, so the Worcester was placed under government control. She is manned by half-pay officers in the Royal Navy, and as a reward of merit the queen of England gives a gold medal to the highest pupil of each year. The medal carries with it the title of R. N. R. to Englishmen.

After the midsummer examination, the names of the six highest on the list are posted on a bulletin, then all the cadets and masters ballot for the boy entitled to the queen's gold medal. The conditions bring forward the boy calculated to make the best sailor, and who stands first best in character and studies in the estimation of his associates and teachers. The day when Braden was up for election is well remembered by all his classmates, as he received the highest number of votes ever cast, and was far and away the most popular. When the result was announced Braden was at once "hazed," an honor which was another evidence of his popularity. The whole ship-load of boys low. The hydraulic roar was here in its day, the 'dump,' 'slickings,' lawsuits; sorrow enough for the poor miner and for the poor farmer in the valley below him as well. 'Time and I against any two,' says the Spanish proverb. And lo! to-day this once tumultuous mining town of the Sierras is one of the very sweetest, rosiest, sunniest health-resorts west of the Rocky mountains.

"No traveler can afford to visit California without seeking out Placerville and Mariposa, digging down to their old life and contrasting that stormy old life with the new. And the traveler should first understand that the geological history and make-up of all this mining region from Yreka to Mariposa was as stormy and tumultuous as were the lives of those who first possessed these rugged lands. Beds of rivers, jumped upon him at once, and wrestled him around the deck for an hour, which he took with utmost good nature.

About three weeks from that time was the end of the term and prize day. Many distinguished guests were invited and were brought down the river from London in the Trinity House steamer. Among the guests were Lord Bingham, an Indian prince, the Maharajah of Jallore, and Sir Thomas Brassy, owner of the Sunbeam (anchored near). Lady Brassy took quite a fancy to the "American boy," and frequently invited him to tea on the Sunbeam. As a mark of honor the Worcester carried the American flag on this prize day at the main-mast, and two other school ships near, the Arethusa and the Chichister, followed the example of the Worcester. Admiral Rider presented the prizes, and his very beautiful daughter attached the queen's medal to Braden's breast.

Trinity House (the corporation at the head of navigation in England) gives the cadet who wins the queen's gold medal a very handsome sextant (money value £50). On steam, Braden received the first prize, which was a large mahogany case containing coal-analyzing instruments, and for "Rule of the Road," the first prize was a set of "Knight's Half-Hour Series," beautifully bound, also "honorable mention." No cadet is permitted to receive more than two first prizes in addition to the queen's medal, and the Trinity House prize which goes with the gold medal. All the officers of the Worcester were in full uniform, and every cadet wore a new uniform brilliant with gold lace. Captain Smith, the commander of the Worcester, was in the uniform of a commodore, and received the titled guests at the side of the ship. A salute was fired as the steamer came in sight up the river, and the rustics from the Kentish lowlands gathered along the shore, watching the guests transferred from their steamer to the training ship. It was a great day for America. Braden left the ship that day with a glorious start in life, and every one who knew him predicted a great career for him. The following year, when an engraver came aboard to place Braden's name on the marble tablet especially for those winning the queen's medal, the boys gathered around and shouted, "Put it Yankee Braden! put it Yankee Braden!"

He went from London the last of July, 1878, to the Paris Exposition, in company with Captain and Mrs. Smith, his mother, and brother Eugene, and then to the United States and his home in Indianapolis, where the modest "G. M. B." (Gold Medal Boy, as he was called) was given quite an ovation, having arrived home during the State Fair week, and so numerous were the calls to see the prizes, they were placed in a prominent jeweler's window. Colonel Thompson, Secretary of the Navy at that time, and from Indiana, met young Braden and expressed himself as being very much pleased with his modesty and utter lack of vanity, and made the remark, "Most boys would have their heads turned"—having so many honors and attentions heaped upon him. His success in England was much talked about in Washington, and the Indiana Senators, at Secretary Thompson's request, introduced a bill to make him an Ensign in the United States Navy. It passed the Senate promptly, but did not reach the House before adjournment of Congress. While the bill was pending Braden was appointed to a clerkship in the Navy Department. The position was unsought by Mr. Braden or his family. Mrs. Braden went to Washington and requested a withdrawal of the bill, since her son had no intention of adopting the sea, as he wished to pursue a scientific course.

Shortly after, his father died and Spruille accepted a temporary position in the Geological Survey as special agent, to gather mining statistics in California. In 1881 he matriculated at the University of Berlin, and attended the Royal School of Mines. In 1883, while spending his vacation in London, he was appointed by Clarence King, assistant superintendent of the famous silver mine at Sombrerete, in the State of Zacatecas, Mexico. The mine closing down in about a year, he returned to Washington city, and in May, 1884, was appointed by President Cleveland superintendent of the United States assay office at Boise, Idaho. In the autumn of 1884 he was transferred as superintendent of the United States assay office at Helena, Montana, which place he held until September, 1890, when he resigned and formed a partnership with his brother, Eugene, in Helena, carrying on a general mining, metallurgical and ore-sampling business, in which he was engaged at the time of his death.

On the 3d of January, 1894, he sailed on the steamer New York for England, to look after some mining interests, and to see his old friends. He and his friend, Mr. Henry Brameber, had apartments and were almost deep, wide and tortuous, heavy with nuggets of gold, were found by our miners almost on the very summits of the Sierras. Mountains turned upside down! Valleys set on edge! Rivers stood on end! Surely the Titans of old had battled here, hurling mountains and valleys in their fierce combat. The great Columbia river, which draws its waters from far toward the north pole, once emptied into the Pacific ocean through what is now called the Sacramento—at least this is the theory of observing and able engineers and miners who have, in their pursuit as gold seekers, tried to trace the dried-up and changed channels of our dead rivers. Confusion on top of confusion is what confronted the miner of California from the first. There was no order, no system, no law in the finding and following up of these old gold-bearing and dried-up riverbeds. Let us be thankful for the show of discipline and order that has at last asserted itself on the surface of the earth in the long and undulating lines of olive trees, orange trees, grapevines and orchard trees of all kinds that reach from Oroville to Placerville, and on past the gleaming constantly together. They arrived in New York on the steamer Trave, on the 10th of February. Mr. Bratnober made the remark to a mutual friend in New York, "Spruille has made the trip of his life." Certainly he was very happy after his return, over his business prospects. He stopped at the Hotel Brunswick with his mother, and spent most of the time with her, discussing what he had accomplished in London, and his plans for the near future. All his intimate friends know of his loyalty to his mother, and his unswerving confidence in her judgment. He told a friend, "I never deviated but once from my mother's advice, and I shall pay the penalty of regret, always."

On the 18th of February he went in company with Hon. T. H. Carter from New York to Washington. On the 20th he went by steamer from Washington to Virginia Beach to attend the American Institute of Mining Engineers, of which he was a member, returning to Washington Saturday morning, the 24th. Sunday, February 25, being a very stormy day, he remained at the Hotel Shoreham. Immediately before going to the home of his friend, William E. Clarke, he wrote to his mother in New York that he would be detained a few days longer in Washington, and, as it was storming furiously, wished her to send him some heavier clothing. He had been expected at the Clarkes all the afternoon, and when he rang the bell Mrs. Clarke said, "That is Spruille." He spoke cheerfully and naturally to the servant who answered the bell, at the same time vigorously shaking the snow from his clothes and stamping his feet. The moment the door was closed, before he had removed either hat or overcoat, he said, "I feel a little faint," and sat down in the hall. Mrs. Clarke heard the remark, and went immediately to him, asking, "Spruille, what is the matter?" He answered in a low and mournful voice, "Oh, I don't know; I don't know. Let me lie down; let me lie down." Mr. Clarke, after they had removed his overcoat, led him to the couch in the sitting-room, not more than twelve feet away. Mrs. Clarke asked him, "Where have you pain? What hurts you, Spruille?" and he answered not; his spirit had winged its flight!

The short career of Spruille Braden as metallurgist and mining engineer was a powerful factor in mining development in Montana, with whose prosperity his name is closely connected. No mining man in Montana was more widely or favorably known than he; and in Helena, where he was best known, he was appreciated, and his judgment on mining matters was considered reliable. As we look back over his professional career and short life of only one score of years, it seems fraught with well deserved results of diligent endeavor. There are many dreamers in the history of mining, but it is not often that a mind as alert, as ready in resources as his, had also the sensitiveness of an artist and the hardness of a materialist. He was a miner whose adaptation of old laws to new uses, and unfailing power of drawing accurate conclusions, received wide professional sanction and admiration. The rapidity of his thought in matters of great importance was phenomenal with those who came in contact with him, but there were other qualities which he could not perpetuate in his work,—certain graces of character, his generosity, his encouraging sympathy, his intuitive comprehension of motives and actions. These faculties make it impossible that those who knew him can soon forget his helpfulness.

Genius is rare, yet Helena had with her a man of genius and unbounded ambition. While the business world sought him, while men of affairs, men of years and wisdom, needed his advice, appreciating and acting upon it, it was at home that he was valued most. Here the brilliancy of his fluent talk and the wit that was quick to meet any emergency aided the music of his soul to sway the hearts of men. In addition to his musical genius he was also a linguist of great ability and conversed fluently in German, French and Spanish. He was seen from day to day in the streets, in the clubs, in the common walks of life; he was quiet and unassuming, but his voice still speaks on forever, listened to in the assemblies of the wise. To constant time we leave the filling of the measure of his praise. When his portrait is faded, and his works worn, time shall not say he was old, for his triumphs were won in youth, and youth's glory shines upon them.

"But the great, warm, rich bosom of California is torn to the heart no more now. The transition from the placer mine to the vineyard and orchard is complete. The placer mine with all its pathos has passed into history. The dark and mysterious gnomeland under the earth is narrowing year by year. Let us hope that the brave men there may come up to the light of day soon and to remain. For California has so many things better than gold. Were our mines in a land like that of Russia, life might not be so intolerable in their depths. But in a clime like this of ours, man's place is surely on the ELLA L. KNOWLES, the first woman admitted to practice law by the Supreme Court of the State of Montana, is a native of the State of New Hampshire, born at Northwood, July 31, 1860. Her ancestors emigrated from England to New England early in the settlement of this country. Several generations of the family lived in New Hampshire, among them being farmers, mechanics and professional men, and all filling their respective positions in life in a way to bring respect to their name. They settled in New Hampshire when it was a wilderness, and that part of the country in which they resided was called the "Knowles District," named in their honor. There, at the old homestead, David Knowles, her father, was born. Her mother, whose maiden name was Louisa Bigelow, was a native of Vermont, descended from a family equally early as settlers of New England. The Bigelows were Presbyterians, and the Knowles family belonged to the Baptist Church. David Knowles, now in the sixty-seventh year of his age, still resides at the old home where he was born.

Miss Knowles is an only child. As a little girl in school she was a good student, and when only fifteen years of age graduated at Northwood Seminary. Then she was for three years engaged in teaching to earn money with which to secure a higher education, and in the meantime studied Latin and Greek. She then entered Bates College, where she graduated with the class of 1884, receiving the degree of A. B. Later, after she had attained some fame, her college conferred upon her the degree of A. M.; but Miss Knowles says she prizes far more highly the degree which she secured by persistent study. She was one of the first woman graduates in that college, and had to struggle through the foolish prejudices against co-education. To her belongs the distinction of being the first girl who took a prize in debate, the first girl to take a prize for composition and oratory, and the first girl on the editorial staff of the college magazine.

After her graduation she was obliged on account of ill health to remain at home and recuperate; but during this period she was not idle, her attention being given to the study of law. From Burnham & Brown, of Manchester, New Hampshire, she procured her law books and was nominally their student. After partially recovering her health she accepted the Professorship of Rhetoric and Elocution in Western Normal College, Iowa; but, her ill health continuing, her physician advised her to make her home in a mountainous country in the West. She accordingly came to Helena and accepted a position as teacher in the Helena Central School. At the end of the year she was elected principal of the West Side School, and later resigned in order to resume the study of law. In this she met with much opposition. The idea of her becoming a lawyer seemed preposterous to her friends. They tried to ridicule her out of it. The bar, too, scoffed at the thought of a lady in court, but against all this she persisted. There was no law in Montana permitting a woman to practice in the courts, and she set herself stoutly to work to get a bill passed to that effect, which was finally accomplished in 1889. January 1, 1890, she was admitted to practice before the Supreme Court; April 18, 1890, was admitted to practice at the bar of the United States District Court, and on the 28th of April following was admitted to practice in the Circuit Court of the United States. Thus she became the first woman lawyer in Montana, and is also still the only woman lawyer in the State. She is, too, the first woman in Montana to receive the appointment of Notary Public.

But her struggle for success was not yet over. The idea of her trying a case before a judge and jury was laughed at by the bar at which she was to practice; but when she began to try cases, her thorough knowledge, her keen perception of fine points and nice distinctions, her power of language and fine oratory, won the day. She gained hard-contested cases from the best of them, her reputation as a capable lawyer was soon established, and those who at first scoffed at her now concede her marked ability. Soon she found herself in the midst of a good law practice, handling cases for both men and women, a large majority of her clients, however, being men.

In 1892, when the Populist party of Montana held its State convention, Miss Knowles was greatly surprised by receiving from the convention a dispatch asking her if she would accept the nomination for Attorney General of the State of Montana. When she received it she at first supposed some one was trying to perpetrate a joke at her expense, but on learning the truth she at once replied, "Yes." She was nominated without an opposing candidate. Up to this time she had not given any attention to politics, and she at once began to inform herself on the political questions of the day, especially on the money and silver questions.

The appearance of Miss Knowles in the campaign, advocating Populistic principles from the rostrum, was an innovation in politics which fairly startled the politicians surface of the earth, in his orchard, in his garden, in the path that leads back to Paradise."

—From Muir's Picturesque California.

Let us take a bird's-eye glance at the long line of gold discoveries which pointed continually toward and had their final climax in the richest placers ever found in the State,—Alder creek, Montana.

Prescott, in his "Conquest of Mexico," tells us that Cortez and his men found in a sealed-up chamber of the temple to the sun, where the president's palace and the great cathedral of Mexico now stand, great heaps of virgin gold. So we must know that gold dust had been dug from the earth on this continent from time immemorial. We know also for a fact that gold of Montana, and excited such curiosity among the people that her presence at a meeting was sufficient to insure her a crowded house. Curiosity gave place to interest, and those who had attended her meetings on account of their novelty were happily disappointed by being treated to speeches replete with reason, gilded with rhetoric and clothed with eloquent passages which stamped them as efforts creditable to the most gifted of Montana's orators. At a moment's notice she sprang to the front as a political speaker, and the young lawyer of two years' practice became the acknowledged orator of the Populist party. The press universally gave her notices which were of the highest order and second to no speaker upon the stump. Receptions and notices were given her, which might well have turned an older head than hers, but her ordinate sense of propriety and womanhood stood well the test, and the modest little blonde, with blue eyes set deep under a fine, full brow, indicating rare reasoning power, scored such a victory that the press, irrespective of politics, accorded to her the title of the "Portia of the People's party," and yielded to her ungrudgingly the exalted position which her eminent oratorical abilities justly entitled her to, and placed her in the foremost ranks of her party leaders. It was a just tribute to womanhood, and marked an epoch in the lives of women in the West; for this little lady clearly demonstrated that women are capable of taking an active and able part in the discussion of the affairs of the State and the nation. Her participation in politics is hailed as a rift in the clouds of political exclusiveness. During the campaign she traveled over 3,000 miles and stumped the entire State, making some sixty or more speeches. When she spoke at Helena the citizens gave her an ovation. The Auditorium was crowded and her audience was full of enthusiasm. She spoke one hour and fifty-five minutes without showing the least sign of exhaustion. The result was that she carried the most populous counties in the State, running 5,000 votes ahead of her ticket and polling 12,000 votes. Since then her law practice has greatly increased. She has had many important cases, both criminal and civil.

In 1893 she received the appointment of Assistant Attorney General from Hon. H. J. Haskell, one of her opponents in the campaign of 1892, who was elected Attorney General of Montana on the Republican ticket, which appointment she now holds.

In September, 1893, she was intrusted with an important case then pending in the Department of the Interior. Her appearance before that department at Washington, accredited to Montana as its Assistant Attorney General, was a new departure from the ordinary custom or routine, as she was the first lady to appear before the heads of bureaus in that department or in any other. Being introduced to Secretary Hoke Smith by Senator Thomas C. Power, of Montana, she was accorded most gracious treatment by his assistants, before whom she presented the claims of the State in the case of the appeal of Paris Gibson vs. State of Montana, which involved the title to school lands near Great Falls worth at least $200,000. This important case was under her control, and she acted without instructions from the Attorney General, except to do the best she could in the premises. That she was successful in her endeavors is evidenced by the fact that before she left Washington the Secretary of the Interior rendered a decision awarding the lands in question to the State of Montana. This was a most important ruling for the State, as the Secretary laid down the rule that school land could not be taken up for a stone quarry under the placer mineral act. She is the only lady who ever went to Washington as the accredited representative of a sovereign State on official business. Her success in that case was noted by the press of Montana and as well as by other papers.

Miss Knowles boards at the hotel, and finds recreation in riding horseback and driving. She has a fine library and office in the Masonic Temple, and there she sits, preparing her briefs, with her lady typewriter near her. On the door hangs a neat little sign, "Ella L. Knowles, Attorney at Law."

ROBERT W. NEILL, one of Helena's successful business men, was born in the province of Quebec, Canada, May 12, 1852. He resided in his native land until he was twenty years of age, receiving his education there, and in 1872 came to the United States. He spent five years in New Hampshire, Vermont and Maine, at the end of which time he returned to Canada. In the fall of 1885 he again came to the United States, this time to Montana. During his sojourn in the Eastern States he learned the trade of harnessmaker and saddler, and on coming to Helena he engaged in the harness business, which he has since continued. The success he has attained here is ample evidence of his business ability.

Mr. Neil was married June 11, 1889, to Miss Nellie Doughty, of Helena.

He is a member of the Queen City Lodge, No. 42, I. O.

FRANCIS S. READ, now a resident of Helena, has been identified with Montana since 1866. Following is a brief sketch of his life:

Francis S. Read was born in Stanford, Lincoln county, Kentucky, December 27, 1840, his parents also being natives of that State. When he was six months old he was taken by them to Platte county, Missouri, where they settled and where he was reared and educated, remaining there until he was twenty years of age. During the civil war young Read was for four years in the Confederate service, under General Price. He was promoted from a private to the rank of Second Lieutenant, and was in command of his company in one battle in which he was severely wounded.

When the war ended Mr. Read was mustered out at St. Louis, in April, 1865, and returned to his home in Platte county. There he remained until the spring of the following year, when he came to Montana. His first location here was on a ranch in the Prickly Pear valley, near Helena. Subsequently he removed to Cascade county, where he still has extensive stock interests and valuable ranch property in the Chestnut valley. He is also largely interested in Helena real estate, having erected numerous residences in the east part of the city, where his family reside, their home being on Eighth avenue. He spends his winters with them and his summers on his stock ranch in Cascade county.

Mr. Read was married in Montana, October 27, 1869, to Miss Laura T. Thoroughman, and they have five daughters and one son, all at home. He and his family are prominent and active workers in the Christian Church, and he is also a member of the A. O. U. W.

HENRY J. BLUME, who is ranked with the enterprising and successful men of Butte City, Montana, is eminently a self-made man.

A study of the lives of the successful men of all ages and climes has ever been one of absorbing interest, and especially in this broad western land of ours, where so many opportunities are afforded for the ambitious young man to rise, do we find the study of biography an interesting one. Indeed, the only bar to success in this land is the lack of will power. In this connection, it is with pleasure that we present a sketch of the life of Henry J. Blume.

He was born in Toledo, Ohio, March 25, 1856, and from his third year was reared in Chicago, Illinois. When he was ten years old he began earning his own living by doing such work as he could in a brick yard. Later he obtained employment in the office of the Northwestern Christian Advocate. In the meantime he attended school whenever he could. He attended a German school three years and also took a course in a business college—all before he was sixteen. After that he learned the heating and ventilating business, and in 1877 came to the Territory of Montana to get a business start. Three hundred and fifty miles of the journey hither he made on foot, was sick a portion of the way, and it was under the greatest difficulty that he reached his destination.

In Helena Mr. Blume obtained employment with the firm of Clark, Conrard & Curtain. Subsequently he worked at McClellan Gulch in the placer mines of his uncle, Harmon Blume. In the spring of 1878 he came to Butte City and the two years following he was in the employ of Kinna & Jack. Then he spent one year in freighting between Dillon and Butte City. In 1881 when the Butte Hardware Company was organized he became one of its stockholders and took charge of its tinning, plumbing and heating department. In this position he continued until 1884. That year he invested all he had saved at Coeur d' Alene; but the effort that was put forth to boom that place proved a failure and he not only lost all his savings but also soon found himself $3000 in debt. That same year he come back to Butte City and with nothing save his good name and his energy he established himself in business, at first in a very small way. Soon he began to prosper, and from the little shed he at first occupied he removed to a better room, 32 west Park street, where he had eight feet front and where he continued for two years, having all the work he could do. At the end of that time his business had outgrown his quarters and another move was necessary, which was to 19 west Park street, where his room was 15 x 40 feet. This sufficed for a year and then he moved into No. 20 west Park street which was 14 x 100 feet, and from which three years later, he came to his present location, No. 78 west Park. Here he occupies two floors, each 20 x 100 feet, which are well stocked with stoves of all descriptions and with shelf-hardware, stoves, however, being a specialty. He does a large heating and plumbing business, and also Mountain Jo, one of Fremont's old guides, was devoted to the perpetuation of the romantic traditions. In 1854 he showed me a gold bullet which he said he had cut from the neck of his horse after a fight with the Comanches years before gold was found in California near Sutter's Fort. He was a remarkable man in many ways, of great culture and good family, and, though a sad drunkard when in the settlements, was at all times counted truthful. He was a friend of my father's and took me entirely under his wing when I, a lad, found my way to California. It was while I was with him at his wild mountain ranch on the south base of Mount Shasta that he showed me this gold bullet and told me traditions out of which I wrote "The handles bicycles. He has the right of manufacture and sale of the Champion roaster for the States of Montana and Washington and receives large orders for this article from various points of both States. His business in stoves is both wholesale and retail. While his establishment has had a marvelous growth and while he now employs a number of men in its various departments, he himself has not forgotten how to work but gives his personal supervision to its every detail and is found at his place of business every day from early morning till late at night.

Although Mr. Blume has from time to time enlarged and extended his hardware business, he has by no means kept all his money in it, but has made some valuable investments in mines and other property. He has invested in no less than fourteen mining claims, has been the owner of several fruit orchards and land in San Luis Obispo county, California, and has also built a nice residence in Butte City.

Mr. Blume was married in 1881, and has one son, George H., who is now being educated in the Montana University at Helena.

For many years Mr. Blume has been identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He aided in the building of the Mountain View Church, has served as Trustee of the Church, and for years has been an active Sunday School Superintendent. His political views are those advocated by the Republican party.

HON. WILLIAM DYER, Helena, Montana.—It is not a matter of surprise that the rich mines of Montana should draw many of its successful operators from the enterprising and experienced men of the mining regions of the Old World. Cornwall, England, has long been famous in mining annals. It has furnished brain and brawn to develop the mineral wealth of every known land.

Hon. William Dyer, one of Montana's most successful operators, dates his birth from St. Austell, Cornwall county, England, February 28, 1853. His ancestry were of pure old English stock, long settled in that part of the country. Young Dyer grew up under parental care, and had the advantage of an English training, and then, when twenty years of age, in 1873, he emigrated to the United States.

It was but natural a Cornwall man should seek employment as a miner after landing in this country; so we find the young Englishman, first engaged in the iron mines of New Jersey; and as, when a young man of muscle and energy leaves parents and native land to carve out his fortune in a new country, he is not satisfied with less than the best opportunities that country can afford, after three years spent in the iron mines of New Jersey, young Dyer, then twenty-three years of age, turned his face toward the rich mining regions of the West. He first stopped around Central City, Colorado, and there engaged in mining, contracting and kindred occupations suited to his skill and experience. After two years spent in Colorado, Dyer pushed forward to the richer fields of Montana, arriving at Butte about the 1st of March, 1878. For a number of years he worked for wages around Butte as a miner in various capacities. His skill and experience enabled him to command a good salary, and he was saving and careful of his earnings, which were judiciously invested in Butte City property, the rapid advance in which proved the soundness of his judgment.

In September, 1884, after an absence of more than ten years, Dyer paid a visit to his old home in England. One year was there spent in renewing old acquaintanceship and revisiting the scenes of his early youth; he returned to Montana and again resumed his former occupation in Butte.

Whilst Mr. Dyer's skill and experience as a miner enabled him to command high wages, he was still to lose all prospects of becoming a mine owner himself; so, as early as 1879, having made the acquaintance of Michael Connors, a prospector in whose judgement he had confidence, he entered into the usual "grub-stake" arrangement with him; Dyer furnished the means and Connor prospected on joint account. To show how much pluck and perseverance are necessary for success, even in the rich mining regions around Butte, it may be stated, that this arrangement was continued right along for a period of seven years. In 1886, they discovered and located, the now famous Ontario mine. Dyer's experience as an expert miner, now served him to good purpose. A proposition was made by his partner, Connors, to give or take $50,000 for the half interest. It was a big price for a partially developed mine, but Dyer accepted this proposition and gave his partner, Connors, his notes for the amount, and shipped ore enough from this mine to meet his payments at maturity. The first car-load of ore shipped from this mine netted $1,566, at the United States sampling works, in Helena. Mr. Dyer continued to work the Ontario mine on individual ac-

Arizonian," the first piece in "The Songs of the Sierras." My first battle with the Indians was directly under him. This was the fight of Castle Crags, where I was fearfully hurt with an arrow in the face. He died in Oregon City about the time of Fremont's death; his mountain ranch having long before become the famous Castle Crag Tavern and property of the Stanford, Huntington and Crocker railroad company. But we must leave behind us the vague and romantic Apache-Comanche traditions,

"Where they shot gold bullets at the buffalo."

Entering the lines of California we find them digging gold dust from the ground near Los Angeles generations before our invasion of Mexico. Pointing from there in line toward Mon-counts, until about one year ago, realizing about $117,000 net profits on ore shipments up to that date.

Having other mining properties adjoining, he then concluded it best to incorporate a company to develop and work the whole property on a large scale, and with the best and most improved machinery. This resulted in the organization, January, 3, 1893, of the Ontario Mining Company, with Mr. Dyer as president and principal stockholder. The company was stocked at $300,000, and is probably the only mining venture in Montana the stock of which commanded par from its organization, and before the company had taken out a pound of ore. Mr. Dyer's associates in the Ontario company are: Judge Cornelius Hedges, vice president; Hon. A. C. Logan; C. A. Southmayd, secretary and treasurer; and Wm. Joob, superintendent.

Born and reared in Cornwall, and having followed mining all his life, Mr. Dyer is essentially a miner; still it must not be inferred that he is a one-ideaed or narrow-minded man. He has given the politics and welfare of his adopted country, careful thought, and has ever been an earnest and consistent advocate of the tenets of the Republican party, and in favor of protection for the American laborer. In 1889, when Montana was preparing to assume Statehood, and her citizens, with no partisan bias, were seeking the best-minded and cleverest heads in the Territory, to meet and frame her State constitution, Mr. Dyer was chosen as one of the delegates, and his work, with that of his associates, met with the unqualified endorsements of his fellow citizens.

Mr. Dyer is also prominent in Free Masonry and Odd Fellowship, and has taken the highest degrees in these orders.

A sketch, such as this, is intended merely to present the facts in a plain and simple manner, of the successful career of one, who, unaided and by his own skill and industry, has raised himself from poverty and obsecurity to a position of influence and independent wealth.

There is one incident, however, connected with Mr. Dyer's life, that might well be treated by the pen of the writer of romance. In 1873, whilst an emigrant and when only twenty years of age, he met, won and married, at Plymouth, England, Miss Amelia Ann Skelly, a native of Cornwood, Devonshire, England, who like himself, was embarking to test an unknown fortune in America. They together, from the elevated position of affluence and influence, to which they have so honorably and worthily attained, can look back with satisfaction over, their lives, then united.

HARRY N. SYKES, a Montana pioneer of 1864, now an esteemed resident of Helena, who has done his share toward developing the resources of his vicinity and advancing the general welfare, was born in Niagara county, New York, December 4, 1830. His ancestors came from England to America in an early day, settling in New England, in the history of which they played a prominent part, and from which place their hardy descendants have spread over the United States, carrying with them that determination and ability so characteristic of their forefathers, to whom and their co-partners is largely due the present status of this country among the nations of the world. Great-grandfather Nathaniel Sykes was born in Springfield, Massachusetts, in 1730, his life being passed amid the stirring scenes of Revolutionary times; and knowing the independent character of the family it is hardly necessary to state that he took his part with the colonists in freeing themselves from the yoke of monarchial domination. The musket with which he fought the British at Lexington is still a treasured heirloom in the family, while that spirit which it represents is also their heritage. This noble ancestor died in 1791, after having witnessed the fruition of his hopes in the independence of the American colonies. His son, Francis Sykes, grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born in Manchester, New Hampshire, in 1763. He married Miss Rose Bishop, a descendant of an old and wealthy New England family, and in 1794 they moved westward to Springfield, New York, which town they founded, and where they resided until their death, Francis Sykes in 1823, and his worthy wife in 1840. Of their eight children, Nathaniel Sykes, father of the subject of this notice, was born in Whitingham, Vermont, in 1794, and was carried by his mother on horseback to New York State. Nathaniel was the second child, and was reared in Springfield and married in Cheningo, in 1817, to Miss Elizabeth Seeber. She was born in Schoharie county, New York, in 1795, and was a descendant of the Dutch Knickerbockers, belonging to one of the oldest families of the Mohawk valley. Her grandfather, Jacob Seeber, was killed in the Revolutionary war while fighting for the freedom of the colonies. In 1835, the parents of the subject of this sketch removed to Chautauqua county, New York, whence they went, in 1846, to Van Wert county, Ohio. In 1857 they again moved westward, going to Missouri, where the wife tana we come to General John Bidwell, of Chico. No man is more truthful and conservative in what he says and does. He still is with us—1894—strong in mind and body and greatly honored, although he crossed the Sierra de Nevada mountains in a cart three years before Fremont came and six years before the famous discovery at the sawmill by Sutter's men. He was Captain Sutter's secretary for years before and after the discovery, is very faithful to the memory of his old fellow-pioneer and would not let him be robbed of one word of his deserved renown; yet he assures the curious world that he saw gold nuggets in the hands of the Indians long before the episode at the sawmill which thrilled the world and whitened the seas with sail.

It may not be out of the line of this history and mother died in 1862. The father continued to reside there until his death in 1872, at the good old age of seventy-eight. He was an influential and worthy citizen, prominent in good works, and universally respected. For many years he acted as Justice of the Peace, and during the late war was a strong advocate of the Union. Of his four sons and three daughters there now survive three sons and one daughter, Eliza died aged eleven; Charlotte became Mrs. Perry Hull and died aged twenty-five; Francis was an officer in the Union Army, and was severely wounded at Fort Donelson; he died in 1876. George resides in Miles City, Montana; Lorenzo lives in Vina, California; Harry N. is the subject of this sketch; and Jeannette, the youngest, who now resides in Montana.

Jeannette has had a most remarkable and eventful career, which savors of fiction but is intensely real. She was born July 29, 1833, and was married in Van Wert county, Ohio, in 1852, to Joseph W. Decamp. She removed with her husband, in 1855, to Minnesota, and thence, in 1861, to Fort Ridgely on the Indian reservation, where, in 1862, the great Indian massacre occurred. On August 17th of the last mentioned year, Mr. Decamp left the Fort for St. Paul, and on the following day Mrs. Decamp and her three children were captured by the Indians. On the 19th of the same month Mr. Decamp returned to Fort Ridgely, which was for two weeks in a state of siege by the Indians. He was one of a company sent out to bury the dead,—about 1000 men, women and children who had been killed by the savages. While out on this mission this company was attacked by the Indians and, on September 1st, the battle of Birch Cooley occurred, in which all but eighteen of the white men were killed. Mr. Decamp was wounded and carried back to Fort Ridgely, where he died. After Mrs. Decamp had been in captivity for two weeks, subject to the tender mercies of the red skins, she was enabled by the aid of a friendly Indian to escape with her children in a canoe down the river, and returned to her parents in Missouri. Some years later she married Rev. Joshua Sweet, at one time Chaplain of Fort Ridgely, and in 1867 they removed to Glencoe, Minnesota, where Dr. Sweet founded a church. He died in St. Paul in 1874, greatly mourned by all who knew him. He was a man of talent and education, a prominent minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who did much toward disseminating the Gospel in the Northwestern wilds. Mrs. Sweet has had five sons, three by her first marriage and two by the last one. Wellington Decamp, the eldest, is an esteemed resident of Spokane, Washington; Joseph Warren is a miner in Helena; Benjamin E. lives in California; Charles N. is also in Spokane; and Harry Whipple is now in Helena. Mrs. Sweet has borne her trials and vicissitudes with Christian fortitude. She is a lady of marked refinement and culture, and enjoys universal esteem.

Harry N. Sykes, the subject of this biography, who has for a moment been obscured by his sister's virtues, was reared to manhood in the grand old State of New York, his young life being passed on the home farm and in attending the public schools of his vicinity. He accompanied his parents to Van Wert county, Ohio in 1846, where he was afterward married to Henrietta Decamp, a native of Licking county, the Buckeye State. In 1855 this young couple accompanied Joseph W. Decamp and wife to Minnesota, where Mr. Sykes settled on government land in the vicinity of Shakopee. Two years later, in 1857, Mr. Sykes and family returned to Ohio, where he engaged in lumbering, and later laid out the town of Middlepoint. In 1858 he went to Missouri, whither his parents had preceded him, leaving his family in Knox county, that State. In the spring of 1859 he went to Pike's Peak, Colorado, where he remained a season prospecting for gold. He then returned to Missouri, where he remained until the last day of February, 1864. He then started across the plains a second time; coming with Capt. James Fisk and a small company to Montana. On arriving at the Little Missouri river, the emigrants were attacked by a large number of Indians, and for three days the white men traveled and fought, twelve of the company being killed by the red men. The white men were finally surrounded by the savages, but during the night some of the company stole away and succeeded in reaching Fort Rice, where Gen. Sully had troops. He sent 800 men to the relief of the emigrants, and the Indians were driven off. Sixteen days elapsed before the soldiers arrived, during which time the emigrants suffered greatly from the harassment of the Indians.

Mr. Sykes then went down the Missouri river to Sioux City, Iowa, where he took a steamer to Omaha, Nebraska, thence crossing the plains to Virginia City, Montana, where he arrived in the fall of 1864. He mined here unto set it down that, according to a journal exhibited to Hon. Thomas Fitch, Grace Greenwood, myself and others by Brigham Young at Salt Lake City in 1871, the very first particles of gold dust discovered were discovered and were picked up from the mill tail by a Mormon and handed to Marshall. This journal, it is claimed, was kept by two Mormons of the disbanded Mormon Legion who were making their way to Salt Lake after the Mexican war and who had stopped here for hire. The journal states in detail how the gold was found, handed to Marshall, passed on to Sutter down at his fort, and found to be gold, but not returned to them.

It further tells that they went out every Sunday, when not kept at work by their employers til 1865, and then came to Helena, and in 1866 took up a ranch of 160 acres in Prickly Pear valley, seven miles northeast of the capital. Until 1868 Mr. Sykes was engaged in freighting from Fort Benton, Montana, and other places to Helena. At this time his wife and two daughters came out to him, and after their arrival they settled on his farm near Helena. They were eighty-seven days in making the voyage up the Missouri river, owing to the shallow condition of the stream. His daughters, Lottie and Ida, are now married, the former to B. J. Townsend, a respected citizen of Helena, and the latter to J. J. Ellis, a prosperous resident of Great Falls. Harry E. Sykes was born on the farm near Helena, and is now managing that place for his father. The family made their home on this farm for a number of years, being greatly prospered, the father adding 160 acres to his original purchase and making substantial improvements on both farms. In 1887 the father bought a brick residence in Helena, where he and his wife now reside, surrounded by comfort and in the enjoyment of the society of their children and friends.

Politically, Mr. Sykes has been for many years a Democrat, but is now an active advocate of the principles of the People's party. Fraternally, he has been a Master Mason since 1856. Mrs. Sykes is a useful member of the M. E. Church South. The prosperity which has befallen this worthy couple has come through their united and persevering labor, supplemented by uniform uprightness and a just regard for the rights of others.

Samuel Word, Helena, Montana, is one of the most prominent pioneers of the State.

He is a native of Kentucky, born in Barboursville, Knox county, January 19, 1837. His ancestors came to this country from Scotland and were among the early settlers of South Carolina, previous to the American Revolution. From two brothers who came from Scotland and settled in South Carolina, sprang the stock of Words scattered through Virginia and most of the other Southern States. His more immediate ancestors settled in Virginia and Tennessee. William Word, Samuel's father, was born in Powell's valley, Tennessee, in 1808. He went with his father and family to Knox county, Kentucky, where he was reared and where he married Miss Susan Boyd Banton, and where their son Samuel was born. William Word afterward resided for a number of years in Somerset, Pulaski county, Kentucky, and in 1856 removed from there to Kansas, thence to St. Joseph, Missouri, where his death occurred, in the seventy-third year of his age. His wife survived him a few years, when she passed away, also at about the age of seventy-three. Both were devout Christians and firm believers in the teachings of Alexander Campbell. By occupation Mr. Word was a farmer, and at one time also owned and operated a tannery.

Their son Samuel early developed a taste for the study of law, and read in the office of Andrew J. James, afterward Attorney-General of the State of Kentucky. While reading law young Word began to feel the need of a higher education. In order to obtain the funds with which to secure a college education he engaged in school teaching, meanwhile keeping up his law studies. After this he entered Bethany College, Virginia, where he remained until his health failed and he returned home. After recuperating for a while, he entered the office of Silas Woodson, of Missouri, afterward Governor of that State, and under his instructions continued the study until August, 1858. At that time he obtained a license to practice law, and entered upon his professional career at Oregon, Holt county, Missouri, where he became a partner of Colonel James Foster of that place. While he was successfully engaged in the practice of law there he became acquainted with the daughter of his partner, Miss Sarah Margaret Foster, to whom he was subsequently married. She was born in Clay county, Missouri, a descendent of Irish and Scotch ancestry, her father being a native of Ireland, and her mother, nee Hannah J. Thompson, of Scotch descent.

Soon after his marriage Mr. Word set out for Idaho Territory and landed at Alder Gulch in the summer of 1863, and there engaged in placer mining. Alder Gulch at that time was the Mecca of every one who had heard of its golden wealth. Hundreds of miners were working day and night in this gulch. Mr. Word, however, did not continue his mining operations long, but turned his attention to the practice of his profession in Virginia City, as Alder Gulch was afterward called. A year later he returned to Missouri, settled up his affairs there, and again made the trip to Virginia City, this time being accompanied by his wife. Since that date he has been a resident of Montana, and his professional career here has been one of eminent success. He has become especially noted as a criminal lawyer. It has been said of him by another that he detested the quibbles and technicalities of the law, but had high and profound respect for justice.

and found in the smaller streams and on bars from half an ounce to several ounces each time they went out. It is stated that the gold was weighed by balances made of a little bar or stick supported in the middle by a string, a device known to all old prospectors, a dollar of silver weighing an ounce of gold.

Now this Mormon journal may be all a forgery; but as its story may be new to the world it is given only for what it may prove to be worth.

The discoveries of gold from this place and date push rapidly in line for the first few years toward the far north,—Montana.

He has been known to enter upon the prosecution of an alleged criminal with the proviso that should he through the course of the trial become convinced of the innocence of the prisoner he would be allowed to withdraw from the case. As an orator, Mr. Word has great power and appears at his best before a large audience, where his eloquence rises with the occasion and holds his hearers spellbound.

In 1865 Governor Edgerton appointed Mr. Word Prosecuting Attorney for an unexpired term for the First Judicial District of Montana. After serving his time he was elected for the succeeding term of two years. For nine years he was the counsel for the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

It was Mr. Word who conceived the project of putting the famous Drum Lummon mine on the market. He secured its sale to an English syndicate. To the judgment and ability of Mr. Word, Mr. Jefferson Lowrey and Mr. Mallory is due the credit of giving an impetus to the mining industry of the Territory in 1884-5, their efforts gaining for it a world-wide reputation and bringing to the Territory a vast amount of wealth to be utilized in the development of her mines, thus affording employment to thousands.

To Mr. Word also largely belongs the development of the coal industry in Montana. The people of the Territory had for years relied upon the forests for their fuel and no effort had been made to prospect the country for coal, gold and silver mining being the all absorbing industry. Mr. Word and Hon. Walter Cooper came into possession of the Rocky Fork coal fields and immediately set to work to utilize them. They succeeded in securing the co-operation of the following gentlemen: Samuel T. Hauser, Henry Villard, Thomas F. Oakes, James L. Platt and James B. Hubbell. They secured the building of a railroad fifty miles in length from Laurel, on the Northern Pacific road, to Red Lodge, where the coal fields are located. Thus a new industry was opened up and there sprung into existence large energies directed in a channel hitherto undeveloped in Montana. Since then other coal fields have been opened up and are being operated.

Mr. Word has all his life been identified with the Democratic party, has been an active worker in its ranks, and through his earnestness and eloquence has done much to bring victory to his party in Montana.

Mr. and Mrs. Word have four children, namely: William, born in 1862, married Miss Alice Cowan, of St. Joseph, Missouri; Robert Lee, born in 1866, is a graduate of the Law Department of the Columbia College, New York; Charles F., born in 1871, is a graduate of Yale College; May, the only daughter, was born in 1875. Their home, which Mr. Word had built in accordance with his own ideas, is the embodiment of elegance and luxury, the grounds, the edifice and the furnishings all combining to make an ideal home. Mr. Word is one of Montana's best citizens, one of her ablest lawyers and one of her most genial and social gentlemen. He has not only accumulated a fine fortune, but what is best he is also liberal with it and with it makes others happy and knows how to enjoy it himself. This brave pioneer has well earned and richly deserves his prosperity, and it is pleasant to know that while he has done so much to develop the resources of the great State in which he has so long resided that she has returned to him such ample reward.

Mrs. M. S. Cummins, Preceptress of the young ladies' department and professor of Latin and modern languages in the Montana University, has gained an enviable reputation among the educators of this State.

Mrs. Cummins was born at Jonesborough, Tennessee, May 31, 1854. She is of Pennsylvania-Dutch origin, but her ancestors, both maternal and paternal, have long been residents of the South. Her father, William C. Slemons, a native of Tennessee, married Miss Maria Dosser, also of that State. They reared a family of seven children, Mrs. Cummins being the fourth born. All are still living. The father was by trade a tanner and was engaged in that business all his life. He was an Elder in the Presbyterian Church; his daily life was in harmony with the creed to which he held, and in that faith he reared his family. He died in 1887, in the seventy-third year of his age. His widow is still living, having attained her three score years and ten.

Mary Stuart Slemons, for that was the maiden name of Mrs. Cummins, had at her sixteenth year obtained a good common-school education but, being ambitious to go beyond that, she, through her own efforts, was enabled to take a course in the Augusta Female Seminary, of Staunton, Virginia, of which institution she is a graduate. Returning to Tennessee in 1874 she began teaching, and for nine years was principal and teacher of the Knoxville high school. While in Knoxville she became the wife of W. F. Cummins, a prominent merchant of that city. She of the great Umpqua cañon. Here the swift line of discoveries, having dwindled to almost nothing of value, called a long halt.

Looking back and to the left of the line we see Gold Beach in the shadow of Cape Blanco where the Spaniard had anchored centuries before in his search for gold and where Sir Francis Drake also sailed, quietly setting it down in his log, when at anchor in Drake's Bay not far from the great bay of San Francisco, that "gold doth abound far in the land."

This gold beach, extending indefinitely up and down the ocean's bank above and below the old Spanish Cape Blanco, caused a mad but brief excitement. The gold was found at low tide, and after a heavy sea so very plentiful as to met with marked success and took great pleasure in teaching and also found time to engage in other labors as well as to enjoy social pleasures. She was president of the Synodical Missionary Society and a State member of the Executive Board of Home Missions of New York, under the auspices of the Presbyterian Church. She also took a lively interest in and devoted a considerable time to a large mission Sunday school. A strong effort was made by her friends to have her take charge of school interests in Mexico. This, however, did not seem to her to be compatible with other duties, and she declined.

In 1886, partly for a change of climate and partly to embrace the business opportunities afforded in a rich new State, she came with her husband to Montana. They settled in Helena, where they have since resided, Mr. Cummins being engaged in real-estate business, both on his own account and for others, and also being interested in various mining enterprises. Soon after their coming to Helena, Mrs. Cummins accepted the position as principal of the high school, in which she ably served for five years, and which she resigned in order to accept her present position in the Montana University. During her residence in Montana she has attained high standing among the educators of the State, and has been chosen by them successively as vice president and president of the Montana State Teachers' Association.

In temperance work, too, Mrs. Cummins has taken a leading part. She is now serving her fourth year as president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in Montana. In 1891 she was commissioned by Miss Willard as National Organizer of the W. C. T. U. in Montana. During her vacation months she traveled over a large portion of the State, organizing new unions, and partly as the result of that tour the banner presented by Miss Willard for the largest percentage of gain in membership in the Western States was given to Montana.

It was in September, 1891, that Mrs. Cummins entered the Montana University in Helena, as preceptress in charge of the young ladies' department and as professor of Latin and modern languages. In her University work for the past two years she has given excellent satisfaction and has evinced superior endowments of both head and heart for this important position. She loves her work and hopes in it to be able to accomplish great results. Mrs. Cummins, together with Prof. J. C. Templeton, also a professor in Montana University, has taken the inside management of University affairs.

ERASTUS D. EDGERTON, president of the Helena National Bank, of Helena, Montana, is a native of the State of Pennsylvania, born in Wayne county, December 9, 1852.

He traces his ancestry back to the English who landed from the first ship following the Mayflower. They became active factors in the settlement of the country and have always ranked as men of sound sense and good business judgment. His father, T. H. Edgerton, born in Delaware county, in 1819, married Miss Louisa J. Pixley of Puritan stock flowing from Scotch ancestry. She was in many ways a remarkable woman, with great industry and perseverance. His father left merchandising and purchased a large tract of pine-timber land on the Delaware river, which with a small farm provided a comfortable income. He had three children living at the time of his death in 1879.

Mr. Edgerton, the subject of this sketch, the eldest of the children, had only a common-school education, helped somewhat by a private instructor in the person of a Presbyterian clergyman. He read law in the office of Judge D. D. McKoon at Middleton, Orange county, New York and on June 17, 1877, was admitted to practice at Poughkeepsie, by Justice Joseph Burmond. Soon afterward he removed to New York city, and entered the law firm of McKoon, Edgerton & Hartwell. While in New York he took a full course of law lectures at Columbia College, removing to Montana and settling at Helena in the early spring of 1882. He commenced the practice of his profession in August of the same year; he organized and took the presidency of the Second National Bank, which position he retained until 1893. On August 3d, 1893, he was elected president of the Helena National Bank, this being just six days after the closing of the doors of the two largest national banks in the town, representing about sixty per cent. of the entire banking capital and surplus of the city. He remained president of both banks until October 3, of the same year, when the two banks were consolidated.

Soon after coming to Montana, Mr. Edgerton turned his attention to the subject of mining and mining enterprises. He soon acquired sufficient knowledge to enable him to make safe investments in mines, both for himself and for others, and he has thus been a "success" in bringing a large amount of capital to Montana to develop and work her mines, and develop her mineral resources. To him mining has been an exhilarating and inexhaustible study. He has been a hard student and great worker, and in that show a yellow ripple or ribbon in the sand. Men believed that by digging they could find great nuggets, naturally thinking that the heavy gold was deep in the sand, only the lightest and least important being on the surface. But not so: this gold, fine as the finest flour, was all on the surface and in sight, as a rule.

But to proceed toward Montana. In 1852, gold was known to exist on the Santiam river, not far from the capital of Oregon; and here in the autumn of this year I for the first time saw gold washed from the ground and for the first time knew what it is that gold miners call "the color." My father had taken me with him to the Knox nursery to get shrubs and trees. This was on the south base of Knox's Butte, named after the good old man who had first settled there and who kept the nursery.

lies the secret of his success. Accurate knowledge is a great power in everything, emphatically so in mining; by it absolute certainty is obtained.

Mr. Edgerton is now largely interested in various companies and enterprises, among which is the Confederate Gulch Mining Land & Irrigating Company, in Meagher county. From one bar in this property a million and a quarter of gold was taken out in ninety days. The capital stock of this company is $600,000. He is also interested in the Basin Mining & Concentrating Company, which has a capitalization of $500,000, and is producing $1,000 per day; and in the Boulder Smelting Company, in Jefferson county, which has a capital stock equal to that of the company just named.

Mr. Edgerton is also interested in a company that owns large gold mines recently discovered near the National Park, said company having a capitalization of $1,000,000; and also mining interests on Bear creek, Crevasse and Emigrant Gulch, in Park county and in Washington Bar, Madison county. He is a large stockholder in the Helena Land & Improvement company, and is interested in various other companies and land investments, owning 800 acres of land adjoining the city of Helena, and has participated in enterprises which have given to the city of Helena her electric and gas light and her street railways. Banking, mining and deals in real estate now claim the whole of his attention, for several years past he having altogether abandoned the practice of his profession.

Mr. Edgerton is in politics an uncompromising Democrat. He has served four years as one of the county commissioners of Lewis and Clarke county, a position for which his financial ability and incessant industry particularly fitted him. He has connected himself with various other organizations. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., the Masonic fraternity and the Episcopal Church, and is trustee of St. Peter's Hospital.

MARTIN M. HOLTER, a Montana pioneer of 1864 and for many years a prominent lumberman and merchant of Helena, is deserving of some personal mention in this work.

Martin M. Holter was born in Norway, July 17, 1835, and in his native land was reared and educated, and learned the trade of wagon and carriage maker. He served one year there as Deputy Sheriff. Believing that the United States afforded better opportunities for an enterprising young man, he emigrated to this country in 1857, and settled in Mitchell county, Iowa. For two years and a half he was engaged in sawmilling in Osage, that county. In 1860, he went to Colorado and turned his attention to mining, being thus occupied at Gregory Point and also at Illinois Bar on South Clear creek and meeting with moderate success. Then he and his brother, A. M. Holter, purchased a sawmill, which the latter took to Montana and located at Ramshorn Gulch, eighteen miles from Virginia City. So far as they know, it was first sawmill ever taken to Montana. Martin M. remained in Colorado, looking after their business there, until 1864, when he, too, came to Montana, and for many years he continued in partnership with his brother, their interests being identical. In the spring of 1865 they purchased at Bannack a boiler and engine, and built at Ten Mile a sawmill, which they operated a number of years. In the sawmill business they made large sums of money, receiving as high as $125 per thousand for their lumber at Virginia City. Our subject continued the business for some time at Virginia City, spending only his winters at Helena, but in 1869, located here permanently. As the years passed by and prosperity attended their efforts, they enlarged their operations, establishing mills near Great Falls and at Missoula, engaging in merchandising in Helena, and also investing largely in mines and mining. For a time they owned and operated a distillery, but sold it and the grocery and built the A. M. Holter Block, in which they opened out a stock of hardware, miners' machinery and builders' materials. They also became largely interested in farming and in city real estate, and erected numerous buildings in Helena, including an attractive and commodious residence, No. 15 South Rodney street, where Martin M. Holter resides with his family.

In 1889, Martin M. Holter sold his hardware business to his brother, and has since given his exclusive attention to lumbering and other business interests. He has stock in the electric light plant and also in various other enterprises of value to the city. During his residence in Helena, he has met with several disastrous fires, but has come out of them all with flying colors, and has replaced his lost buildings by better ones.

Martin M. Holter was married March 30, 1869, to Miss Emily Olsen, a native of Norway, who came to this coun-

While digging up the trees the old man told father in my hearing and with no secrecy that he had found gold in the sand of the river on the other side of the butte, and that he believed, from what he knew of the California mines,—from which he had lately returned if I remember rightly,—that big mines would be found up the Santiam river some day. Father wanted to see some gold dust and I suppose must have begged leave to go along with one of the Knox boys and "prospect."

We were barefooted, as all Oregon boys were in those days, and so, wading out in the shallow water at the end of a bar or spit of sand, the Knox boy took up a pan of sand, washed it and got three particles of gold.

"There, 'Squire, I have got the color," said try with her parents when she was two years old, and was reared in Chicago. Mr. and Mrs. Holter have one child, Milton Bernard Holter, born in Helena.

Mr. Holter was made a Master Mason in 1868. Since then he has advanced through all the branches of the Order, Blue Lodge, Chapter, Council and Commandry, and is a Shriner. He is also a member of the Elks. Politically, he is identified with the Republican party. In the early days of Montana, he took a great interest in aiding the good citizens to rid Montana of the road agents and murderers that infested the Territory. He was a prominent member of the Vigilant Committee, and was also Fire Marshal of Helena for some time. In 1865, when Helena was shut in from the outside world by snows six feet deep, and there were no means of obtaining supplies, it was he who started out on snow shoes, January 10, with the mercury at ten degress below zero, to bring relief. The supplies had been left in the deep snow on the other side of the Snake river. He traveled 140 miles in that most inclement weather, found his cattle with the Indians, drove them back to a canyon and took care of them there; during his sojourn in the canyon, living in a house made of the skins of cattle. Three hundred and sixty Indians were camped there at that time. As soon as the weather would permit, he hitched seven yoke of oxen to a wagon loaded with forty-two sacks of flour and two kegs of nails and started for Helena. Several pack mules had been previously sent through with flour to the destitute inhabitants of the little city. The flour sold readily for $100 per sack and the nails for $90 a keg. They lost in that winter several head of cattle. But by courage and endurance, Mr. Holter was enabled to save most of them, while others lost nearly all the stock they had.

Mr. Holter is still a well preserved man and his name is familiarly known to all the inhabitants of Montana. Long may he live to enjoy the comforts that his courage and thrift have so liberally provided.

DR. WILLIAM H. GELSTHORPE, the present active and progressive Mayor of Great Falls, Montana, was born in Wellsburg, West Virginia, in 1859.

His father, John Gelsthorpe, was born in Nottinghamshire, England, in 1824, emigrated to West Virginia in 1850, and in 1852 was married to Miss Margaret Rogers, a native of West Virginia. He was a merchant in the early part of his business career, and later was the owner of a hotel at Wellsburg. His death occurred in 1883. His wife still survives him, and is now, 1894, in the fifty-ninth year of her age. They had a family of six children, all of whom are living.

Dr. Gelsthorpe was the second born in his father's family. His boyhood days were spent in his native town, where he received a common-school education. Later he spent two terms at Bethany College; but, at the age of sixteen years, on the death of his father, he was compelled to leave college and give his attention to the serious matters of life, consequent upon his being the mainstay of the family. He did not, however, give up the idea of securing a better education and preparing himself for a professional career. To this end, he first took a course in book-keeping, and graduated in a commercial college. By the aid of office work he was enabled to perform, and by the earnings of newspapers and other work during vacations, he succeeded in completing a medical course, at Cleveland, Ohio. Returning to his native town when scarcely more than twenty-one years old, he was elected City Clerk, and served a term in that capacity. Ambitious to advance in his profession and otherwise, he concluded to "go West and grow up with the country," and 1883 found him in Glendive, Montana, where he was soon in the enjoyment of a lucrative practice. At the end of one year he returned to Cleveland, and took a post graduate course in medicine, and, being offered by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the position of surgeon for some four hundred miles of its line, with headquarters at Miles City, he accepted the same and remained there until 1886. During 1886 he accepted the position of surgeon for a mining company at Rimini, Montana, and in 1888 received the appointment of surgeon of the Sandcoulee Coal Company, at Sandcoulee, near Great Falls. Here he remained three years, practicing his profession with great success.

While at Sandcoulee Dr. Gelsthorpe manifested his confidence in the future of Great Falls, by making investments in real estate here, all of which proved profitable; and in 1890 he took up his permanent residence in the "Cataract City," where he has since been a prominent and successful physician.

Dr. Gelsthorpe was married March 3, 1887, to Miss Ella Naston, a native of Minnesota, and they have a delightful home at Great Falls.

The doctor is a member of the State Medical Society, and of the Northern Montana Medical Association. He is also a member of the A. O. U. W., at Great Falls,—of

"But what is the color? I thought you said gold; real gold."

"And so it is. The color is real gold, real, solid gold. If you had colors enough put together you could make a lump of solid gold as big as that butte."

Years after this date great mines were found far up the Santiam river, but not till other famous mines had taken precedence in point of discovery.

It is in line with this history of gold discoveries to say that this same year three separate expeditions of Californians and returned Oregonians, who could not now be quite patient under the restraints of their former pastoral wh'ch order he is examining physician,—and the B. P. O. E., and he is president of the Chamber of Commerce, at this place. Every movement and enterprise intended to benefit the city, has always found in him a hearty supporter. He is a Democrat, and has been active and keenly interested in political affairs. In the spring of 1893, he accepted the nomination from his party for Mayor of the city and in the face of great opposition was elected by several hundred majority. It was a signal victory, and Dr. Gelsthorpe enjoys the distinction of being the first Democrat elected to that office in Great Falls. His administration has thus far been eminently successful, and he people of the city, generally, are supporting him in his efforts to promote its interests.

DR. JOHN BAKER ATCHISON, a prominent member of the medical profession of Helena, Montana, was born in Clay county, Missouri, April 9, 1843. He came of Scotch-Irish ancestors who located in Pennsylvania in the seventeenth century. From Pennsylvania they emigrated to Virginia, thence to Kentucky and later to Missouri. They were people of the highest integrity and were among the best citizens of the various communities in which they lived. Some of the family participated in the war for independence.

William Atchison, the Doctor's father, was born near Lexington, Kentucky, in 1813. He married Miss Catharine Baker, a native of Huntsville, Alabama, born in 1817, and in 1842 they removed to Missouri, where they reared their family of six children, all of whom are still living. Both father and mother were worthy members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. She passed away in 1857, and he in 1872. He was a planter and large stock dealer, and during the civil war suffered greatly in the loss of his property.

Dr. Atchison was the second son and second child in his father's family. He was a student at Pleasant Ridge College and was just merging into young manhood when the civil war came on. Filled with enthusiasm for the cause of the South and the success of his own people, he left the college and enlisted in Captain McCarty's Company, Hugh's Battalion, which afterward became the Third Volunteer Infantry of Missouri. He served in General Price's command. He participated in the battle at Pea Ridge and in all the fights during the whole campaign on the east side of the Mississippi, including the battles of Corinth, Hatchis, Farmington, Baker's Creek, Big Block, Port Gibson and at the seige of Vicksburg. After the seige came the Georgia campaign. He was in the battle of Resaca and the battle of Fort Blakeley, his command being captured at the latter place. He was sent as a prisoner of war to Ship Island and from there to Jackson, Mississippi, where he was paroled. This was shortly after the war closed. He had entered the service as a private, and when he came out at the close of the war it was with the rank of Orderly Sergeant. During his army life he received a few slight wounds, but no serious injuries.

The war over, young Atchison entered the Canadian Literary Institute, where he resumed the studies he had dropped at the beginning of hostilities. From there he went to the Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, completing a course there and also one at the Long Island College Hospital, graduating at the latter institution in 1867. Immediately thereafter he entered upon the practice of his profession at St. Joseph, Missouri, where he met with marked success and where he remained until 1875. From that year until 1879 he practiced in St. Louis, and in the latter year, on account of failing health, he came to Helena, Montana, for a change of climate. Here he has since continued to reside, and in the practice of his profession has met with eminent success. The Doctor has also been successful as a business man since coming here, having made some valuable investments in real estate. The Doctor is a member of the Montana Medical Association, of which he served as president during the year 1893. He is also president of the Montana Board of Medical Examiners.

In 1873 Dr. Atchison was married to Miss Virginia Toole, a native of Missouri, and a daughter of Judge Edwin Toole, a venerable citizen of Helena. They have five sons and two daughters, namely: Nelsine, Edwin A., Ann Virginia, William, Warren, David R. and Benjamin P.

Dr. Atchison's political affiliations are with the Democratic party. He is a member of the Patriotic Sons of America, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and the Masonic fraternity, having taken all the degrees in the latter organization. Like his Southern ancestors, the Doctor is noted for his genial hospitality. He is enthusiastic in his profession, and by his close attention to life, set out for the headwaters of the Santiam and Mackenzie rivers to find the fabulous "Blue Bucket Diggings." A mysterious stranger with a mysterious air and a very heavy bag of dust had come and gone, none knew whence or whither. Now this mysterious man with his big bag of dust has appeared many a time and oft in the history of gold discoveries, from San Diego to Cariboo, and he might as well be set down first as last as a chapter in fiction. Let us concede that he even has appeared and disappeared, now and then, here and there. You must admit that there are plenty of ways for a mysterious man to get hold of a bag of gold on this globe quite as easily and far more probably than from some remote and mysterious mine. But this one suddenly set the inflammable gold-hunters of Oregon in a blaze and all said, "He has found uncle Billy Vaughn's Blue Bucket Diggings.

it and his many estimable traits of character he has won the confidence of all with whom he has come in contact.

I. D. O'Donnell, a prominent rancher of Yellowstone county, was born in Canada, in 1860, a son of Daniel an Margaret (McIntosh) O'Donnell, of Scotch-Irish ancestry. The family located in 1866, in Saginaw county, Michigan, where Daniel O'Donnell became prominent as a practical farmer, and held many responsible county positions. He had been engaged in mercantile pursuits prior to settling in that State.

I. D. O'Donnell, our subject, grew to manhood on his father's farm in Michigan. In 1882 he located in Miles City, Montana, which was then the temporary terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad. Deciding to experiment in mining, he accordingly went to the Maiden mines, but, soon becoming dissatisfied with that occupation, entered the employ of the I. J. Horse ranch Company, of which he soon became foreman. In 1886 he came to Billings, as manager of the Billings Ranch, and three years afterward purchased the interest of Mr. Billings in the company, and is now an equal partner with Edward G. Bailey. Mr. O'Donnell is resident manager of their large land and stock interests. Hesper Farm, known as their home ranch, is the finest in the Yellowstone valley, situated ten miles west of Billings, and contains 1,280 acres, well stocked and supplied with appropriate buildings. They have successfully demonstrated that fine apples and all varieties of small fruits can be produced in this county. About 2,000 tons of alfalfa and timothy hay were harvested on the place in 1892. The company own large tracts of grazing land, on which they have a number of springs, and are raising cattle, sheep and horses. Their landed estate amounts to 5,000 acres. Mr. O'Donnell is superintendant of the M. & M. L. I. Co., irrigation canal, having filled that position for five years. He has a comfortable home in Billings, surrounded by one of the most beautiful lawns in the city.

In October, 1887, he was united in marriage with Miss Louise Roeser, a daughter of Gustave and Louise Roeser. Her father was a pioneer and prominent citizen of Saginaw county, Michigan. Mr. and Mrs. O'Donnell have two daughters. Mr. and Mrs. O'Donnell are liberal in their religious views. He is a zealous worker in the Democratic party, is active in irrigation work, and is President of the Montana Irrigation Society.

Alfred M. Esler, one of Montana's most respected pioneers, came to the Territory in 1864, and has since been identified with her mining interests.

Mr. Esler was born in Jefferson county, New York, in 1840, descending from French ancestors. His parents, Moses and Sophia (Wemott) Esler, were both natives of New York. They had seven children, four sons and three daughters. The father was a carriage manufacturer, led a useful and worthy life, and died in his sixty-second year. The mother, still a resident of New York, has attained her seventy-ninth year.

Alfred M. Esler is the oldest in his father's family. He was educated in the public schools of his native State, and there learned the trade of house painter and decorator. In connection with this business he also conducted a store, in which he handled wall paper, books, stationery, glass, paints, oils, etc. Rumors of the rich gold mines in Montana induced him to leave a prosperous business in New York and come out West to seek his fortune. He accordingly sold out in 1864 and made the journey across the plains and mountains with ox teams, it being accomplished after long and tedious months of travel. He and his brother-in-law made the trip together, both being accompanied by their wives. At the end of five months they reached their destination which was Idaho, and there they divided there effects, Mr. Esler getting two yoke of oxen for his share. He traded his oxen for a placer claim and engaged in mining, but soon afterward discovered that his claim was of no value. Later in the season Governor Edgerton gave him the appointment of Justice of the Peace. With this office and by keeping boarders they managed to live. The following spring, 1865, he met with a severe bereavement in the loss of his wife. After the death of his wife he engaged in prospecting and was fortunate enough to discover a good silver mine, which he named the Legal Tender. That fall he started with a six-horse wagon load of the ore and took it back across the plains to the East. His showing it to the people there resulted in the formation of a company, to which he sold a three-fourth interest in the mine. In the spring of 1866 he returned to engage in operating it. Governor Hauser was then interested in a St. Louis company, and Mr. Esler

Briefly, this honest but illiterate old Virginian, Billy Vaughn, had been telling, even from before the date of the great gold discovery in California, that he, away back in the early "forties," had crossed a little stream in the mountains, with his ox wagon in which was his numerous family, where gold lay so thick in its bed that he could have picked up a blue bucket full! and he had exhibited some proof of this, too. It seems that an ox-bow lost its key and was about to relieve the ox from the yoke in the crowding and confusion of the team while the thirsty oxen all tried to drink at the same time; that, seeing danger to his family in this, he rushed in, and, having no key to hold the bow in place even after he had restored it to the gave him $20,000 in gold to put up a smelter and smelt 200 tons of the ore. It proved a success. Mr. Esler afterward put up two smelters and a refiner. After they had taken out a ton and a half of silver the mine gave out. The freights were so high it was impossible to make it pay, so they discontinued work there. Mr. Esler has since located several mines. Indeed, he has made this his life business, meeting with varied success. At this writing he is interested in several rich mining prospects in North Idaho and British Columbia. He is one of the owners of the Badger mine in the Cœur d'Alene country, this mine being valued at a million dollars. A number of the most prominent citizens in both Helena and San Francisco are interested in it. This Badger mill was blown up by the miners in 1892. The miners struck for higher wages, a demand which the owners of the mine deemed unreasonable and with which they could not comply, so they shut down the works, and, later, upon opening again, they employed new men. While sixty men were at work in the mill it was exploded with giant powder. The miners attacked the workmen, five being killed and fifteen wounded. Two of Mr. Esler's brothers were in the mill. One was taken prisoner and the other escaped and hid in an excavation. Mr. Esler and another gentleman chartered a special train and left the scene of action. He had been firm and resolute during all the trouble. At the time of the attack 100 men went to the hotel to search for "old Esler," as they called him. Some of the men engaged in the outrage have been tried and sent to the penitentiary. The mill has since been rebuilt and the company is now operating the mine.

In 1874 Mr. Esler married Miss Ophelia Johnston, a daughter of Colonel J. A. Johnston, of Helena. They have two children, Frances M. and Alfred M., Jr., whom Mr. Esler had the great sorrow of losing May 25, 1894.

Mr. Esler was made a Mason in Boonville, New York, when he was twenty-one, and has ever since remained a member of the fraternity. He has been a Republican all his life, has always taken an active interest in political matters, and has served his party well. He was elected a member of the Territorial Legislature of Montana in 1866. That year there were only two Republicans in the House, and the laws passed by the Legislature were so noxious that, through the efforts of Senator Sanders, the whole action was annulled by the United States Congress. In those exciting times a man ran a great deal of risk in being a Republican, and it required no little courage for Mr. Esler to maintain his position and act and vote according to his convictions, but he proved himself equal to the occasion. Since that time many changes have taken place, both in the times and in the opinions of men. Mr. Esler now has a nice home in Helena, is surrounded with all the comforts and luxuries of life, and he and his family are held in high esteem by their fellow citizens of Helena.

COL. JAMES SULLIVAN, Helena.—The State of Montana is indebted to the Emerald Isle for many of her best and most progressive citizens: prominent among these is the subject of the present sketch, Col. James Sullivan

In 1848, when only five years of age, young Sullivan's parents landed as emigrants from Ireland in the city of Boston. Like a majority of those seeking our shores at that time, his parents were possessed of but limited means. The public schools of Boston, however, afforded an opportunity for a good rudimentary education. A Yankee training, grafted upon good Irish stock, is a pretty sure basis upon which to build a successful man. After acquiring a common-school education, Mr. Sullivan engaged in business in his adopted city of Boston, and, meeting with a good measure of success there, tried his fortunes in the still larger field offered in the city of New York.

Life, however, was too slow in the old cities of the East, and opportunities for advancement were hedged about by too many hindrances, so that in 1878, Mr. Sullivan, then in the full prime of manhood, and with a business experience gained in the two great cities of Boston and New York, resolved to try his fortunes in the rapidly growing West. He came to Helena, Montana, at an opportune time. Mining and real-estate interests were then in a very progressive stage of development. With shrewd Celtic wit, a Yankee training and a business experience gained at "the Hub," Mr. Sullivan's success might have been readily forecast. As his means allowed, he made fortunate investments, both in real estate and mining properties.

After judiciously selecting and acquiring valuable city property, he did not sit down and wait for it to enhance in value by the expenditure of other men's capital in improvements, but went resolutely to work on the erection of costly business blocks on his own ground.

In 1887, associated with Senator Power, he built what is known as the "Gold Block." This was the first block yoke, he stooped and clutched up from the shallow bed of the stream what he thought was a long, yellow pebble or stone. His story was that he used that key right along; that it was in use when gold was found in California. Some of his smart neighbors had seen this; one of them, a blacksmith, had actually hammered it in shape at one time when it had become bent and had fashioned it after the shape and fashion of an ordinary iron key.

"Plenty like it? Be gad, Sir; I could 'a picked up a blue bucket full!" and this was always Uncle Billy's end of this pretty story.

"Couldn't you have picked up a red bucketfull, Uncle Billy, just as well?" asked my doubting father once. But Uncle Billy Vaughn looked almost angry and did not answer.

It is needless to say, neither of the three expeditions found the Blue Bucket Diggings that summer of 1852; nor did ever any of the many that went in the same quest for years after.

In the spring of 1853, at my father's "house-raising,"—a cabin made of hewn logs and reared by the gathered settlers,—one man sat on a stump with his arm in a sling, and directed the men. This man was John Dimond. He had erected in Helena with passenger elevators and other modern improvements. Many elegant buildings have since been constructed here, but the "Gold Block" was so well planned, that it has always been well occupied, and the United States Court rooms now occupy the entire upper story. In the year following the building of the "Gold Block," Mr. Sullivan and Senator Power, his associate in many real estate ventures, erected the "Diamond Block," another improvement worthy of Helena enterprise. Col. Sullivan is also a large holder of realty, both improved and unimproved, in many other sections of the city and county. Like most of Montana's capitalists, Col. Sullivan is also interested in the development of the mineral wealth of the State. He is president and principal owner in the Bowler Mining Company, and has many other valuable mining properties.

In 1882, Col. Sullivan became a member of the A. O. U. W., and has ever been a most active and enthusiastic worker in that charitable and progressive order. His clear head and business sagacity were early recognized by his brothers in this association. He was soon called to fill the leading positions in the local branch of the order, and has served as Grand Master and Grand Receiver, and is now Grand Recorder of the A. O. U. W., for the State of Montana.

During his whole life, the Colonel has been a strong, out-spoken and consistent Democrat. Whilst not an aspirant for political honors, the Colonel could not refuse his party's call to the Mayoralty of the city, which position he filled with credit to himself and his party, and as a safe guardian and promoter of the city's interests: his record will speak for itself. When in 1886, Hon. S. T. Hauser became Governor of the State, he selected Mr. Sullivan as a member of his staff and issued him a Colonel's commission.

The Colonel was married in 1867, to Miss Mary E. Young, a native of New Jersey, daughter of Aaron Young. One son, an only child, Algernon James Sullivan, came to bless this union. The young man now assists in his father's office. Mrs. Sullivan died in 1884, and the Colonel true to the memory of his first love, has since remained a widower.

In closing this simple sketch of a well rounded character and successful business man, may we not pause a moment to study the lesson it teaches.

It is needless to say that Colonel Sullivan is a self-made man. All noble characters with God's help are self-made. "Every man is the architect of his own character, as well as his own fortune." "Honor and fame from no condition rise; act well your part, there all the honor lies." But there is a lesson in such a career for every American boy, be he native or foreign born. Follow the young Irish lad from his landing, an emigrant, at five years of age, in the city of Boston, to his present position of affluence and influence, and you have an object-lesson, plain and practicable. It is not luck or influence or inherited wealth that make such men as Colonel Sullivan, but work, persistence and pluck.

CHARLES O. REED, a prominent business man of Helena, is president of the Reed & Craig Company, dealers in gentlemen's furnishing goods and manufacturers of shirts. Of his life we make record as follows:

Charles O. Reed was born in Miami county, Ohio, April 21, 1845. His ancestors were Hollanders who settled in Philadelphia previous to the Revolution; and his father, George Browning Reed, was born in Hillsborough, Ohio. George B. Reed was a schoolteacher in early life, later became a contractor and builder and also owned and operated a farm. He was twice married. His first wife, whose maiden name was Neoma Le Fever, was of Irish and French descent. She died at the age of thirty-four years, leaving two children, one of whom was Charles O.

Charles O. Reed was educated in the public schools, and remained on his father's farm until he was twenty-four years of age. In 1867 he married Miss Martha Wilson, a sister of the Wilson brothers, of the well-known business firm of Chicago. Mrs. Reed was a most amiable woman, a devoted member of the Methodist Church, and been out after the Blue Bucket Diggings and had come back with an Indian bullet in his shoulder. Dimond's Peak, near where the battle was fought and his friends are buried, takes its name from this man and incident.

Next in the order of discovery, and still pointing toward the top of the Rocky Mountains in the north, then remote and unknown Montana, come some unremunerative and fragmentary bits of discovery along the upper Columbia. Restless hordes of men surging up and down the wide and roomy world of the Columbia water-shed, seeking homes, gold, pasture lands, almost anything save life at the plow-tail, found gold almost anywhere, that is, the "color," from The Dalles to Fort Colville. We had was noted for her generosity and hospitality. She died in 1892, leaving two children, Charles Erwin and Hugh Browning.

After his marriage Mr. Reed removed to Chicago, where he was for seventeen years employed as superintendent of a large shirt factory. In August, 1887, he removed to Milwaukee, and was associated with his brother in the same business, and still retains his interests there. He organized his present firm in Helena in 1890. This is the first and only shirt factory in the State. In 1890 Mr. Reed went to California and made some investments in land in Tulare county, near Porterville, which he is devoting to the production of grapes and lemons.

Mr. Reed was reared in the faith of the Presbyterian Church, of which his parents were members, but he is now a Methodist and an official member in the church. During all the early history of the Republican party he was one of its strongest supporters. He has some opinions in relation to the currency of the country that are in accord with the views held by the Populist party. The great civil war had reached its zenith when Mr. Reed attained his eighteenth year, and at that time he tendered his services to his country, and was put on garrison duty at Washington, D. C., where he remained until the war closed and peace reigned.

JOHN WASSON EDDY, one of Helena's prominent citizens, hails from the Buckeye State. He was born in Orwell, Ashtabula county, Ohio, December 4, 1835. The Eddys trace their ancestry back to Scotch and French origin. Samuel and Elizabeth Eddy were among the pilgrims who landed in Massachusetts in 1632. From them the great family of Eddys in America sprang. Both Samuel and Elizabeth Eddy lived to be over eighty years of age. John Randolph Eddy, the father of our subject, was born in Tolland, Connecticut, and was in the early part of his life a fur merchant in New York. He married Miss Alice A. Mosier, a native of Long Island, of French Huguenot extraction. In 1832 the grandfathers on both sides of the family moved to Ohio, settling on the frontier and clearing and developing farms there. John R. Eddy also emigrated to Ohio at the same time his father and brother, Moore Eddy, did, and in that State he and his wife reared their family of four children: three daughters and one son, the latter being the subject of this sketch. John R. Eddy still lives in Ohio, having reached the advanced age of eighty four years, and he has a sister who is now ninety-four.

John W. Eddy grew up on his father's farm and received his early education in a log schoolhouse. James A. Garfield was his early tutor, at the Hiram Eclectic Institute, at Hiram, Portage county, where they were warm friends, and where for a time they vied with each other in their penmanship. And it may be said in this connection that Mr. Eddy afterward mastered the Spencerian system and became one of the best penmen in the United States, Professor Spencer himself conceding Mr. Eddy's superiority. Since then Mr. Eddy has written a poem dedicated to the memory of Professor Spencer. This poem was written while he was employed as bookkeeper in a banking office in New York. Another of his poems has since become world-wide in reputation, it having stamped its author as a genius. The title of this poem is the "Bookkeeper's Dream." Since then, and indeed all through his life, Mr Eddy has frequently indulged in poetic efforts, many of his writings possessing great merit.

After a few years spent as bookkeeper in Albany, he went to New York and entered a banking establishment, in which he remained until 1877. In the meantime he had become an ardent student of chemistry and took a special course in that science. He came to Helena to devote his energies to mines and mining, and soon became interested in bringing capital to Montana to develop the mines. He has written for Eastern journals many articles on the mines of Montana, and in this way he has done much to create an interest in this industry and to bring moneyed men here. He is not only enthusiastic on the subject but is thoroughly posted, and his information is the most reliable. He held the position of local editor of the Helena Independent for one year. He became one of the first organizers of the Board of Trade of Helena, has been one of its most useful and active members and has been its secretary. To him belongs the honor of giving to Montana the very appropriate pet name of the "Bonanza State." While Mr. Eddy has given much of his time to editorial work and has also practiced law for several years, still he makes mines and mining his principal business. He has built an elegant residence in Helena, is thoroughly interested in all that tends to the growth and development of the city, and expects to spend the rest of his life here.

Mr. Eddy's political views are in harmony with the principles advocated by the Republican party. He has served the city as Police Magistrate. He is prominently symptoms of the gold fever in the Oregon settlements, pointing up in that direction all along through 1854–5–6–7.

When teaching school not far from Vancouver, Washington, in 1858, I spent a vacation prospecting up the Lewis river, and found that considerable mining had already been going on there in a quiet way for years.

Bang! Boom! Away to the north like the great first gun of some fearful carnage, and near enough to Montana to be almost heard across the lines, came the crash and roar of the Fraser river gold discovery, and I closed the school. The scenes on the San Francisco wharves were beyond description. Men stood all night at the ticket office in order to be first to get passage to the great new mines.

George Wright, of the only ship line, told me, years later, in London, that the wild and desperate gold-seekers threatened to hang him and his father for not carrying them to Fraser river fast enough; but that in less than three months they wanted to hang them both for not carrying them away from there fast enough! It had proved a Waterloo indeed to very many of them.

Then came Cariboo, William's creek: then, nearer home, Pierce City, and Ora Fino,—all the time getting nearer and nearer to the great rich heart of Montana.

identified with the A.O.U.W., in which order he has the honor of being Past Grand Master of the State of Montana, and a member of the Supreme Lodge of the Order. When the Supreme Lodge of the State assembled at Helena, Mr. Eddy welcomed it with a poem written for the occasion, which was highly commented upon at the time. At the organization of the American Order of Home Protection, a beneficiary society similar to the A.O.U.W., only without a color line, Mr. Eddy was one of its founders, and was elected its secretary and now holds that position.

During the war, in 1863, the Young Men's Association of Albany offered a gold medal for the best national song. He became the successful competitor for the prize. The song was widely published by the papers, and a copy of it fell into the hands of Lieutenant Wilson of the Forty-third New York Volunteers. It was so highly appreciated by him that as a token of his thanks he took off his badge and sent it to Mr. Eddy. It is needless to say that Mr. Eddy now treasures this badge and keeps it and the medal together as one of the pleasant mementos of that period of the country's history.

Mr. Eddy was married in 1879 to Miss Evelyn M. Harvey, a native of New Jersey, born in 1856. Their union was a happy one, and four children were born to them, three of whom are still living, John W., Jr., Harvey A. and Raymond Randolph. The little daughter, Esta Clara, died in her fourth year, and Mrs. Eddy died April 3, 1887. April 9, 1891 Mr. Eddy married Miss Nona A. Burtch, a native of Iowa and a lady of rare culture and refinement. Mr. and Mrs. Eddy are the center of a circle of very warm friends.

WILLIAM M. G. SETTLES, junior member of the land and mining law firm of Nelson & Settles, Helena, Montana is a native of Alabama, born at Opelika, Lee county, April 24, 1856. His ancestors emigrated from England to this country, at an early day, and were among the pioneer settlers of the South. His father, George M. Settles, a native of Georgia, married Miss Mary E. Hundley, who was born in Montgomery, Alabama, daughter of Alsa M. Hundley. The Hundleys had long been residents of Virginia, removing from there to Georgia, where Mr. Hundley was reared. He was a school mate of Alexander Stephens, the latter's father being their teacher. George M. Settles and his wife had three children, two daughters and a son, the son being our subject. His father enlisted in the Confederate army, and during his absence from home both the little girls and the mother died, and William went to live with his grandfather Hundley. After the war was over, and his father was married again and had purchased a farm in Alabama, and gone there to reside, young Settles was given his choice of going to live with his father or remaining with his grandparents: he chose the latter. His grandfather owned a flouring mill near Opelika, and in the mill, when not attending the academy of that place, William spent his boyhood days.

When he had reached his eighteenth year, both his grandparents having died, Mr. Settles started out to make his own way in the world. After teaching school several terms, he and a partner engaged in the grocery business in his native town, under the firm name of Settles & Company. While in business there, he served two years as Clerk of the City Council. This was in 1881 and '82. In the meantime he studied law under the instructions of General George P. Harrison of Opelika, and was admitted to the bar there.

It was in 1883 that Mr. Settles emigrated to Helena, his arrival here being on the 13th of July, and his capital at that time consisting of $65. He accepted a position in the abstract office of Richard Lockey, and continued therein for over a year. Then he took charge of a gen-

CHAPTER IX.

THE GOLDEN ROAD TO MONTANA—ORO FINO—ELK CITY—THE MOUNT IDAHO MINES A "RUSH."

THERE is a sort of Freemasonry among miners and all sorts of honest men of the gold mines. The men of the placer gold mines are and have been from the days of the modern Argonauts a sort of civilized advance army. They are men who have stepped to the front from out of the millions. It is their courage, enterprise and audacity of faith that has set them to the front; besides, they are generally men of good sense, good physique, good education. Travel—for they all had to travel much and have much intercourse with traveled men to reach the gold mines, whether in Arizona or Montana—gave to even the rudest of them a sort of polish not found so general in any other large body of men on the globe. You can always find more sincere manhood and real politeness in a mining camp with its sprinkle of cattlemen, grangers and the like than in the average crowds of London and Paris.

Being among the first in the new mines of Oro Fino in the spring of 1861, I found myself, for reasons before set down, at once among friends and friends of the best; for these miners of Pierce City and Oro Fino were not only gentlemen of the class described but they were, many of them, old personal friends from northern California. It was the glorious old Yuba and Shasta days over again and they were very happy and hopeful.

Pierce City at this date was a brisk town, neatly laid out, built of hewn logs, brooks through the streets, pine trees here and there on the gently-sloping hillside to the sun, with white tents all around and up and down the mountain of dark woods to the east, red-shirted men, mules, long lines of laden, braying mules, half-tame Indians with pack paniers, a few soldiers off duty, crowds of eager people coming and going,—action, motion everywhere. The old days had come again, we all believed, and miners who had missed Fortune in other lands and laid blame onto themselves, resolved not to miss her favors now, if work could win them.

eral merchandise store at Timberline, for C. W. Hoffman & Company. In the spring of 1886, he succeeded Junius G. Sanders, as chief clerk in the Land Office, in which position he remained until February 1, 1890, when he resigned in order to become a member of the land and mining law firm of Nelson & Settles. Mr. Nelson having had long experience in the United States Land Office, at Washington, D. C., and Mr. Settles being experienced in the local land affairs of Montana, gives them decided advantages in this department of law practice.

Politically, Mr. Settles is a Democrat. He has served his party as Assistant Secretary of the Montana State Central Democratic Committee. Since his arrival in Montana he has become identified with all her interests, and loses no opportunity to aid in the advancement of her welfare.

HON. DECIUS S. WADE.—Among the prominent names in Montana history is that of Decius S. Wade, who was born in Andover, Ashtabula county, Ohio, on the 23d day of January, 1835.

Jonathan Wade, the founder of the family in America, emigrated hither from England in 1632, and settled on the Mystic river, near Boston, at a place subsequently named Medford. Though not one of the "Pilgrim Fathers," he was of the same character and was actuated by the same principles. His descendants, among whom were two Colonial Governors of Massachusetts and Anne Bradstreet, the first poetess of our country, were active men and women during all the Colonial period. One of them, James Wade, fought at Bunker Hill and through the Revolutionary war, and subsequently became a pioneer settler of Ohio, in 1821, with his wife, nee Mary Upham,

Dennis S Wade

Oro Fino lay a brief half-hour's walk to the south at the foot of a steep, wooded mountain and in the forks of a creek of the same name and Rhodes creek. This Rhodes creek had been discovered by William Rhodes, of Siskiyou county, California. He was a manly mulatto of great good sense and very honest. Oro Fino was a hastily-built place, having tumbled together in great disorder with one narrow street and made up out of round logs and mud and brush. Compared with Pierce City it was a wild-looking place; but it was very orderly, very much in earnest, and preaching and Sunday-school here, as well as at Pierce City, came as regularly as the Sunday. There were a good many saloons in these towns, as well as up and down the creeks, but I recall no drunkeness nor depravity of any sort. Women were scarce as yet, and of children there was the merest sprinkle. But many of these first men here were expecting their families on from California and Oregon, and were not slow in their support of church and school.

"As for myself, I had studied law while teaching school after returning to Oregon from California a few years before, and having been admitted to the bar under Judge Williams, afterward President Grant's Attorney General, I had come here to practice law. But the place was so orderly, so far from any sort of disturbance or contention, that there was absolutely no business whatever in this line. I found plenty of lawyers but no law; or, rather no need of any law.

"Having two brothers with me and finding several cousins here and none of us getting any good foothold, we pushed out over the mountains to the East, toward Montana, where we found good paying-placers, built cabins, sawed-out sluice-boxes, and then under the tall, somber pine woods re-enacted the old ennobling life of the early days in the Sierras.

"Do you know the music of the pick and shovel as they clang and ring on the bedrock, the rattle and the ring of the sluice fork in the hands of the happy, tall, slim man who stands astride the sluice and slings the gravel behind him in high heaps of polished pebbles? He has a keen eye. There may be a big nugget on the tines of his broad sluice-fork at any moment. He is a supple man of not too much flesh, and keeps his footing finely on either side of the sluice-box which he bestrides. To fall will be not only to break his own knees but to endanger the backs of his dripping and bespattered partners in the pit beneath him. And now he sees and six sons and three daughters. His son, Benjamin F. Wade, was United States Senator for Ohio from 1851 to 1869, during a portion of which period he served as Vice-President. His son, Edward Wade, was for four terms member of Congress from the Cleveland district in Ohio. His son, Charles H. Wade, was born in West Springfield, Massachusetts, December 8, 1798, was a farmer in Andover, Ohio, and married Juliet Spear, also a native of Massachusetts, who was born on April 13, 1806. She was the daughter of Joshua Spear, a soldier of the Revolution, a member of one of the early Massachusetts families, who became a resident of eastern Pennsylvania. They were the parents of Decius S. Wade, the subject of this sketch. The mother died at the age of sixty-nine years, on September 15, 1875; the father at the age of eighty-seven years, on June 11, 1885.

Decius S. Wade, their second child, was educated in the public schools in his native town and in the Kingsville Academy, and at the age of sixteen commenced teaching, which occupation he continued for six winters, pursuing his academic studies when not thus engaged. During his teaching, under the supervision of his uncle, Senator Benjamin F. Wade, he read law and was admitted to the bar in September, 1857.

From the date of his admission to the bar he practiced his profession at Jefferson, Ohio, until 1860, when, at the age of twenty-five years, he was elected Probate Judge of Ashtabula county, a position of great responsibility and trust, which by re-election he held for the period of seven years. Though very young to attain judicial position (which came to him unsolicited), his decisions early showed a trained mind, careful study, a well balanced judgment, fearless courage and an obstinate regard for right and justice. In this school he laid the foundasomething glitter in the swift water that washes the gravel down across the ripples. Down goes a long, dripping arm at the risk of his neck; but somehow the rugged slim man never falls. Up goes the long, right arm in the air. A shout! The men in the pit look up all together, and then there is a shout that shakes the very pine tops above them. The gold nugget, half quartz, is nearly as big as a hen's egg. The slim man, on the high sluice-box, who holds the nugget high in the air as he laughs and shouts with the rest of us, is my brother. We have struck it! The friendly Freemasonry sort of good will and well-wishing among miners spread the news in a day or two to Pierce City and Oro Fino, and the place was soon packed with prospectors.

tions of his judicial character, full of promise for the future.

In the war of the Rebellion he enlisted in the three-months' service, and served as a "Squirrel Hunter" on the call for volunteers by Governor Tod.

He resumed the practice of law in 1867, and two years later was elected to the State Senate from the Ashtabula district and served during two sessions. During his Legislative career he took part in the great debate on the passage of the fifteenth amendment, and also made an able argument upon the subject of minority representation. While serving as State Senator, on the 17th day of March, 1871, he was appointed Chief Justice of Montana, by President Grant. He was reappointed by Presidents Grant, Hayes and Arthur, always upon the petition of members of the bar, and served as Chief Justice for four consecutive terms and until May 2, 1887.

Upon his retirement from the bench he became the senior member of the law firm of Wade, Toole & Wallace, and engaged in active practice until after his appointment, in the spring of 1890, by Governor White, as Chairman of the Commission appointed to codify the laws of Montana. For two years he devoted every energy of his trained mind to the congenial work of codification, and, with the other commissioners, produced a Civil Code, a Code of Civil Procedure, a Penal Code and a Political Code, and offered to the people of Montana, that which they had never had, a harmonious and complete system of laws. Since the completion of this work Judge Wade has continued the practice of the law, in Helena, Montana, where, with his family, he has resided for the last twenty four years.

He was married on June 3, 1863, to Bernice Galpin, a native of Weymouth, England, who brought into his life all the wealth of a noble nature, all the intuitions of refinement and culture and all the aspirations of noble womanhood. They have but one child, Clare Lyon Wade, who recently graduated at Wellesley.

In politics Judge Wade is and always has been a Republican. He loves his country and glories in its history and traditions.

A natural student, fond of reading and study, inclined to literary pursuits, an easy writer and speaker, strong in his friendships, he has gathered about him choice books, and his home is a delight to his friends. Alive to the wrongs and sufferings of humanity, he is generous and active in his efforts to improve the condition of the poor and afflicted. Honest and upright, he despises sham and hypocrisy. In his daily walk and conversation he is of pure mind and heart and carries with him wherever he goes the respect and confidence of the people.

No sketch of the life of Judge Wade would be complete which did not dwell upon his great work in Montana jurisprudence, to which he gave the heart of his life, sixteen of his best years. His long service on the bench, his patience and industry, the hardships he encountered and endured, his kindness and courtesy to the members of the bar, his encouragement and kind words to the young practitioners, his courage in doing his duty and his efforts in maintaining the law, in the punishment of crime and in the preservation of order, are matters of history, and are stored in the memories of a grateful people. Without disparaging others Judge Wade may be justly named the Father of Montana Jurisprudence. He helped to lay the foundations, and his long service enabled him to superintend the building, of the structure. The Montana Reports are an enduring monument to his name. Viewing his published opinions from a legal and from a literary standpoint it may be fairly said that considering the great number of new questions, pioneer cases and novel propositions presented to him for decision, the strength of his work as determined by the test of time, is remarkable. The new system of law which prevails in the Western region is largely his debtor. The only criticism which can be offered to his work as literature, is that his opinions are lengthy, and to this criticism the reply may be properly made that the amount of labor which devolved upon the pioneer judges was enormous; that Judge Wade writes fluently, and yet, while fully alive to the value of brevity, condenses his work with difficulty; that precedented cases may be decided in a sentence, but that most of his important decisions were reasoned out from basic principles, and it was proper and necessary that his opinions should be so thorough and complete that later travelers could not mistake the road.

Rufus Choate, with the wand of genius, has described the perfect judge: "He shall know nothing about the parties, everything about the case. He shall do everything for justice, nothing for himself; nothing for his patrons; nothing for his sovereign. If on one side is the executive power and the legislature and the people, the source of his honors, the givers of his daily bread, and on the other side an individual nameless and odious, his

"Among the newcomers was a small crowd that had made well out of Rhodes creek and now, finding nothing near us, they thought to go on across the Rocky mountains by way of the new Mullen road through Montana and descend the Missouri to their homes. I went with them. From childhood my heart had yearned to look upon the awful glories of the Yellowstone and I could now no longer resist. I could return with incoming immigrants, or, if I must, could come back alone. I had been in mountains before, and so I went and I saw what Bonneville calls the Fire Hole. But of the Yellowstone later. But even at that early date (1861) I did not find Montana entirely empty of people. Stevens and Mullen had been at work eye is to see neither great nor small, attending only to the trepidations of the balance."

If Judge Wade has not attained this high ideal, it is only because it is not for mortals to be perfect.

LEROY BEVRIDGE, one of Helena's early settlers, and one of her respected and enterprising citizens, dates his birth in Ohio, April 21, 1835. His ancestors were English. His father, Knobb Bevridge, a native of Virginia, removed to Ohio at an early day, and in that State spent the rest of his life. His wife, whose maiden name was Ann Lamb, still survives him, being now in her seventy-eighth year. She is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, as also was her worthy husband. They had two children.

Leroy Bevridge spent the first seventeen years of his life on his father's farm, where he had the benefit of a public-school education. In 1852, his adventurous spirit led him to seek his fortune in the far West. He made the journey by way of the isthmus of Panama, and upon his arrival in the Golden State engaged in mining in El Dorado county. For five years he was in the mines near Coloma, where gold was discovered by Marshall. He afterward mined on Granite creek, where he made fair wages and saved some money. In 1862, he went to San Francisco, from there by water to Portland, Oregon, and thence up the Columbia to The Dalles, where he and two others purchased three horses, packed them with provisions, and from there made the journey to Lewiston, Idaho, and from there to the Oro Phino mines. In the fall he returned to Uniontown, California, where he spent the winter. During the year 1863, he was at Placerville, spent the following year at Carson City and Virginia City, returned to California and spent another winter there, and in 1865, again went to Portland, and thence to Idaho City. After this he mined for some time on Morris creek, where he received $6 per day for his work. In the spring of 1866, he returned to Coloma, California, where he purchased 6,000 pounds of honey and from whence he shipped the same by way of San Francisco and Portland to The Dalles. He also had eleven cases of gum boots. These with the honey he packed to the gulches of Montana, and sold them to the miners. Returning to Walla Walla by way of the Mullen route, he wintered there, and in the spring of 1867, engaged in the same business, adding to his stock meerschaum pipes and overalls. Upon his return to Helena that year, he purchased an interest in a stage line, and for seven years was engaged in staging, carrying the mails from Helena to Confederate Gulch, now Diamond City.

After disposing of his mail route, Mr. Bevridge invested in Helena real estate, on which he has from time to time erected buildings. His lot on Main street, on which he has built a double brick block, then cost him $480. This is one of the best locations in the city, he having declined $1,200 per foot front for it. His other property has also greatly advanced in value, and he is now ranked with the wealthy men of the city.

October 1, 1868, Mr. Bevridge married Miss Anna Siddle, a native of Wisconsin, who came to Helena in 1864. They have had seven children, all born in Helena, four having died in early childhood. Of the others we record that Charles L., the oldest, has recently returned from college and now has charge of his father's cattle ranch; Jennie, a graduate of Mill's College, Oakland, California, is at home with her parents; and the youngest, Edwin Chester, a bright little fellow, is also at home.

Mr. Bevridge has never joined any society and is independent in his political views.

STEELE, HINDSON & COMPANY, Helena, Montana.—This firm was organized and incorporated in its present form in 1892, William Steele being president, and Joseph J. Hindson, secretary and treasurer. They are jobbers of hay, grain, flour and feed, and storage commission merchants, located at No. 1332 Bozeman street, near the Northern Pacific depot.

William Steele, president of the above named company, is a native of New York city, born in 1849. Grandfather Steele, a Scotchman by birth, emigrated to America and settled in Baltimore, Maryland, in 1800; later he resided in Brooklyn, New York, where he was an importer of Irish linen. His wife, nee Ann Vaughn, was a daughter of Lieutenant Vaughn of the Revolution. Their son, William Steele, was born in New York, in 1812; married Miss Anna Ostrom, a native of Brooklyn, and a descendant of an old Colonial family, her maternal grandfather, John Faulkner, also having been a patriot soldier in the Revolution. William Steele was a wholesale dry goods merchant in New York. He died in Philadelphia in 1887, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, and his wife died in 1870. They had six children, the subject of our sketch being the third son and fourth child.

Mr. Steele received his education in New York city, and was employed as a bookkeeper there until 1880. That year he came to Helena, and accepted a position as on the military road, which was to tie the head-waters of the Missouri and Columbia together, for years; and all along the road till we left it and descended to the Yellowstone, where we found a party of French Canadians cutting hay, we saw ranches on either hand, partially on the streams. We never had to camp quite alone all the distance of the Mullen road. No, Montana was not entirely a wilderness, even before gold was found; though it is to be admitted that we saw no white woman, except among the immigrants whom we met on their way further west. Strangely enough we saw not one Indian either going to or returning from the Yellowstone, save some tame ones loafing about the ranches and trading posts by the way. The bookkeeper for Gans & Klein, with whom he remained ten years. In 1890, he severed his connection with that firm in order to engage in his present business, in which he has met with signal success.

He was married in 1882, to Miss Adelaide Bailey, a native of Allegan, Michigan, and daughter of Jacob Bailey of that State. They have one child, Anna.

Mr. Steele is one of the Wardens of St. Peter's Episcopal Church

Joseph J. Hindson, secretary and treasurer of the firm of Steele, Hindson & Company, was born in Liverpool, England, in 1850, son of one of Liverpool's wholesale grain merchants. Joseph J. assisted his father, and early in life became thoroughly informed in regard to every detail of the grain business. In 1874, he emigrated to America, and in Canada accepted a position as book keeper for the well known firm of Sanford & Evans, with whom he remained as bookkeeper and also as confidential clerk for a period of twelve years. He left them in 1891, to engage with the firm out of which grew the firm of Steele, Hindson & Company.

Mr. Hindson was married in 1875, to Miss Amelia Bamford, a native of England, and a descendant of the distinguished English family of Bamfords. They have three children, Isabelle, Mary H. and Joseph.

Mr. Hindson is a member of the Masonic fraternity, in which he has taken a deep interest, holding nearly all the offices in all its branches, now being Captain General of the Commandry. He is a Past Master and a member of the Grand Lodge. Politically, he is a Republican; religiously, a member of the Episcopal Church; and he is also a Trustee of St. Peter's Episcopal Hospital.

JOHN M. STEWARD, a Montana pioneer of 1863, and now a prominent music dealer of the city of Butte, is a native of the State of Missouri, born January 3, 1844, of Scotch and English ancestry. His father, George W. Steward, was born in Ohio, and married Sybil Lindley, and soon afterward moved to Missouri, where he engaged in farming, and continued to reside there until his death, which occurred in the thirty-fifth year of his age. His wife survived him but a few years, dying in 1859, and was then just the age of her husband at his death. They left five children, of whom only two are now living.

The gentleman whose name introduces this brief sketch, the second-born in the above family, was only eleven years of age when it was his misfortune to lose his father, and ever since that time he has had to care for himself, finding employment at whatever he could obtain. In 1859, when only fifteen years of age, and the same year he lost his mother, he crossed the plains, driving team for an Indian trader. In 1860, he returned to Kansas City, but in 1862 he came westward again, this time to the South Platte, where he was employed as a clerk in a store. In 1863, he went to Denver and back again to Omaha, and thence to Montana, making the journey with a mule team, and arriving at Bannack July 9, 1863, he proceeded to Alder Gulch, where he located a mine, but did not work it; he went on to Brown's Gulch and mined there till 1865, making but a little money. Next he went to Ophir Gulch and remained there till the fall of 1866, still meeting with moderate pay. He returned to Bannack and proceeded to Leesburg, in the Salmon river country, and after prospecting there all summer returned to Deer Lodge, and engaged in the restaurant and saloon business until 1874. Selling out, he made a trip to Cedar creek, in the Coeur d'Alene country, and returned to Missoula to winter. In the spring he came to Deer Lodge and on to Butte, arriving in 1875. Here he located the Little Mina quartz mine, which he worked for a number of years, taking out a considerable quantity of silver and gold. Since his first discovery in Butte he has made various other locations, which he has from time to time sold at good prices, and he has invested in Butte City property, has built several residences and has speculated in property to a considerable extent

In 1893, with W. A. Smith, he organized the Smith Piano Company, and they have engaged in the sale of organs, pianos and all other kinds of musical merchandise. They have traveling salesmen in this State and in Idaho, who sell large numbers of instruments. Their pianos are of the George Steck and other manufactures, and their organs are the Mason & Hamlin and the Whitney.

In his political predilections, Mr. Steward has always been a Democrat, and has served two years as a member of the City Council. He is a man of intelligence and ability, is self-taught, having picked up his knowledge in the dear school of experience, in the early history of Montana, and has made his own way in the world unaided. By his own pluck and courage he has attained success.

He was married in 1878, to Miss Emma Bogk, a native of Oshkosh, Wisconsin, and of German ancestry. They country for which they afterward professed to hold so sacred and dear they did not then think worth taking possession of, it would seem. We saw plenty of country, but so unlike California was the whole region that we did not care to prospect.

"On returning I found that my brothers had not realized greatly; besides, the famous Salmon river mines had been found and the wildest "stampede" ever seen had swept one of my brothers with it, and the creek was now partially abandoned."

I clip the following, by a schoolmate and my elder brother's old partner, from a San Francisco newspaper, to give some idea of a miner's 'stampede' in those days; have had nine children, all born in Montana, but four are deceased. The surviving children are: Walter F., Arthur W., Araminta, Della and Ethel.

R. P. R. GORDON, M. D., of Great Falls, is one of Montana's most skilled physicians and surgeons.

He is a native of the Highlands of Scotland, and was born in the town of Tain, Ross-shire, November 18, 1861. The Gordons were one of Scotland's most powerful clans at one time, but as years passed by they became divided against each other, and in this way their numbers were reduced and their power lost. The doctor's branch of the family, has for several generations, been composed principally of professional men—lawyers, doctors and ministers. His father, the Rev. John Gordon, was a graduate of Aberdeen University, and was a clergyman of the Free Church, of Scotland. He married Miss Flora Ross Smith, a native of his own country, and they became the parents of seven children. When the doctor was four years old, his mother died, and two years later, his father passed away, the latter being in the forty-eighth year of his age at the time of his death His grand aunt Ross took him to raise, and five years afterward, she too died. He then entered the Royal Academy, of Tain, and remained there until his sixteenth year, when he became a student in the Glasgow University. He graduated as Master of Arts, in the latter institution, in 1882. From there he went to Edinburgh University, where he graduated in 1886, with the degree of M. B. C. M.

He spent a year and eight months in practice with Dr. William Bruce, who was elected as representative for Scotland, to the General Medical Council, of Great Britian and Ireland. About this time, the doctor's brother, Charles Gordon, an attorney-at-law in Minneapolis, was taken sick, and the doctor came to America to treat him. Upon his recovery, they came together to Montana, and were intending to go to Australia. They arrived at Great Falls, March 30, 1888, and, seeing the great falls of the Missouri river at this point, the splendid town site, and the wonderful prospects in store for the place, the doctor decided to remain and open an office, which he did, and here he has met with eminent success, not only in a professional way, but also financially, as he has made some valuable investments. His fame as a physician and surgeon has extended beyond the bounds of Great Falls and vicinity and he is frequently called as far as two hundred miles to perform difficult surgical operations. He is surgeon for the Great Falls & Canada Railroad Company, and until he resigned, in 1893, was surgeon of the Sisters' Hospital at Great Falls. He is a member of the Northern Montana Medical Society, the Montana State Medical Society, the National Association of Railroad Surgeons, and the Royal Medical Society, of Edinburgh, Scotland. He is also a Knight of Pythias and an Elk.

Dr. Gordon was married November 7, 1892, to Miss Isabelle Maupin, a native of Alabama, and a daughter of Judge Robert Maupin, of that State. Her father was a Colonel in the Confederate service during the late war.

Ever since he located at Great Falls, Dr. Gordon has been thoroughly identified with its interests, and is regarded as one of its most enterprising and progressive citizens.

EUGENE BURFORD BRADEN, manager of the United States Public Sampling Works, at Helena, Montana, dates his birth at Indianapolis, Indiana, May 12, 1864.

Mr. Braden is of Irish descent. His great-grandfather Braden was born in Ireland and emigrated from that country to this, settling in Pensylvania. On one side of his ancestry belonged the noted Robb family. William Braden, the father of Eugene B., was born in Pennsylvania in 1820. He married Miss Martha B. Burford, a native of Kentucky, and on her mother's side a descendant of the Old Virginia family of Ruckers. After their marriage he removed to Indiana, and at Indianapolis in 1844 founded a blank book and publishing business, in which he continued until 1880, when his death occurred. His widow is still living. They had a family of four children, all of whom survive with the exception of the eldest.

Eugene Braden, the second son in the family was educated in Indianapolis and Kentucky, and began life for himself as a railroader, first as ticket agent at Indianapolis. Next he was at San Francisco, general agent for the Manitoba road, and afterward at Los Angeles as general agent for the Chicago & Northwestern. To him belongs the distinction of having sold at Helena the first ticket and made the first way bill for the Great Northern Railroad. In 1887 he was cashier of the Montana Central Railroad. After this he went back to California, but a year and a half later returned to Helena, and since October, 1890, has been with his brother in the United States Public Sampling Works, occupying his present position.

The business of the above named company consists in sampling ores and selling to the various smelters. They have business relations with the following firms: United Smelting & Refining Company, owning the Great Falls &

"Although there were in this then distant land of Idaho no telegraph wires or other means of rapid communication, the discovery of new gold fields or a rich strike made within the boundaries of the Territory traveled with the rapidity of a carrier pigeon. Apparently one caught the news from the breezes. No one could give the source of the whisperings that a new find was reported. It was sufficient to the toilers and prospectors that such were the reports without investigating whence they came. These reports grew as they traveled. They were passed from cabin to cabin along down the gulches and across the flats and bars. Tom would tell Bill that near the bedrock they were getting five cents to the pan. Bill would inform Sam that in the new 'diggings' they were getting ten cents right in the grass roots. And thus it kept on increasing as it traveled until it would reach a dollar or two to the pan.

"In the fall of 1861 reports began to be noised about Oro Fino that new places had been discovered on the head-waters of the Salmon river which were said to be fabulously rich. The East Helena Smelting Works; Omaha & Grant Smelting & Refining Company, Omaha, Nebraska; Globe Smelting & Refining Company, Denver, Colorado; Tacoma Smelting & Refining Company, Tacoma, Washington; and all the large smelting and refining works of Montana. As soon as ores of their sampling are shipped the purchaser pays the market or stipulated price and the miner receives his returns without having to await the arrival of the ore at its destination. This proves a convenient method of marketing ore.

June 5, 1894, Mr. Braden received from President Cleveland the appointment of assayer in charge of the Helena United States Assay Office, and took charge of the office during the succeeding month.

Mr. E. B. Braden is a member of the Order of Elks and is at present filling one of its important offices. An obliging and capable business man, he is on the best of terms with the citizens of Helena.

HON. ALBERT J. SELIGMAN, vice-president of the American National Bank of Helena, and one of Montana's successful business men, dates his birth in New York city, February 24, 1859. His father, Jesse Seligman, emigrated from Germany when he was seventeen years old and first located in New York city. Subsequently he became one of California's pioneers, and in partnership with his brothers was prominently engaged in the clothing business in San Francisco for a number of years. They were also clothing merchants and manufacturers in New York city, and later became bankers in the latter city, doing business under the firm name of W. Seligman & Company, which has become one of the greatest banking firms in the country. In addition to their banking interests in New York the company also carry on business in Montana and other States.

Albert J. Seligman was reared in New York and was educated at the Rensselaer Polytechnic School, where he graduated in 1878. After that he spent three years and a half in Freiburg, Saxony, and Liege, Belgium, studying mining. In 1881 he came to Helena, Montana, purchased stock in several paying mines, and has since been largely interested in developing this great industry in Montana. Since coming to Montana he has also made investments here for his father. Aside from his investments in mines, Mr. Seligman has been interested in various other enterprises, and in whatever he has undertaken prosperity has attended his efforts. He has been president of several railroad companies; is president of the Bach, Cory & Company wholesale grocery firm of Helena, conceded to be the largest house of the kind in the State; and is vice-president of the American National Bank. He is largely interested in stock raising, principally horses and cattle; and has dealt extensively in real estate. In short, ever since coming to Montana he has identified himself with and taken an active part in every measure having for its aim the development and prosperity of the country. Thus he soon acquired the confidence and esteem of the business men of the State of his adoption, and he was chosen by his fellow citizens of the Republican party, of which he is a stanch member, to represent them in the Territorial Legislature in 1886. He had the honor of being chairman of the Republican State Central Committee during the time of the severe struggle over the election of State Senators. In 1892 he was chairman of the delegation from Montana to the Republican National Convention at Minneapolis, and was elected Treasurer of the State Central Committee, which latter honor, however, he declined.

Mr. Seligman is a member of the Knights of Pythias, and was Grand Chancellor of the State of Montana in 1890. He is also a member of the B. P. O. E.

Mr. Seligman was married in 1886 to Miss Lillie Glazier, a native of New York and a daughter of Isaac Glazier, her father having been a member of the firm of I. & S. Glazier, of San Francisco. Mr. and Mrs. Seligman have two children, Jesse and Lorraine. He is prominent in the social circles of Helena, and was chairman of the committee engaged in the erection of the Montana Club building. Jesse Seligman died at Hotel Del Coronado, Coronado Beach, California, on April 23, 1894, of Bright's disease, aged sixty-seven years.

matter was discussed by the miners during the day while shoveling gravel and sand in their sluice-boxes. At night they would gather in their cabins and discuss the probabilities by the snapping of log fires. Then it was noised about that the Smith boys from Pierce's bar had left their claims and disappeared in the direction of the new El Dorado, and again parties from Ore Grande and Rhodes creek were making preparations to start. Later, information was circulated about the camp that two men had just arrived for the purpose of laying in a stock of supplies, and who confirmed the previous reports as to the richness and extent of the new find. The old miners who had had many visions and dreams of wealth to be obtained just

EDWIN WARREN TOOLE, one of Montana's most eminent lawyers, was born in Savannah, Andrew county, Missouri, on the 24th of March, 1839. His parents, Edwin and Lucinda (Shepard) Toole, emigrated from the State of Kentucky to Missouri in 1837 and settled at Savannah, at which place they reared a large and highly respected family, most of whom are still living and residing in Montana. Edwin Toole was a lawyer by profession, was over twenty years Clerk of the District Court of his county, and resigned his position before coming to Montana, some eight years ago. His life has been a most exemplary one, and now in his eighty-sixth year retains to a very extraordinary degree his vigorous mental faculties and physical health. All his brothers and sisters, six in number, are still living and a remarkable incident of longevity. Our subject's mother died in her seventy-seventh year.

Edwin W. Toole, the oldest living son of his father's family, was reared in his native town and was educated in her public schools and in the Masonic College at Lexington, Missouri, at which place the Hon. S. B. Elkins and himself represented the Philologian Society, and the Hon. W. Y. Pemberton, now Chief Justice of this State, and the Hon. Jerry Craven, ex-member of Congress from Missouri, represented the Erodelphian Society in their annual debate at the closing exercises of that institution in 1860. He came to Montana in 1863, where he has since been engaged in the practice of his profession, and during all these years he has been connected, as counsel, with most of the prominent lawsuits of the country, meeting with marked success and gaining a most enviable reputation as one of the most able and talented lawyers of the State. Among the important cases in which he has recently appeared may be mentioned the noted Davis will case, St. Louis Mining Company vs. Montana Company (Limited), involving the extension of the famous Drum Lummon Lode; and Northern Pacific Railroad Company vs. Richard P. Barden et al.: upon the decision of the latter depended the right to millions of acres of valuable mineral lands within the limits of the railroad grant. In this case he was employed by Hon. Martin Maginnis, Land Commissioner for the State, in favor of the interest of the miners and against the railroad company. He prepared and filed the first and original brief in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case, and that court, out of its usual course in such matters, makes the following complimentary reference and quotation from his brief and argument: "As justly observed by counsel for defendant in their very able brief, the reservation in the grant of mineral lands was intended to keep them under Government control for the public good in the development of the mineral resources of the country and the benefit of the miner and explorer, instead of compelling him to litigate or capitulate with a stupendous corporation and ultimately succumb to such terms, subject to such conditions, and amenable to such servitudes, as it might see proper to impose. The Government has exhibited its beneficence in reference to its mineral lands as it has in the disposition of its agricultural lands, where the claims and rights of the settlers are fully protected. The privilege of exploring for mineral lands was in full force at the time of the location of the definite line of the road and was reserved and excepted out of the grant to plaintiff."

During his long professional career he has become largely interested in mines and mining, and is a stockholder in many valuable mines. He has invested largely in real estate in Helena and elsewhere, and is now an owner of the north portion of the Merchants' National Bank Building, one of the most beautiful and costly buildings in the city.

While Mr. Toole has always been a stanch Democrat he has never desired and at all times declined nominations for office, with one exception. Early in his history he defeated the Hon. James M. Cavanaugh, a great favorite of the Irish people, in the nomination of a candidate for Congress. The Irish vote on this account became disaffected and Mr. Toole was in turn defeated at the polls. Since this time he has declined all such honors, preferring to give his whole time and attention to his extensive law practice, and for similar reasons he has never connected himself with any of the secret and fraternal societies of the country. The law and matters growing out of it have therefore wholly absorbed his time, and his faithful and earnest efforts in this direction have secured for him the confidence of the people and high position he holds as a lawyer.

No estimate of the character of Mr. Toole would be either complete or just unless it considered him in his threefold capacity of citizen, lawyer and business man. First of all, as a citizen, he is a man of great public spirit and is in feeling and character a typical Western man. From the beginning, Mr. Toole has seen, with a vision clearer than most men, not only the probabilities over the ridge were soon worked up to fever heat. Horses and mules to pack supplies were in great demand. Any kind of an animal would bring four times the price it would have brought a few months before.

"Like other contagions this mining fever is catching, and when it strikes you the only remedy is to go. You do not stop to consider the hardships, but only have the wish to reach the promised land, and acquire the glittering metal that whuld serve to make the folks at home happy. How many of such hopes have been blasted? Yet those hopes and expectations were the incentives which caused the pioneers to push out into the snow-covered mountains and broad valleys and lay the foundation for civilization.

but also the possibilities of this great West; and what a quarter of a century or more ago he so clearly saw, and what so confidently expected, he has diligently labored to realize. Endowed by nature with what has been happily termed "a legal mind," his mentality is such that the law alone seems to afford it the fullest intellectual scope. A diligent student from the beginning of his career, he has acquired an unusually profound knowledge of the law, which a well disciplined memory places absolutely at his command. In the practice of law he is noted for the great care given to the preparation of his cases, the ability with which they are argûed and the ingenuity with which they are tried. From his first appearance at the Montana bar, down to the present time, he has maintained the reputation of being the equal of the best of his colleagues in the mastery of the law, and is regarded as a most formidable adversary in the practice of his profession. There is an ease and method in his pleadings which gives them wonderful effectiveness and has stamped him as an able and forcible advocate. His attitude toward the younger members of his profession, and especially those who have ability and worth, is particularly kind, helpful and gently paternal and always encouraging. In consequence few men have warmer friends among the lawyers of the State. In his conduct of business enterprises he has derived decided assistance from his intimate knowledge of law. It is this ready application of knowledge which has proven of service, and it is this ability on his part to command at all times the resources of his mind and experience that makes him the virile factor he has proved to be in all his positions and connections. It is pleasant to record that the community in which Mr. Toole resides is in no way backward in recognizing these facts and gives honor where honor is due.

V. CHARLES RINDA, one of Helena's respected pioneers, is a native of Vienna, Austria. His father, Antone Rinda, came to America in 1853 and settled first at Dubuque, Iowa, whence three years later he removed to Minnesota. He settled on a farm in the latter State and spent the rest of his life there, his death occurring in the seventieth year of his age. His wife died in Dubuque. Four of their five children are still living, the subject of our sketch being the second born.

V. Charles Rinda received his early education in his native place, and after their coming to America he continued his studies in Dubuque. He then learned the trade of saddler and the carriage-making business, but soon afterward turned his attention to the boating business and was engaged in steamboating on the Mississippi river. In 1862 he worked for Mr. Banprie, a well-known man in the West and one of the first settlers of St. Paul. After leaving his employ Mr. Rinda went to St. Louis and from there came up the Missouri river in the spring of 1864 to Omaha, crossed the plains to Soda Springs on Snake river, prospected for a short time and went to Idaho City and then back to East Bannack on the Salmon river. He then mined and prospected for a short time. In 1867 he came to Helena and remained here until the fall of the following year, when he returned to his home in Minnesota. He remained, however, only a short time, for the next year we find him back in Montana again. He spent a portion of the year 1870 in Missoula county, but in the fall he returned to Helena and has since continued to reside here. All these years he has been engaged in prospecting and mining. He was one of the discoverers of the Jay Gould mine, the East Pacific and other properties, and made considerable money. In 1876, in company with Mark Sklower, he purchased the International Hotel, built additions to it, and ran it until 1881, being successful in the enterprise. In 1881 they purchased the ground on which the Grand Central Hotel stands. Mr. Rinda built the foundation of the hotel, then induced Mr. Reed to take an interest in the enterprise, and together they completed the erection of the building, which they opened May 7, 1885. Mr. Rinda conducted it alone until 1892, when he sold a half interest to his partner for $45,000, and since then Mr. Rinda has been partly retired from active business. He still, however, has large mining interests, being the owner of several quartz mines in Jefferson county, the best among them being the Fohner, Moorse and Shuster. He also has large copper mining interests at Ridersburg.

Mr. Rinda was married in 1871 to Miss Emma Will. Two children were born to them in Helena: Mamie and Theodore W. Mrs. Rinda died in 1873, and in 1875 Mr. Rinda married Miss Charlotte Allbright, whose untimely death occurred when her only child, Allbright, was fifteen months old. In 1878 Mr. Rinda was again married, the maiden name of his present wife being Addie N. Rodda. They have had four children: Blanche N., Charles J., Bennie and Harrison, the last named dying at the age of four years.

In those days of excitement I imbibed the feeling of unrest. Visions of a rich claim and independence and plenty overcame all other considerations. I must go; but how? I consulted with John Miller, an old friend and a brother of Joaquin. He was one of God's noblemen. A better man than he never lived. True, generous, kind-hearted, with a nature as gentle as a woman's. In time of danger he never flinched. He was the straightest of straight goods. His value was attested when he laid down his life with 60,000 others at the battle of Gettysburg in defense of his country and his country's flag. I knew this man before whom I laid my plans. He signified his willingness to join me provided we could secure transportation.

Mr. Rinda is a member of the A. O. U. W. and of the American League of Honor, and in politics is a Republican. Active and enterprising, he has done his full share in the upbuilding and improving of Helena.

HON. EUGENE A. STEERE, Superintendent of Public Instruction for the State of Montana, was born in Cooperstown, Otsego county, New York, March 25, 1857. He is of English descent. His father, Joseph L. Steere, also a native of Otsego county, was born in 1823; his mother, whose maiden name was Roxana Cole, was likewise a native of the Empire State. Both are worthy members of the Christian Church, and their lives have been characterized by useful activity. Six of their eight children are still living, Eugene A. being the next to the youngest of the family.

Professor Steere, the subject of our sketch, spent the first eleven years of his life on his father's farm in New York, attending the public schools and doing chores. In 1868 his parents removed with their family to Sparta, Wisconsin, where his father purchased a farm and where he still continues to reside. At Sparta young Steere completed a high-school course, and from there went to the State University of Wisconsin, where he graduated with honor in June, 1881. From that time until 1887 he was employed as principal of the Kilbourn City schools, meeting with marked success in that position. In 1887 he came to Montana to take charge of the high school at Butte City. During the three years he was principal of the school there he did much toward bringing its standard up to the present high standing. At the expiration of three years he accepted the superintendency of the Dillon schools, his services there, as elsewhere, being characterized by great enthusiasm and rendering satisfaction to both pupils and patrons. During the whole of his career as an educator he has taken deep interest in teachers' institutes and associations. He is a member of the National Teachers' Association, and attended its meeting at St. Paul in 1890, where he read a paper on "The High School and Mass Education." At that meeting he was elected Vice-President of the Association. In 1891 he was elected President of the Montana State Teachers' Association. The deep interest he took in these associations and the time he devoted to them and to the general work of education in Montana gave him prominence as one of the most capable educators in the State, and in 1892 he was chosen by the people for the important office of State Superintendent of Instruction. In this office he is now serving in a most creditable manner. There is no question but that the public school system of Montana will be greatly benefitted by his efforts

August 11, 1885, Professor Steere married Miss Susie Couvillion, a native of Wisconsin and a daughter of Joseph Couvillion, a descendant of one of the French families who were among the first settlers of Detroit, Michigan. Professor and Mrs. Steere have two children, Metta Elizabeth and Joseph Maynard.

Professor Steere is an Elder in the Presbyterian Church at Dillon, is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and his political affiliations are with the Republican party. He has made many warm friends since coming to Montana.

JOHN T. MURPHY is a native of Missouri, his birth having occurred in Platte county, February 26, 1842.

William S. Murphy, the father of John T., was a native of the State of Pennsylvania. He married Miss Amelia Tyler, who was also a native of Pennsylvania, and they became the parents of two children, of whom the subject of this sketch was the first born.

John T. Murphy was reared to farm life in Missouri and received his education there. In 1859, when seventeen years of age, he started out in life on his own responsibility, coming as far west as Colorado, and there securing employment as a clerk. In 1860 he went to Nevada City, Colorado, and engaged in business on his own account. He conducted a general merchandise business there for a year and a half. Then he sold out and engaged in the wagon transfer business. In 1864 he came to Virginia City, Montana, with a wagon train of merchandise, and after selling out he returned to Nebraska City, Nebraska. The following spring he loaded a wagon train with merchandise, also shipped goods by steamer on the Missouri river, and brought all to Helena, where he opened a store July 1, 1865. His stock brought good prices in gold-dust, and he did a prosperous and remunerative business. As his trade and capital increased he established several branch stores, and conducted a successful mercantile business until the fall of 1890, when he disposed of his business in Helena. He is still, however, interested in merchandising at Great Falls. He had not been long in Helena until he discovered that there was money to be made in the stock business, and he has all these years been more or less interested in raising sheep and cattle. In 1890 he became one of the organizers of the Helena National Bank, and was elected

"I started out the next day with bright hopes and light steps. We required two animals to carry sufficient supplies to last us a portion of the winter. I put in the time from early morn until dewy eve and failed to find a single horse or mule for sale. The next day I was more successful. About one mile below Pierce City I found a party who owned a horse and an ox. He persistently refused to sell the horse unless I would purchase the ox. He assured me that he would pack quite as well as an ordinary mule, but might not be as swift on foot. We finally agreed upon the price and I paid over the sum and took possession. John was disposed to object to the ox, but said that he would stand pat on the proposition.

its president. He was also one of the organizers of the Montana Savings Bank, and one of its directors. After the death of Col. C. A. Broadwater, president of the Montana National Bank, the directors looked about for a suitable financier to succeed him, and after much thought and the due exercise of judgment in the matter, John T, Murphy was selected as the man best adapted for the important position. He therefore resigned the presidency of the Helena National Bank and entered upon the duties of the presidency of this great financial institution, for which by large experience it is conceded he is so admirably fitted.

In 1871 Mr. Murphy was married to Miss Elizabeth T. Morton, a native of Clay county, Missouri, and the daughter of William Morton. They have four children, all natives of Montana, their names being William M., Francis D., Addie M. and John T., Jr. They reside in one of Helena's beautiful homes.

Mr. Murphy is in politics a Democrat, but politics has only claimed enough of his attention to enable him to vote intelligently, which is the duty of every good citizen. He has during his long business career in Helena made a most enviable record, and few men in the State are held in higher esteem than he.

Albert Gallatin Clarke, of Helena, was born in Terre Haute, Indiana, April 7, 1822. His ancestors emigrated from Scotland to this country, and were among the early settlers of Connecticut. His father, Thomas H. Clarke, was born in New York in 1793, and was for many years engaged in business at Batavia. He was drafted for service in the war of 1812, but hired the afterward well-known Thurlow Weed, of New York, to be his substitute. Thomas H. Clarke married, in Terre Haute, Miss Mary Dickson, who was born in Ohio in 1800 and was of German and Irish ancestry. Here they reared their family of six children, two of whom are now living. The mother died in 1858, and the father passed away in 1873. Both were people of high respectability, and the mother was a devoted member of the Methodist Church.

When Albert G. Clarke arrived at his nineteenth year he started out to make his own way in the world. First he went to Andrew county, Missouri, where he secured employment as a farm hand at $13 per month. Saving his wages until 1849, he at that time opened up a small mercantile business at Savannah, where he continued until 1858, meeting with fair success. That year he sold out and went to St. Joseph, Missouri, where he conducted business until 1862. In 1862 he hauled his goods with ox teams across the plains to Denver, Colorado, then a little town, and there he soon disposed of his stock at a fair profit. The following year he returned to St. Joseph, and in 1864 purchased a stock of hardware and crockery, loaded the same on ox wagons, and again made the trip across the plains, this time to Virginia City, Montana, where he opened up a store and remained about one year. In the meantime Helena began to grow, and as it was nearer the head of navigation than Virginia City, he thought best to change the location of his store, and in 1865 removed his stock to Helena. For a number of years he was in partnership with Thomas Conrad, the firm name being Clarke & Conrad. Later J. C. Curtin was taken into the firm, and the name became Clarke, Conrad & Curtin. After the death of Mr. Conrad the partners purchased his interest, and Mr. Curtin and Mr. Clarke continued together. The latter has retired for some years, and the former now has sole charge of the establishment. Their whole business career has been characterized by honorable and upright dealings.

Believing there was a great profit to be made in stock raising in Montana, Mr. Clarke in 1864 brought across the plains about 300 head of cattle, a part of them being thoroughbred Durhams. Since then he has been almost constantly interested in this industry, and has owned as high as 6,000 head of cattle at one time. He has also invested largely in real estate, both in city and country and has been interested in the development of several mines. In 1889 he built a costly and beautiful residence on the corner of Rodney and State streets, Helena, which commands a magnificent view of the city, the valley and mountains, and here he resides in the enjoyment of his well-earned prosperity. He was one of the organizers of the Montana National Bank, in which he has since been a stockholder, and in which at one time he served as director and vice-president.

Mr. Clarke was married in 1850, on the 15th of October, to Miss Eliza Ann Burns, a native of Clay county, Missouri, whose birth occurred in 1825, she being a daughter of Jeremiah Burns. They became the parents of five children, of whom we record that Madora is now the wife of William B. Raleigh, of the firm of Raleigh & Clarke, of Helena; Charles A. is a member of the above firm; Albert G., Jr., is an attorney of Helena; and William H. is in Chicago. In 1865 while Mrs. Clarke was en route to Montana to join her husband she died at Nebraska City, Fred. Gamer.

"The day for our start finally came, and we led our animals from the corral down to the store where our 'grub' was ready to be packed upon them. I placed the cross-horse pack-saddle on the ox while John held the rope looped about his horns. Then I lashed securely to the saddle flour, bacon, beans and other supplies. I soon discovered that I had overlooked one important matter: I had neglected to place the crupper. When I did so the frightened animal clamped his tail down upon it like a vise. A Kansas blizzard was not in it. John was jerked to the ground, lost his hold and the model pack animal made his way bellowing down the street at a two-forty gait. People rushed out on the sidewalk and halloed at the top of their voices, Whoa! This only increased his fright and speed. A block away the saddle turned under his belly. Flour, bacon and beans remained only in suspension until the law of gravitation landed them in the middle of the street. The cargo was a complete wreck, and was strewn along the trail of the stampeded ox until he was stopped by some miners at the upper end of the street.

Nebraska. Two years later Mr. Clarke married Mrs. Sarah Meek, whose death occurred three years later; and in 1879 he wedded Mrs. Sarah C. Morgan, his present companion.

Mr. Clarke has been a Democrat all his life, He held the office of County Commissioner for two years, but resigned that position because he could not give it his attention, and since then has persistently declined office. He was made a Master Mason in Savannah, Missouri, about fifty years ago, was initiated into the Royal Arch degree at St. Joseph, and at Weston became a Sir Knight. He has filled various official positions in all these, and in Montana has aided in the organization of several Masonic lodges. For half a century he has been an active and useful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and for a number of years has served as trustee of the church in Helena. Few men in this city have lived a purer or more useful life than has Albert G. Clarke.

Frederick Gamer, a prominent Helena business man since 1868, is a native of Germany, born December 30, 1844. His father, Charles Gamer, emigrated with his wife and nine children to the United States in 1861, bringing with him $3,000 in cash, and purchasing a farm in the State of Illinois, where he resided up to the time of his death, which occurred in 1872, in the sixty-third year of his age. He was a man of high integrity, and in religion was a Lutheran. Possessing a fine physique and great energy, his life was one of useful activity. He died suddenly of heart failure. His wife survived him only three years. All of their children are still living.

Frederick was the fourth born in his father's family. He was educated and learned the shoemaker's trade in Germany, and was seventeen years of age when they came to the United States. His first work here was in Chicago, where he remained from 1861 until 1866. Then he went to Denver, Colorado, where he worked a year, clerking in a shoe store owned by J. P. Fink & Co. They sent him to Georgetown, Colorado, where he had charge of a store for them for a year. They then started the business in Helena, and Mr. Gamer came and took charge of it for them. Later he acquired an interest in the firm, and in 1872 his partners sold out to him. The brick block Mr. Gamer built in 1882, and in which he now manages his large business, No. 17 South Main street, stands on the site where they first began operations in 1867, it having proved one of the best locations in Helena. In 1869 he established a branch store at Deer Lodge. He has also had one at Anaconda, and he now has a large store and business in Butte. In 1873 he built a residence in Helena, where he still resides. Eight miles from Helena he owns a section of land which he has developed into one of the best farms in Montana, and where he is devoting some attention to the raising of fine Norman-Percheron horses.

In 1862 Mr. Gamer united with the Methodist Church and became a charter member of the church at Helena, of which he has ever since been a most devoted member and pillar. He has been a most efficient church officer, and to him is much credit due for the active part he took in building their fine church edifice on Broadway,—a credit alike to the membership and to the city. He also became one of the founders of, and a large contributor to, the Montana University, and holds the important relation of treasurer to both it and the church; so that in these lines it will take eternity to tell the good done by his liberality. While not giving much of his time to political matters, Mr. Gamer has consistently adhered to the doctrines of the Republican party, and has been elected and has served both on the School Board of the city and as a member of the City Council. During his residence in Helena he has proven himself to be one of her most progressive and liberal citizens.

Mr. Gamer's married life has been a most happy one. April 9, 1872, he married Miss Emma M. Fink, a native of St. Joseph, Missouri. Their family consists of four sons and two daughters, all born in Helena, and named as follows: Milton A., Charles W., John F., Walter, Ada M. and Emma. Mrs. Gamer is also a most efficient member of the Methodist Church.

Mr. Gamer is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and is Past Master of the A. O. U. W. He and his wife are well known and highly esteemed in Montana.

Miller was a man who never used profane language, or told a story that was not suitable for the parlor,or the most refined taste; but as he witnessed our supplies flying in the air I could hear him whispering fool, idiot and similar terms of endearment. However, we took more precaution the next day and led our train out of Oro Fino amid the cheer of the populace.

"The first day out we arrived at a station kept by Mr. Powjade, who is now Lieutenant Governor of Nevada. As he was out of meat we had no difficulty in trading our pack ox to him for a measly-looking cayuse, which was so poor that we felt sure that he could not make a very determined effort to bankrupt us.

"We arrived at the mouth of Slate creek without accident or incident. Slate creek is a small stream running down from the mountains and emptying into the Salmon river. Here was the last inhabited station before reaching the mines. A small tent village had sprung up at this place;—a kind of supply station. One of the tents was supplied with provisions in limited quantities; another had pretensions as a butcher

NICHOLAS KESSLER, one of the prominent and enterprising business men of Helena, Montana, is a native of the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, Germany, born May 26, 1833. His youth and early manhood were spent in Germany, and in 1854 he emigrated to America, landing here in January of that year and locating in Sandusky, Ohio. In 1856 he removed from Sandusky to Chicago, where he was engaged in the commission business until the winter of 1859-60, then starting for Pike's Peak, Colorado. He arrived in Colorado in time to aid in the elections of the first Recorder of California Gulch, where Leadville is now located. During the summer and fall of 1860 he was engaged in mining there, then mined in Montgomery, Colorado, until 1862, and from that time until August, 1863, was in Breckenridge, same State. September 22, 1863, he landed in Virginia City, Montana, and for one year was engaged in the liquor business at that place. In 1864 he made a visit to his old friends in Germany, but returned to America the following year, and again took up his abode in Montana, this time in Helena. Since April, 1865, he has been identified with the interests of this city.

Mr. Kessler built and is the proprietor of the largest brewing establishment in the State of Montana. He owns and operates the brickyards which have furnished nearly all the brick that have been used in the buildings in Helena. He is also largely interested in Helena real estate and lands in Lewis and Clarke and Cascade counties, and has extensive stock interests besides. With the various commercial and fraternal organizations of the city he is prominently connected. He is a member of the Helena Board of Trade, the Chamber of Commerce, the Commercial Club, the Masonic fraternity, and the Order of Elks, and is recognized in Helena as one of its most progressive, liberal and enterprising citizens.

Mr. Kessler was married in New York, April 2, 1873, to Miss Louisa Ebert, who died December 18, 1880, leaving three children, two sons and one daughter. Both sons are now efficient help to their father in the management of his extensive business, while the other children are attending school.

JAMES M. SMITH, one of Montana's successful pioneer farmers, came to the Territory July 1, 1864.

He was born in North Carolina, March 30, 1833. His father, John Smith, was born in Virginia, and was a descendant of an English family, who were among the first settlers of the Old Dominion. He was born in 1800, and married Miss Martha Shields, a native of North Carolina, and of German extraction, born in 1802. After their marriage they resided in North Carolina until 1844, at which time they removed to Tennessee There, the following year, he was attacked with a pain in his head, which resulted in his death. He had been a gunsmith and a farmer, and had mined in the gold mines of North Carolina. He was also a musician and taught music; but with a family of ten children he had not been able to accumulate much, and left them poor. After his death the widowed mother kept her children together as best she could until they were all raised to maturity. She died in 1865. Of the children, seven are now living, James M. being the fifth born. They resided in North Carolina until he was twelve years of age, when they removed to Tennessee. His opportunities for an education were limited in the extreme. When our subject was sixteen years old his elder brothers left home, and upon him devolved the care of his mother and the younger children. He staid with them, worked on the farm and provided for them until he was twenty-one years of age. He then went to school six months and began to learn the millwright trade, receiving $6 per month. After working a year at this trade he turned his attention to carpenter work and followed that for about ten years in Tennessee.

January 9, 1859, he was married to Miss Mary Hauser, a native of Bavaria, Germany. April 24, 1864, accompanied by his wife, he started West. She stopped at St. Louis, Missouri, until the spring of 1865, while he came on to Montana. Upon his arrival in Montana, he prospected at Silver City for eight days. Mining had just commenced. He found in the mountains a hole in which he had a good show of gold. On Silver creek he recorded a claim, but as soon as he left it, it was jumped, and shop; still another hung out the sign 'saloon.' There was nothing unusual about the grocery store or the butcher shop; but the saloon and its occupants were not ordinary. Among the more noted of its occupants were Charley Ives, Cross-Road Jack and Billy Peples. Ives and Jack were afterward hanged in Montana by the Vigilantes. Peples was hung in Lewiston along with Scott and English. While watching the great crystal snowflakes eddying and swirling toward the ground a horseman rode up at full speed and dismounted. A dove flew up and lighted some four or five paces away. The horseman drew his revolver and fired without taking a second's aim. In fact the motion was continuous from the time the revolver was taken from its scabbard until it was returned to the belt. The ball completely severed the bird's head from its body. This man, who is an expert with the revolver, is none other than the Poet of the Sierras. I recalled this circumstance to him in after years. He quietly replied that he did not care to kill that particular dove, but there were some tough customers in the saloon tent, and he when he was through there a year later he found the men had taken $5,000 from it. Mining, however, was not his forte, and after a little he worked at his trade. His first work at Alder Gulch was to make wheelbarrows, which he sold at $25 each. After this for a time he cut cord wood in the mountains for the Thompson & Sanders sawmill. This was the first mill in the Territory, and from November to January, 1865, he furnished them with saw logs. Then he engaged in freighting with oxen, making a trip to Nelson Gulch, and, both going and coming, camped at the hot springs near where the Broadwater Hotel is now located. Returning to Virginia City to dispose of the goods he had there, he arrived on the day of the "flour riot." About 300 miners raided the town with picks, guns and sticks. They searched for the flour, took it and paid for it, and then made a division of it among the people.

As above stated, Mrs. Smith had remained in St. Louis during the winter, and in the spring of 1865 she joined her husband out here on the frontier. She made the journey up the Missouri. Just a short time previous to this ten men had been murdered by the Indians, and she had a narrow escape in passing through the territory of the hostiles. However, she reached Fort Benton in safety, bringing with her about 2,500 pounds of freight. Mr. Smith met her at Fort Benton, and with his ox team hauled her and the goods to Helena. They camped for a time on what is now Colonel Monroe's place. Afterward they decided to go to Springville and start a boarding house, but did not like it there and only remained one night. Returning to Helena, they moved in a little cabin. A few days later, when going up town, Mr. Smith heard a sale being cried, and out of curiosity went to see what it was. He learned that a squatter had taken up 160 acres in the valley, and while covering his house with slabs a wind blew one of the slabs down, it striking him on the head and killing him. Judge Hedges was selling his right to the place. To help the sale along, Mr. Smith began to bid, and unexpectedly it was struck off to him at $376. After making him a quit-claim deed, Judge Hedges came out with Mr. Smith to a high place where Rodney street is now located, and pointed down the valley saying: "It is down that way. Take the ox trail and when you come to the place you will know it. The house has been raised and the slabs to cover it are standing up against the house. There is a little corral there."

The next morning Mr. Smith loaded up his effects and he and his wife made their way to the new home. Soon he roofed the little house, and they began in earnest their life in Montana. That year Mr. Smith cut twelve tons of hay and fenced a portion of his land. He worked hard and as the years passed by made many improvements in his land, draining, fencing and cultivating. It is now a valuable stock and hay ranch. He says he has sold $45,000 worth of hay from it, and has raised no less than 1,000 head of cattle and 200 horses. He also raised large quantities of vegetables. After residing on this farm twenty-five years, he leased it and moved into Helena. Here he has built a fine brick residence, in which he and his good wife reside, enjoying the prosperity that has come to them after years of labor. Having no children of their own, in 1875 they adopted little Mattie Kents, who is still with them. Their home is at No. 836 North Jackson street. Besides this, Mr. Smith has also erected other residences and business blocks in Helena, altogether owning fourteen buildings in the city.

Mr. Smith's political affiliations have been with the Republican party, but he has never been an office seeker or office holder, and has never joined any societies, his whole time being given to his own private affairs. Thus by industry and economy he has amassed a fortune. Mrs. Smith is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

AUGUST WEISENHORN, a Montana pioneer of 1863, and one of Helena's business men and successful manufacturers, was born in Germany, January 29, 1842. His father, Silas Weisenhorn, a German manufacturer and hotel keeper, was married in Germany, and in 1857 came with his family to America and settled at Quincy, Illinois, where he purchased a farm and resided until wished to impress upon their minds what they might expect should they ever molest him on the trail. He was at the time of the incident related above connected with Mossman's Express. Taking the package of letters from his horse and strapping them on his back he disappeared up into the storm of snow and sleet. He said he knew that the boys over the mountain expected their letters from home and he did not propose to disappoint them.

"The snow kept piling up and we concluded that if we waited until it covered the blazes on the trees which marked the way that we would be compelled to camp at the foot of the mountain until spring. At daybreak we made the start hoping to reach the summit before night set in. As we pulled up through the timber belt and out on the side of the bald, bleak mountain, where the snow had drifted into great piles and ridges, completely obscuring the trail, our horses were soon floundering and plunging in the great snow drifts. We fought manfully, but to advance was impossible. We cached a portion of our outfit and returned to Slate creek.

1890, when his death occurred in the eighty-fourth year of his age. His wife had died two years previously, in her seventy-eighth year.

August Weisenhorn was the third in a family of seven children, six of whom are living, and was fifteen years old when he came to America. He remained on the farm with his father and learned the blacksmith trade, and when he attained maturity started with a mule team for Montana. He stopped and worked at his trade about two months in Colorado, then came on to Virginia City and opened a shop there, which he ran two years, afterward moving to Diamond City, where he continued to work at his trade successfully until 1870. That year he sold out and returned to Quincy, Illinois, established a carriage and wagon manufactory, operated the same two years, and in 1872 sold out. That year he came to Helena, Montana, with a stock of carriages and wagons and located in a building, which, together with his stock, was soon afterwards burned, entailing the loss of all his accumulations. Then he began working at his trade again. For two years he was in the employ of Alexander Camp, after which, in partnership with Wallace Brown, he bought out Mr. Camp, and has since been engaged in the manufacture of carriages and wagons. After six years Weisenhorn & Brown dissolved partnership, and Mr. Weisenhorn continued in business alone. In 1889 the Weisenhorn Manufacturing Co. was organized, Senator T. C. Power and Joseph Q. Townsend becoming stockholders in the company, Mr. Weisenhorn being its president and manager. They manufacture carriages and wagons of all styles, all their goods being of the best quality.

Mr. Weisenhorn was married March 26, 1878, to Miss Emma J. Buscher, a native of Indiana, and a daughter of Henry Buscher. They have five children, Birdie E., Lafayette A., Barbara, Ottie and Frances, all born in Helena.

Politically, Mr. Weisenhorn votes with the Democratic party, but his business operations have all along demanded his chief attention and he has had little to do with politics. He, however, served as a member of the first City Council of Helena. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, Blue Lodge, Royal Arch and Commandry, and is a Shriner.

In 1893 his firm sent to Chicago a mountain hunting-wagon, on which they took the first prize. It is supplied with a brake of his own invention, on which he has a patent, the wagon being also his own design and entirely different from anything there; and they sold it to a New York City merchant.

Miss MINNIE A. REIFENRATH, County Superintendent of Schools of Lewis and Clarke county, Montana, is a native of the State of Illinois, born in the city of Chicago, July 28, 1866, a descendant of German ancestry. Her father, Herman Reifenrath, was born in Germany in 1837, came to the United States when eighteen years of age, settled first in Louisville, Kentucky, subsequently removed to Chicago, and was there married to Miss Eliza A. Cartley, a native of that city. They continued to reside in Chicago for a number of years after their marriage, removed from there to Waukegan, and later took up their abode in Minneapolis. He was for seventeen years a trusted and efficient employe of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad Company. In 1885 they moved to Montana, and the family now reside in Helena, where Mr. Reifenrath has the position of baggage master for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

Miss Reifenrath, with whose name we begin this article, is the eldest of six children, all of whom are living. She received her education in Chicago, Waukegan and in Minnesota, taught two years in Illinois and two in Minnesota, and finished her education in the Normal school of the latter State. Her talent for primary teaching being very marked and her success being gratifying to all in that department, she turned her attention more particularly to it, and became a specialist and an enthusiast in her work. After arriving in Helena, she accepted the position of primary teacher in the Helena public schools, where she rendered a high degree of satisfaction, and where her services were secured for six successive years. She became a member of the Montana State Teachers' Association, in

During the day, when we were struggling with the elements, Dr. Danforth arrived in camp. He was at once summoned to attend a poor fellow who had broken his leg below the knee. On examination the doctor reported that mortification had set in and the only means of saving his life was to amputate the leg. But how was this to be accomplished? He had no surgical instruments with him. The doctor was however equal to the emergency. He went over to the butcher and requested him to whet up his best blade to as fine an edge as possible. Then he took down from the hook a bow-backed meat saw and had him sharpen that as well. John and myself were summoned to hold the patient. Before commencing operations, in the absence of anything better, the doctor administered a heavy dose of whisky. When the patient had drank it he jocosely remarked that he thought he could stand the operation without the whisky, or the whisky without the broken leg, but be damned if he could stand them both. The doctor went at the operation in a business-like manner. The incisions were accomplished all right, and the only trouble with the sawing was that the saw, being rather coarse for this pur-

the meetings of which she was active and efficient, giving the association papers on primary work. Her connection with this organization brought her into prominence with the educators of her State, who elected her vice-president of the association, this being her second term in that capacity.

In the fall of 1892, Miss Reifenrath was the choice of the Republican party for County Superintendent of Schools. The Populist party and the Democratic party also nominated ladies of fine ability for the same position. She was the youngest candidate in the field and was elected by the very flattering majority of 910 votes out of a vote of 4,596, running far ahead of her ticket. Since entering upon the duties of her office her first work was that of visiting the schools of the county to study their needs. There are forty schools in the county, and the law only requires one visit to each, but such has been her desire to benefit them that nearly all have received a second visit.

Miss Reifenrath is a member of the W. C. T. U. of Montana, and is superintendent of the juvenile work of the society for this State. She is a member of the Episcopal Church of Helena.

Adam Gerhauser, one of Helena's respected citizens, was born in Bavaria, October 6, 1828, the son of George Gerhauser, a butcher. He learned the business of beer-brewing in Bavaria, and remained there until 1853. That year he emigrated to the United States, and for a time worked at his trade in New York. From there he removed to Belleville, Illinois, where he continued in the brewing business four years. In 1857 he went to California and turned his attention to mining, in which occupation he has been almost constantly engaged ever since. His first experience in the mines was at Dutch Flat. From there he went to Grass valley and afterward to Auburn, forty miles from Sacramento. During his early mining career he found one piece of gold that was valued at $108. Leaving California in 1860, he went to Nevada and at Carson City started up in the brewing business on his own account, continuing there until 1863, and that year going to Virginia City, Nevada, and conducting a brewing business until 1868. In 1868 he located at White Pine, where he built a larger plant than ever, at a cost of $20,000, and this he operated until 1870, when he sold out. The mining excitement at Cedar creek then took him to that place. Finding nothing there, however, to induce him to remain, he came to Helena and on the 8th of June, 1870, he started a brewery on South Main street. The following year he was burned out, and in 1874, in company with others, he started up in business again, and again his establishment met with the same fate, losing him nearly all his accumulations. Again he rebuilt, this time on Rodney street, but after two years more in the brewing business he retired from it and converted his property into business blocks, Nos. 202 and 204, corner of Fifth and Rodney streets. His interest in mines and mining did not abate during these years, and he is now the owner of two valuable gold mines. Out of one of them, after considerable expense, he has taken over $20,000. Both these mines he is still successfully operating.

Mr. Gerhauser was married in 1864, to Miss Tereca Schick, a native of Germany.

Politically, he is a Democrat. He has, however, given little attention to politics, as his extensive business operations have demanded and received his closest attention. He has not only attained a fair degree of success, but has also secured what is far better—the good will of all who know him.

Michael A. Meyendorff, recently the melter at the United States Assay Office, Helena, and now City Engineer of this city, came to Montana in 1871.

He was born in Poland, December 3, 1849, and is the son of Baron Meyendorff, a Polish nobleman. His early training was at the government school at Minsk, the capital of the Russian State of that name. When Poland made her last attempt to gain her independence, the Meyendorff family were among those who took up arms against Russia, and with three elder brothers the subject pose, would occasionally catch in the bone, to twist and bend which made the operation a painful one indeed. But the patient stood it like a little man. Later on I met this same man in the mines and his first salutation was 'Say, pard, old saw-bones was a brick: wasn't he?'

"The night before the next start we made, the clouds had broken away and the mercury dropped twenty degrees below zero. We knew that by starting the next morning as soon as it was light that we could pass over the frozen crust of snow. We reached the summit late in the afternoon, and by slow degrees made our way down into Dead-horse cañon. By the time we reached this camping ground, where a month later Joaquin Miller had a desperate encounter with mountain wolves that he will remember a long time after other stirring events, in which he played a conspicuous part, have passed from his memory. However, by the time we reached this camping ground the sky was again overcast with dense clouds and the snow began to descend thick and fast. Everything wet, no fire, an improvised cold meal, horses fed on flour worth a dollar a pound,—expresses the situation. An effort to get some sleep was the next question to be determined. Near by was the trunk of a great fallen tree, the top of which was some three feet above the surface of the snow. We brushed the snow from the top of the log, and of our sketch went forth in the war which ended so disastrously to the side they championed. With others he was arrested and imprisoned, and upon trial sentenced to banishment to Siberia. The time occupied by imprisonment and in the journey to Siberia was sixteen months, and eighteen months were spent in exile. He was liberated during the close of the Lincoln administration, through the intercession of the United States Government, and came at once to America.

Six months after his arrival in this country he entered the Michigan University, and in 1870 graduated in that institution as a civil engineer. In 1871 he came West, and during the summer of that and the following year he was in the employ of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company as surveyor. In 1873 he was chief mineral clerk in the office of the Surveyor General of Montana, and the following year he opened an office and acted as mineral land surveyor and attorney. In 1875 he went to Washington and was in the employ of the Interior Department. Through the influence of Hon. James G. Blaine he came to Helena as superintendent of construction of the United States Assay Office, and President Grant the next year appointed him melter, a position which he held, serving under both Republican and Democratic administrations, until September, 1893, when he was removed by President Cleveland. The spring city election being carried by the Republican party, Mr. Meyendorff was appointed City Engineer, May 1, 1894, which office he now holds.

Mr Meyendorff has been prominent in political circles, having been secretary of the Montana State Central Committee and president of the Young Men's Republican Club. In 1884 he stumped the State of New York for James G. Blaine for President. At college he was a member of the Chi Psi Society. He belongs to the Masonic fraternity, Knights of Pythias and Ancient Order of United Workmen, and is a member of the Episcopal Church.

HON. ELBERT DURKEE WEED, a prominent member of the bar of Montana, dates his birth in Allegany county, New York, December 1, 1858. He is of English and Dutch descent. His great-great-grandfather, Reuben Weed, settled in Connecticut at an early period in the history of this country, and from Connecticut his posterity emigrated to Cayuga county, New York, where they were chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits. His paternal and maternal great-grandfathers, Reuben Weed and Jacob Schaffer, fought in the Revolutionary war, and Reuben Weed (Reuben being a popular name in the family for several generations), his grandfather, took part in the war of 1812. Seth H. Weed, the father of Elbert D., was born in Allegany county, New York, in 1832, and he rendered his country efficient service during the Civil war, enlisting in July, 1861, in the First New York Dragoons, and serving with his regiment until the second day of the battle of the Wilderness. On that day he received a gun-shot wound in the thigh, which severed an artery and caused his death. He left a widow and two little sons, Elbert D. and Henry I.

In 1866, Mr. Weed's mother, whose maiden name was Nancy E. Foland, with her children, accompanied her father on his removal to Wisconsin, where they settled on a farm and where her sons were reared. She is still a resident of that State, now making her home at Oshkosh.

After preparing himself for college, Elbert D. entered the Lawrence University in Wisconsin, where he was graduated in 1880. He then took a course in law in the State University at Madison, Wisconsin, and began the practice of his profession at Oshkosh, where he remained two years. In 1883 he came to Helena and entered into a partnership with Mr. E. D. Edgerton, which association was severed two years later, and since that time Mr. Weed has conducted his law practice alone, having secured a good clientage and a reputation as a success-taking our blankets we made our bed thereon. It was not a soft log. John would drop into a doze, roll over to find a soft place and land in the snow below. My turn would soon come, and the only thing to do was to plumb the log again. This process was kept up until the dawn of day. The trail leading out of the cañon was up a hill, not long but very steep. At the top of this hill one of our broncoes lay down and gave up the ghost. Before night came again we pitched our camp at Millersburg, named after Joaquin Miller in honor of his daring in the early discovery of these mines."—Pleas. Johnson in San Francisco Midwinter Appeal.

Having plenty of ponies I took employment with Mossman to ride express. Later I became a partner, went to Elk City, far to the south of Oro Fino, and the third camp of any enduring richness yet found, and on returning to Lewiston went at once to the new or farther camp, Salmon river, afterward called Id-dah-ho,* and Florence, where my elder brother was already mining.

This newest and richest mining camp had successively various names. Millersburg, on Miller's creek, was the name given to the first group or string of cabins built in what has ever been known since the first few months as the Florence mines. This was not named after myself, though the fact that I opened the first express office there and that my brothers and cousins lived thereabout led me to believe and say so. It was called simply Miller's at first. I had my express office in Mr. Miller's cabin at the beginning and to the end of my business in Florence, and always stopped there as I went and came with the express, for his cabin and town were quite on the outer edge of the mines. There was no house after leaving Miller's in those early days till you crossed and descended the Salmon mountain to Salmon river. Here mountaineers, packers, prospectors, merchants, all sorts of men ful practitioner. He is the attorney for Montana of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, and also of the United States Mortgage Trust Company of New York.

Politically, Mr. Weed is a stanch Republican. In 1888 he was secretary of the Republican State central committee. He was temporary chairman of the Republican State convention in 1892, and was prominently mentioned as a candidate for Governor. He has held the office of Deputy District Attorney and also Assistant United States District Attorney. In 1889 he received the appointment of United States District Attorney, was reappointed to the same office in 1890, and served until the expiration of his term in February, 1894. He was elected Mayor of Helena in April, 1894, by the largest plurality ever given a candidate for that office.

Mr. Weed is a bachelor, and a member of the following orders: Masons, Elks and Knights of Pythias.

*The name of the great northwestern gold fields, comprising Montana and Idaho, was originally spelled I dah-ho, with the accent thrown heavily on the second syllable. The word is perhaps of Shoshonee derivation, but it is found in some similar form, and with the same significance, among all Indians west of the Rocky mountains. The Nez Perce Indians, in whose country the great black and white mountain lies which first induced the white man to the use of this name, are responsible for its application to the region of the far Northwest.

"The literal meaning is, 'sunrise mountains.' Indian children among all tribes west of the Rocky mountains, so far as I can learn, use the word to signify the place where the sun comes from. Where these tawny people live out of doors, go to bed at dusk, and rise with the first break of day, sunrise is much to them. The place where the sun comes from is a place of marvel to the children; and, indeed, it is a sort of dial-plate to every village or rancheria, and of consequence to all. The Shoshonee Indians, the true Bedouins of the American desert, hold the mountains where the first burst of dawn is discovered in peculiar reverence.

"This roving and treacherous tribe of perfect savages, stretching from the Rocky mountains almost to the Sierras, having no real habitation, or any regard for the habitation of others, but often invading and overlapping the lands of fellow-savages, had some gentle sentiments about sunrise. 'Idahho' with them was a sacred place; and they clothed the Rocky mountains, where they rose to them, with a mystic or rather a mythological sanctity

"The Shasta Indians, with whom I spent the best years of my youth, and whose language and traditions I know entirely, as well as those of their neighbors to the north of them, the Modocs, always, whether in camp or in winter quarters, had an "Idahho," or place for the sun to rise. This was a sort of Mecca in the skies to which

with all sorts of purposes, had almost immediately built up a little town, which was called Slate Creek. This Slate Creek was fed from the waters of the new mines, but, strangely enough, was not found rich enough to work; and, still more strangely, for half a year no one touched the bars of Salmon river. They yielded richly, however, when once opened. Never anywhere on the face of the earth was gold found to be so plentiful and accessible. Dwarf pines of the Douglas class stood so thick on the hills all about that a horse could not pass through a grove of them; but in the shallow gulches only grass grew. This grass had thirsty, matted roots which ran down to a thin stratum of decomposed quartz. In this lay the grains of gold, as thick in places as wheat on a threshing floor; and indeed it was about the size and color of wheat. You might imagine much confusion, greed, grasping, even crime, under these circumstances. In truth, to take a like number of men suddenly out of New York, or any other city, and set like temptations before them, crime would perhaps follow. But these men, like all old gold miners, were tried and true. They were ruggedly honest men, all of them, hungry men at times, no doubt, but they were honest, dignified, full of reassuring good will to one another, and it is doubtful if any other gathering of so many thousand men from anywhere could have got through the winter with less quarreling or barbarisms than these here where there was no law at all for the biggest half of the first year.

Although many editors were here in the heart of the richest spot that had been found on the globe, and the very richest with the one exception of Alder creek, Montana, you search the world in vain for any literature concerning the event. My cousin, Henry Miller, of the Oregonian, wrote much; but his letters are mostly light character sketches and miscellanies, with every Indian lifted his face involuntarily on rising from his rest. I am not prepared to say that the act had any special religion in it. I only assert that it was always done, and done silently, and almost, if not entirely, reverently.

"Yet it must be remembered that this was a very practical affair nearly always and with all Indians. The war-path, the hunt, the journey—all these pursuits entered almost daily into the Indian's life, and of course the first thing to be thought of in the morning was 'Idahho.' Was the day to open propitiously? Was it to be fair or stormy weather for the work in hand?

"But I despair of impressing the importance of sunrise on those who rarely witness it, although to the Indian it is everything. And that is why every tribe in the mountains, wherever it was, and whatever its object in hand, had a Mount "Idahho." This word, notwithstanding its beauty and pictorial significance, found no place in our books till some twenty-one years ago, and then only in an abbreviated and unmeaning form.

"Indeed, all Indian dialects, except the 'Chinook', a conglomerate published by the Hudson Bay Company for their own purposes, and adopted by the missionaries, seem to have always been entirely ignored and unknown throughout the North Pacific territory. This 'Chinook' answered all purposes. It was a sort of universal jargon, was the only dialect in which the Bible was printed, or that had a dictionary, and no one seemed to care to dig beyond it.

"And so it was that this worthless and unmeaning 'Chinook' jargon overlaid and buried our beautiful names and traditions. They were left to perish with the perishing people; so that now, instead of soft and alliterative names, with pretty meanings and traditions, we have for the most sublime mountains to be seen on earth (those of the Oregon Sierras, miscalled the Cascade Mountains) such outlandish and senseless and inappropriate appellations as Mount Hood, Mount Jefferson, Mount Washington, and Mount Rainer. Changing the name of the Oregon river, however, to that of the Columbia, is an impertinence that can plead no excuse but the bad taste of those perpetrating the folly. The mighty Shoshonee river with its thousand miles of sand and lava beds, is being changed by these same map-makers to that of Lewis and Clarke river.

"When we consider the lawless character of the roving Bedouins who once peopled this region, how snake-like and treacherous they were as they stole over the grass and left no sign, surely we would allow this sinuous, impetuous, and savage river to bear the name which it would almost seem nature gave it, for Shoshonee is the Indian name for serpent. How appropriate for this river and its once dreaded people!

"The dominion of this tribe departed with the discovery of gold on a tributary of the Shoshonee river in 1860. The thousands who poured over this vast country on their way to the new gold-fields of the north swept them away almost entirely. Up to this time they had only the al-little or nothing about the Indians, or anything that would give light to-day on the serious events of the time. All my own letters to the press have perished save the one below, which was published at Albany in a paper founded by the late United States Senator Delazon Smith, and was dug up for me recently by United States Justice C. B. Bellinger, who was at one time the editor. You can see the battle of White Bird creek and the war with Chief Joseph dimly foreshadowed in this. But the letter is given rather as a curiosity than anything else, as the earliest literature of I-dah-ho.

WALLA WALLA, November 16, 1867.

Editor Democrat:—Having just returned from Salmon river, to which place I have been extending our Mossman & Co.'s express line, I beg leave through the columns of your widespread paper, to inform my many friends of the locality, character and richness of these newly discovered mines.

The Salmon river mines are at present principally confined to the headwaters of a small tributary, called Slate creek, which empties into Salmon river, and this into Snake river,—distant from Walla Walla about two hundred miles. Heavy loaded wagons may be taken, without any inconvenience, to the head of White Bird Cañon, at the base of Mount I-dah-ho, which is within five miles of Salmon river and forty five of the mines.

After the miner, on his journey to the mines, leaves White Bird creek—named after an Indian chief who kept his clan on that stream,— most helpless and wholly exhausted immigrant to encounter, with now and then a brush with soldiers sent out to avenge some massacre. But this tribe perished, as I have said, before the Californians, and to-day it is not; except as one of the broken and dispirited remnants familiar to the wretched reservations scattered over the vast far West.

"Captain Pierce, the discoverer of gold in the North, located 'Pierce City' on the site of his discovery, in the dense wood away up in the wild spurs of the Bitter Root mountains, about fifty miles from the Shoshonee river. Then 'Oro Fino City sprang up; then 'Elk City' was laid out. But the 'cities' did not flourish. Indeed, all these 'cities' were only laid out to be buried. The gold was scarce and hard to get at, and the mighty flood of miners that had overran everytging, to reach the new mines began to set back in a refluent tide.

"On the site of the earthworks thrown up by Lewis and Clarke, who wintered on the banks of the Shoshonee river in 1803-4, the adventurous miners had founded a fourth and more imposing city, as they passed on their way to the mines. This they called Lewiston. It was at the head of steamboat navigation on the Shoshonee, and promsed well. I remember it as an array of miles and miles of tents in the spring. In the fall, as the tide went out, there were left only a few strips of tattered canvas flapping in the wind. Here and there stood a few 'shake shanties,' against which little pebbles rattled in a perpetual fusillade as they were driven by the winds that howled down the swift and barren Shoshonee.

"'It oughter be a gold-bearin' country,' said a ragged miner, as he stood with hands in pockets shivering on the banks of the desolate river, looking wistfully away toward California; 'it oughter be a gold-bearin' county, 'cause it's fit for nothin' else: wouldn't even grow grasshoppers.'

"I had left California before this rush, settled down, and been admitted to the bar by ex-Attorney-General George H. Williams, then Judge, of Oregon, and had now come, with one law-book and two six-shooters, to offer my services in the capacity of advocate to the miners. Law not being in demand, I threw away my book, bought a horse, and rode express. But even this had to be abandoned, and I, too, was being borne out with the receding tide. Suddenly it began to be rumored that farther up the Shoshonee, and beyond a great black-white mountain, a party of miners who had attempted to cross this ugly range, and got lost, had found gold in deposits that even exceeded the palmy days of '49.'

"Colonel Craig, an old pioneer, who had married an Indian woman and raised a family here, proposed to set out for the new mine. The old man had long since, through his Indians, heard of gold in this black mountain, and he was ready to believe this rumor in all its extravagance. He was rich in horses, a good man, a great-brained man, in fact—who always had his pockets full of papers, reminding one of Kit Carson in this respect; and, indeed, it was his constant thirst for news that drew him toward the 'expressman,' and made him his friend.

"I gladly accepted his offer of a fresh horse, and the privalege of making one of his party. For reasons sufficient to the old mountaineer, we set out at night, and climbed and crossed Craig's mountain, sparsely set with pines and covered with rich, brown grass, by moonlight. As we approached the edge of Camas prairie, then a land almost unknown, but now made famous by the battle-fields he comes upon the Salmon, which is a rapid, clear, cold stream, and barely fordable at the lowest stage. Ten miles travel up stream, over the very roughest and rockiest of roads, brings him to the mouth of Slate creek, where his route leaves the river at right angles, crossing to the east over a mountain almost always covered with snow and wrapped in a perpetual sea of clouds. Twenty-eight miles from where he leaves Salmon brings him into the heart of the mines.

The gold, as far as discovered, is of a fine quality, and confined mostly to low, marshy gulches. It is found below peat three feet thick, which is covered with a thick, heavy turf, generally of a corresponding thickness with the gravel. Altogether, these mines look more like the low marshes or meadow lands than like the placer mines of California; yet I think I can safely say that they are far richer than any mines that have ever been discovered on the Pacific coast. It is a positive fact that many of the companies on Baboon Gulch, Rich Flat, and Miller's creek, have entirely laid aside the miners' gold scales, and use only the spring balances for weighing the proceeds of their day's labor. I have it from authority that I think is unquestionable, that the least day's work that the two discoverers of Baboon Gulch have done since they began using their long tom, was fourteen pounds, avoirdupois weight.

The Indians, so far, seem peaceably disposed, of Chief Joseph, we could see through the open pines a faint far light on the great black and white mountain beyond the valley. 'Idahho!' shouted our Indian guide in the lead, as he looked back and pointed to the break of dawn on the mountain before us. 'That shall be the name of the new mines,' said Colonel Craig quietly, as he rode by his side.

"The exclamation, its significance, the occasion and all, conspired to excite deep pleasure, for I had already written someting on this name and its poetical import, and made a sort of glossary embracing eleven dialects.

"Looking over this little glossary now, I note that the root of the exclamation is dah! The Shasta word is Poudah-ho! The Klamath is Num-dah-ho! The Modoc is Lodah! and so on. Strange like 'Look there!' or 'Lo, light!' is this exclamation, and with precisely that meaning.

"I do not know whether this Idian guide was Nez Piercé, Shoshonee, Cayuse, or from one of the many other tribes that had met and melted into this half-civilized people first named. Neither can I say certainly at this remote day whether he applied the word 'Idahho' to the mountain as a permanent and established name, or used the word to point the approach of dawn; but I do know that this mountain, that had become famous in a night and was now the objective point of ten thousand pilgrims, became at once known to the world as Idahho.

"Passing by the Indians' corn fields and herds of cattle and horses, we soon crossed the Camas valley. Here, hugging the ragged base of the mountain, we struck the stormy and craggy Salmon river, a tributary of the Shoshonee, and found ourselves in the heart of the civilized and prosperous Nez Piercés' habitations. Ten miles of this tortuous and ragged stream and our guide led up the steep and stupendous mountain toward which all the prospectors were now journeying. At first it was open pines and grass, then stunted fir and tamarack, then broken lava and manzanita, then the summit and snow.

"A slight descent into a broad flat basin, dark with a dense growth of spruce, where here and there a beautiful little meadow of tall marsh grass, and we were in the mines—the first really rich gold-mines that had as yet ever been found outside of California.

"'Surely there is a vein for the silver, and a place for the gold where they fine it,' says the Bible, meaning that the only certain place to look for gold is where they refine it. Certainly the text never had a more apt illustration than here; for all places for gold in the wide world this seemed the most unlikely. The old Californian miners who came pouring in after us, almost before we had pitched tent, were disgusted. 'Nobody but a parcel of fools would ever have found gold here,' said one, with a sneer at the long-haired Oregonian who had got lost and found the new mines. But the wheat-like grains of gold were there, and in such heaps as had never been found in California; and so accessible, only a few inches under the turf or peat in the little meadows and little blind gulches here and there in this great black, bleak and wintry basin that had never yet been peopled since it came fresh from the Creator's hand.

"In less than a week the black basin was white with tents. Our party located a 'city' where we first pitched our tent, with the express-office for a nucleus. Look at your map, tracing up from Lewiston over Craig's mountain and Camas prairie, and you will find "Millersburg," looking as big on the map as any town in the West. Yet it did not live long. A man soon came with a family of daughters, Dr. Furber, an author of some note at the time, and settled half a mile farther on. My 'city' went with and clustered about the ladies. The doctor named but it is evident that they are of a much more fierce and warlike character than those nearer the frontiers. It is predicted by many that on the opening of spring they will endeavor to resist the encroachments of the whites. At present their head chief, with most of his chosen warriors, is out on a hunting excursion, east of the Rocky mountains. Some think his return will be the signal for hostilities, as he has always been known to be a mortal foe to the white man. Yours, in haste,

C. H. MILLER.

My brother, John D. Miller, was president of a debating club on John Day's creek in December of 1861. My cousin, Henry Miller, at the time correspondent and afterward editor of the Oregonian, was one of the members; Alex. Blakely, speaker of the first House in Idaho, was another; Judge Walton, now of the Oregon University, another; and, besides these, quite a list of good men still living might be given.

When it was announced that I had taken this history in hand hundreds of my old friends throughout the great new Northwestern States unite to send material, congratulations and so on. Here is a kindly line from an old schoolmate who is now of the Oregon University. It shows how heartily men of high place and culture entered into the task of transportation with their own backs for burros. I had forgotten all about the big bag of gold till I tried to do this work, but it seems the recipients of the loan had not. Here is the letter:

UNIVERSITY OF OREGON,
EUGENE, OR., July 7, 1894.

JOAQUIN MILLER, ESQ.

My Dear Friend:—I remember well the circumstance of meeting you when we,—father and myself,—were going into Florence, carrying our pack on our backs. You were coming out with the mail (express)—in fact carrying the letters and mail from the camp of Florence to the State Creek station. The entire distance was about eighteen miles over huge mountains covered with snow from five to fifteen feet deep. Yes; and well do I remember the sack of gold dust you let us have. We purchased that claim on "Boon's Gulch", where we made from $300 to $800 per day until it was worked out. That was a rich find. Oh that those days would come again! Yes; I remember that all the provisions and supplies for the camp were the rival 'city' after his eldest daughter, Florence. It flourished in the now falling snow like a bay, and was at one time the capital of the Territory. There is little of it left now, however, but the populous graveyard.

"And alas for the soft Indian name! The bluff miner, with his swift speech and love of brevity, soon cut the name of the new mines down to 'Idao.' And so, when the new gold-fields widened out during a winter of unexampled endurance into 'Warren's Diggin's,' Boise City,' 'Bannack City,' and so on, and the new Territory took upon itself a name and had a place on the map of the Republic, that name was plain, simple, and senseless Idaho. Should anyone concerned in the preservation of our native and beautiful names care to know more particularly the facts here sketched, let him address Colonel Craig, of Craig's mountain, Idaho, a well-read and the best-informed manon the subject to be found in the far West; and he is the man who found and named I-dah-ho."—Tourgee's Continent.

ALFRED D. EDGAR, general agent of the Northern Pacific Railroad at Helena, is a native of Tennessee, born at Lebanon, December 4, 1851.

The Edgars were early settlers of Delaware, having located there long previous to the Revolution. Rev. John T. Edgar, the grandfather of Alfred D., was a prominent Presbyterian clergyman. His son, Andrew H. Edgar, was born in Lexington, Kentucky, and married Miss Elizabeth S. Douglass. They became the parents of twelve children, Alfred D. being the third born and one of the six who are now living. Andrew H. Edgar was a Greek and Latin scholar, a professor in the Lebanon Law School, and later professor of ancient languages in the Nashville University. He died in the sixty-fifth year of his age. His widow is still living, being now sixty-two.

When the subject of our sketch was four years old his parents removed with their family to Texas, where he was educated under their instructions. In 1867, when fourteen years of age, he began railroading, as newsboy carried in on men's backs, over the snow from five to ten feet deep, and that, too, over those huge old mountains that seemed almost perpendicular, and especially when a fellow had from seventy-five pounds to one hundred and fifty pounds on his back! I saw with my own eyes men with three fifty-pound sacks of flour on their backs at one time, which they had carried over that snow trail—over those big mountains! I saw one man carrying a large blacksmith's anvil on his back, one with a large bellows, and a great many with ten-gallon kegs of liquor on their backs! Everything was carried on men's backs until the snow melted off of the mountains so pack mules could travel.

Your faithful friend,

JOSHUA J. WALTON.

There was little or no suffering in or about this great camp, although prospecting was pushed on right and left, though snows were deep, by these brave and intrepid men.

There was almost no sickness at all. Dr. Furber, who came in the first rush and before Florence had a name or place,—for he laid out Florence, and named the town after his step-on the Houston & Texas Central Railroad, in which business he continued for several years. Then he became connected with an engineering party on the line of the International & Great Northern Railroad. He began with them as flagman, was afterward rodman, and finally ran the level, and while he was thus employed they ran a large part of the line of the road. After this he was in the office of the chief engineer of the road, as clerk and correspondent. Next he entered the employ of the Texas & Pacific Railroad Company, with which he was connected in the construction department of their line between Sherman and Bonham for a period of eight months. Then he returned to the International & Great Northern, at Houston, Texas, where he was clerk in the office under H. M. Hoxie, and while there he was promoted to the position of chief clerk. In June, 1874, he went to Costa Rica, Central America, where he was in the employment of the Government for two years, a portion of that time being general freight and passenger agent for a road that was being built. In December, 1876, we find Mr. Edgar in San Francisco, from which date up to 1880 he served as local agent of the South Pacific Coast Railroad. In 1880 he entered the employ of the Oregon Railway Navigation Company, having charge of the freight business at San Francisco, and continuing thus occupied until April, 1883. At that time he received the appointment of general agent of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, which he represented in Chicago one year. Then he was transferred to Portland, Oregon, to the position of assistant general freight agent of the Northern Pacific Railroad. In December, 1883, a stroke of paralysis necessitated Mr. Edgar's leaving the road, and it was some time before he recovered his health sufficiently to resume business.

In 1887 he came to Helena to accept a position of clerk in the general agent's office of the Northern Pacific, and in April, 1889, he was made the company's general agent, the position he now holds.

Mr. Edgar is a member of the Elks and of the Knights of Pythias, in both of which orders he has held several offices. He has a home in Helena, where he resides with his mother and sister. Mr. Edgar is a thorough gentleman, and during his residence in Helena has made many warm friends.

FISK J. SHAFFER, a Montana pioneer of 1866 and one of Helena's oldest and most competent architects and builders, is a native of Michigan, born at Centreville, St. Joseph county, March 22, 1844. His ancestors came from Germany to this country and were among the early settlers of Pennsylvania. His grandfather, Thomas Shaffer, was born in that State, was a farmer by occupation, and lived to be seventy-nine years of age. He had a family of eight children, one of whom, Thomas, the father of our subject, born in Pennsylvania in 1813, removed to Michigan in 1834 and settled at Centreville, where he has ever since resided, he being ranked with the pioneers of that State, as it was nearly all a wilderness when he located there. In 1841 he married Miss Mary Brown, a native of Vermont, who died in early life, leaving two children, Fisk J. the younger, and he at that time only a few months old.

Mr. Shaffer was educated in the public schools of his native town and there learned the carpenter's trade of his father. In 1864 he came West. For a time he worked at his trade in Idaho City. In 1866 he prospected on the west side of the Main range, from Blackfoot along the foot of the range to Nevada creek, and in September of that year arrived in Helena. He was engaged in mining more or less for a number of years, both in placer and quartz mines. He soon formed favorable acquaintances with the business men, engaged in contracting and building and had all the work he could do. At the time he came to Helena there were no good buildings in the town. He met with success in his undertakings there, saved his money, and in 1867 returned to the Blackfoot country, where a second time he lost all he had saved. He not only lost all the money he had while in the mines, but also upon his return to Helena he found himself daughter,—told me that he had nothing at all to do except pull teeth. My brother, a medical student at the time, also assured me that such prevailing good health was without example; though the measles, breaking out in midwinter, proved fatal in at least one case,—that of Henry Vandyne, son of a rich cattle drover from Oregon.

Jim Warren, one of the boldest of the many bands of prospectors who had headquarters in Florence, came in early with big news. He had struck wondrous diggings! Warren was the only man of all who dared the elements, Indians, all things, to find great results that wild winter, which was truly dreadful toward the end.

From Warren's Diggings the golden road to Montana was short and was rapidly built. Briefly after this fifth camp, or golden station, came Boisé, Grimes, Idaho, and at last we literally climb the "golden stair" up the Rocky mountains into the golden heart of the west world's heart, MONTANA.

One would think that the flood of resolute men that followed this discovery would have emptied Florence. No so. The flood poured in daily, almost hourly, in and on! Warren!

$1,700 in debt. In this extremity he again turned to his trade, beginning work on the C. W. Cannon residence on Broadway, and afterward being employed on others of the best buildings being erected. In 1869, after a part of Helena was swept away by a great fire, Mr. Shaffer had all the work he could do, and received $10 a day. By cooking his own food and by otherwise exercising the strictest economy he was soon enabled to save enough money with which to pay his indebtedness. At the time he left Blackfoot he had not even been asked for a note, and when he had earned the money he returned and took great pleasure in paying it. Again he came back to Helena, and here by continued industry and economy he soon saved $1,500. In 1871 he formed a partnership with Henry Yergy in the planing-mill and sash, blind and door manufacturing business. They purchased the second planer ever brought to the Territory. It was shipped from Corinne, the freight on it being five cents per pound. This partnership was continued for ten years, during which time they had a large patronage and erected many of the best buildings in the city, Mr. Shaffer taking full charge of the financial part of the business, their operations being attended with very satisfactory results. Disposing of the factory and the ground on which it stood, corner of Sixth and Main streets, they opened a hardware business, which they conducted a little over a year. In the meantime they had also invested in land and stock, and after they had run the hardware business more than a year they dissolved partnership, dividing the business, Mr. Shaffer taking for his share the stock and ranches.

In 1882, accompanied by his wife and two children, Mr. Shaffer returned East for a visit to his old home and hers, and was absent about four months. Upon coming back to Helena he again engaged in contracting and building and on a larger scale than ever, also continuing in the sheep and cattle business, in all of which he has been successful and in which he is still interested. He owns a ranch of 400 acres, and several residences in Helena. Among the fine buildings erected by him we note the following: The Power block (six stories), the Diamond building, the Atlas, the Steamboat, the Gold, and many others, a list of which would cover many of the best buildings in Helena. Among the residences built by him, we mention those of Mr. Power, Mr. Ashby, and D. A. G. Flouree. And a fact worthy of mention in this connection is that in all his dealings Mr. Shaffer has never had the least difficulty in pleasing and settling with the men for whom he has done so much valuable building. He platted an addition to Helena, which bears his name,—Shaffer's Addition.

Mr. Shaffer was married in 1875 to Miss Anna E. Ellis, a native of Maine, she having come to Montana with her father in 1864. They have three children, Beatrice A., Guy F. and Winfield, all born in Helena.

Mr. Shaffer is a member of the A. O. U. W., and his political affiliations are with the Republican party. He was reared a Methodist, to which church his parents belonged, but in matters of religion he now gives his preference to the Unitarian Church.

HARRY O. WILSON, freight and passenger agent of the Union Pacific system, Helena, Montana, is a native of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, born November 24, 1861. He was reared and educated in his native State, an attendant of Racine College. At the age of eighteen he entered the employ of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad and was stationed at various points along its line, his last work for the company being in Dakota in 1889. That year he severed his connection with the Chicago & Northwestern and entered the employ of the Union Pacific, with which he has since remained, serving the traffic department in various capacities on the system. In 1892 he was promoted to the important position he now holds. The Union Pacific was the first road to enter Montana and has a direct line to Butte, from which place it is directly connected by rail with every point of importance in the State and by stage from Beaver Cañon into National Park; is also a great favorite with the traveling public, owing to advantages offered East and Western travel via Salt Lake City, Denver and to its numerous resorts. Mr. Wilson is a thorough railroad man, having been engaged in the business since leaving college fourteen years ago.

O. T. Hauser

founded them and built them up. I was in the four-days fight where Walla Walla now stands, and was badly hurt. My wound disabled me so I could not work, and so had to spend my time in the saddle, escorting immigrants or travelers, conducting the United States mails and like employment.

"In 1861, John Day, after whom the rich creek in the Florence mines was named, backed me to ride against time for $500, from Oro Fino to Walla Walla. I won the bet and had time to spare, making the distance of 184 miles in twenty hours and ten minutes. Kit Carson, as all in that country know, said that was the best riding ever done by a white man.

"When Captain Pierce, who discovered the Oro Fino mines, came down to Walla Walla in the fall of 1860 and told me what he had found, I began to fix up my express, and was the first one to carry in letters and carry out gold for the miners. I was half a year ahead of both Tracy and Wells-Fargo, and carried loads of gold. I had been so long in the country and learned the language and ways of the Indians so well firm name of S. T. Hauser & Company. That year was for him, indeed, a busy one. He organized a mining company, and erected the first furnaces in the Territory, at Argenta. In 1866 he organized the First National Bank of Helena and also the St. Louis Mining Company, now known as the Hope Mining Company, at Phillipsburg, where they erected the first silver mill in the Territory. Still indefatigable, this enterprising and energetic man organized the First National Bank of Butte and the First National Bank of Benton, First National Bank of Missoula, and for several years devoted his attention to banking interests.

A recent writer in speaking of Governor Hauser's labors in this direction says:

"Helena, the capital of the State, takes the lead in regard to the number and resources of her national banks. The oldest of these is the First National Bank, which was organized by Samuel T. Hauser & Company in the year 1866. Among its stockholders are some of the oldest inhabitants of Helena and of the State itself. This bank is the officially designated depository of the United States for Montana. The following well-known gentlemen are its officers: S. T. Hauser, president; E. W. Knight, cashier; and T. H. Kleinschmidt, assistant cashier. The directorate is composed of reliable and influential men, as will be readily seen from the following list: S. T. Hauser, A. M. Holter, Granville Stuart, E. W. Knight, T. H. Kleinschmidt, John C. Curtin, R. S. Hamilton, O. R. Allen, G. H. Hill, C. K. Wells, and T. C. Power. The names of such men as these are in themselves a guarantee of the soundness and success of any enterprise or institution with which they are identified. They are the leading spirits of the community and are regarded as high authorities concerning all financial matters and in the commercial world. The paid up capital of the First National is $500,000, and the surplus and profits reach $700,000. The First National Bank of Benton, Montana; the First National Bank of Missoula, Montana, and the First National of Butte, the same State, are associated with this well established and justly celebrated institution."

In connection with associates he has built the following railroad lines; The Helena & Jefferson County; Helena & Boulder Valley; Helena Red Mountain; Helena Northern; Drummon & Phillipsburg; Missoula & Bitter Root Valley. He also organized the Helena & Livingston Smelting and Reduction Company and is its president, and has probably done more to develop its mines and mining than any other one man in the State. He is also a large real estate owner, and has large investments in stock and mining interests.

In view of what has gone before, it is hardly necessary to add that Governor Hauser is one of the best known men in the Northwest, and that he is ever ready to aid any plan or enterprise that will advance the best moral, educational and material interests of that section of our land. In politics, he is a Democrat, and in 1884 was made a delegate to the Democratic National Convention, where he was appointed a member of the committee to notify the nominees of the honor conferred upon them. In July, 1885, as has been said, he was made Governor of Montana, and proved himself to be the best Governor the Territory ever had. He was also its first resident Governor. Governor Hauser was married to Miss Ellen Farrar, a daughter of Dr. Farrar, of St. Louis. Two children have been born to this union: Ella and Samuel Thomas.

It would be difficult to speak too strongly of the usefulness of a life like that of Samuel T. Hauser, whose every work has been followed by beneficial results for the bettering of others. To few men, indeed, in a generation are such rich natural gifts and qualifications given as those with which he has been endowed, and which he has used so wisely, so untiringly and so freely in the building up and bringing to the highest point of success attainable of every interest that has been so fortunate as to secure his assistance, co-operation and connection. His appearance would carry out the estimate one would make of him in reading the story of his life—a handsome, kindly, manly countenance, with broad, noble brow and eyes that seem to look through you in their clear and penetrating glance.

that they always not only let me pass, but sometimes helped me with pack horses; and so lucky miners used to have me help them out of the mines with their gold dust. I conducted Bill Rhodes, the man who found Rhodes' creek, down to Walla Walla. Rhodes was a mulatto from northern California, where he was sometimes called Black Bill, and had got badly in debt there. He was a big-hearted man and poured out his gold like water all along the road to poor miners whom we met on the way, saying all the time that he 'only wanted enough left to get back to Yreka and pay his debts with:' which he did. But the generous fellow, like Jim Warren, who found the Warren Diggings, never made another big strike.

"And now I want to say something about this man Warren, whom Mr. Bancroft calls 'a shiftless individual, petty gambler, worthless prospector,' and the like bad names;* and I see, by the way, he says near about as hard things of General Grant. Was it because these men would not or could not read or subscribe to his books? Now, I have nothing against Mr. Bancroft. He

THE BUTTE BUSINESS COLLEGE, Butte City, Montana, although an institution of but a few years' standing, has attained a position among the leading colleges of its kind in the West. It was established in this city in 1890 by Messrs. Rice and Kern, and opened with six pupils. For two years it met with a fair degree of success. At the end of that time Mr. Kern sold his interest to his partner, A. F. Rice, who has since been its sole proprietor and under whose efficient management it has greatly prospered. It has now an attendance of eighty pupils.

The elegant apartments occupied by the Butte Business College are in the Owsley block at the corner of Main and Park streets. The college is open to girls and boys, and ladies and gentlemen, and particular attention is given to those who have had little previous instructions. The value of an institution of this kind to a city or community can hardly be overestimated. Its curriculum embraces three parts: The commercial course, including bookkeeping, letter-writing, commercial law, penmanship, spelling, commercial arithmetic, grammar; the English course, including reading, penmanship, spelling, arithmetic, grammar, letter-writing, history and geography; and the shorthand course, including Graham's standard phonography, spelling, grammar, punctuation and letter-writing. Some personal mention of the enterprising young man at the head of this college is appropriate here, and is as follows:

Prof. A. F. Rice was born in Missouri in 1867. His people had gone to that State from Tennessee, and his parents, Frank and Mary (Sanders) Rice, were industrious and highly respected farmers and were worthy members of the Baptist Church. They had a family of ten children, six of whom are living, A. F. being the seventh born. Both parents are deceased, the father dying at the age of forty-nine and the mother at forty-five. A. F. Rice was educated in the public schools and at the Central Business College in Sedalia, Missouri. While in college he became proficient in penmanship, and afterward taught penmanship several terms. He came to Butte City in 1889 and had classes here previous to the opening of the college above referred to.

Prof. Rice was married June 4, 1890, to Miss Ida Phipps, a native of his own State and a lady of rare accomplishments, she being a musician and stenographer. She has charge of the shorthand department of the college and also gives instructions in instrumental music, and is thus an able assistant to her husband, both alike being popular and having an enviable reputation for the excellence of their work. He and his wife are attendants at the Methodist Episcopal Church, and his political affiliations are with the Republican party.

MICHAEL CONNORS, of Helena, came to Montana in 1866, and has since been identified with its interests.

Mr. Connors was born in county Limerick, Ireland, May 11, 1840, and at the age of seven years accompanied his parents to Canada, where he spent his youth and attended the common schools of the Dominion. At the age of twenty-one he went to California, engaged in the lumber business at Redwood, San Mateo county, and remained there until 1864. That year he removed to Idaho City and turned his attention to mining. Early in the spring of 1866 he started for Montana, reaching his destination in March. That was during the palmy days of Bear Gulch, and he was one of the fortunate placer miners there. In the fall of that year he went to Butte and spent some time in mining on Silver Bow creek and in Missoula Gulch. At that time there were but few people in what is now the most populous city of Montana and the greatest mining camp in the world. In the spring of 1868 he started on another prospecting tour, and was one of the four men who discovered the Dry Gulch placers at the head of Race Track creek in the Deer Lodge valley. After working there two years he disposed of his interests and in 1871 went to Peace river, Alaska, where, however, he remained only a short time, returning to the United States. He prospected in different places in this country, went thence to British America, came back to the United States and prospected and mined in Nevada and Arizona until the Black Hills excitement in 1876, when we find him in Dakota. The following year he came again to Montana, and prospected and mined in different sections.

says not one hard word of me or my express, although he might find occasion, for it is mighty hard work to handle and conduct millions of gold dust and please all. To think of it! Once we had a lucky crowd of Florence miners tie an old tent, rocker, pans, picks, blankets, everything on mules, and meekly and humbly lead them out in a long, mournful line, as if they were the worst used-up and discouraged miners in the world. Old rubber boots hung down on either side of the mules and stuck out under the ragged and tattered old traps; but every rubber boot was stuffed with bags of gold dust. Each man in that doleful looking crowd had at least a hundred pounds of gold dust; and this was only one of many ways in which we carried express. But to return to Mr. Bancroft.

"I do not know much about General Grant, but I do know that Jim Warren was a good man. The country was full of good men, but I think that of all the twenty or thirty thousand there was not a better or warmer-hearted man than big Jim Warren. If he was so worthless, how did he come to push out across the river into an

In August, 1886, he discovered the Ontario mine, in Deer Lodge county. This proved a very rich gold and silver find. In 1891 he disposed of his half interest in the property for a large sum of money, and since that date has made his home in Helena, enjoying the competency gained by years of faithful search and untiring energy.

Mr. Connors was married in Helena, June 7, 1893, to Miss Katherine McAndrews, formerly of Pennsylvania.

ISAAC N. WOODS, a Montana pioneer of 1864, and one of her enterprising and successful mining men, was born in Princeton, Indiana, February 12, 1840.

He is a descendant of English ancestors, who were among the early settlers of the South. His grandfather, Isaac Woods, was born near Harper's Ferry, Virginia, and in 1800, removed to Indiana and became one of the pioneer farmers of that State. He married, reared nine children, and lived to be 102 years of age. His son, Isaac H., was born in Indiana, in 1808, was reared there to farm life, and became the husband of Miss Nancy Pain, a native of Kentucky. Her people were early settlers of Kentucky, and the men in both the Woods and Pain families were participants in the Black Hawk war. Isaac and Nancy Woods became the parents of ten children, of whom five are living. Both parents reached a good old age, he being eighty-three at the time of death, and she seventy-eight. They were stanch members of the Presbyterian Church.

Isaac N. Woods, the subject of this sketch, is the fifth one in the Woods family who has borne the name of Isaac. He was fifth in order of birth of the seven children above referred to. At Princeton, Indiana, he was reared and educated, and had attained his majority only a short time before the civil war burst upon the country. He at once enlisted in the Union service and became a member of the Fifty-eighth Indiana Band. He was under General Buell in Kentucky, Tennessee and Alabama, and was in the service one year, after which the bands were dispersed; he was honorably discharged and returned to his home.

Being of an adventurous nature, which had been sharpened and intensified by his army experience, he was not satisfied to remain at home but decided to seek the gold fields of Montana, of which he had heard wonderful stories. Accordingly, with an ox-team outfit and in company with a large train, composed of forty-eight wagons, he started across the plains. Their journey was long and tedious, covering a period of nine months, but was attended with no misfortune, and late in August, 1864, they landed at Virginia City. From there Mr. Woods proceeded to Alder Gulch, where he secured a claim and mined for about a year. That was at the time when the road agents infested the country and when the lives and property of the good citizens were in danger. He joined the vigilants and did his part toward putting a stop to the depredations that were being committed on all sides. His mining operations at Alder Gulch were very successful, but in 1865, the people at this place nearly all began to move on to Last Chance Gulch, and he went too, arriving there soon after the first log house was built in what is now the rich and beautiful city of Helena. At Helena he secured several mining claims, and here, too, his mining operations were successful; but, like the other miners, he was not satisfied to remain in one camp, and ere long we find him in Bear Gulch, Deer Lodge county, and then at Deep Gulch. At the last named place in one summer he took out $20,000 in gold. His next move was to Highland, then in Deer Lodge county, but now in Silver Bow county, and from there he returned to Virginia City and began quartz mining, in which he has since coutinued, now having a number of gold claims there. At this writing he is operating claims in the Tidal Wave district, all of which he discovered himself and upon which he has made extensive improvements. He is now building a twenty-stamp mill. The ore is free gold and yields $25 to the ton. In this enterprise Mr. Woods has associated with him Mr. J. S. Smith and E. H. Cooper.

During the three decades Mr. Woods has been a resident of Montana, he has been an eye witness to the marvelous developments which have been made, and he has not only been a witness to these changes but he has also done his part toward bringing them about by helping to develop the great mineral resources of the State. He utterly unexplored country and right into the heart of the hostile Indian territory? How did he do all this? He had a big pack team, and was a big man all around. His partner was Jeff Standifer, a hero in the early days of I-dah-ho and the manliest-looking man I ever set eyes on.

"And now for a few other mistakes of Mr. Bancroft's:

"Dr. Ferber and his daughter Florence, after whom the town of Florence was named, did not come to the new mines in the spring of 1862. He got in there in the fall of 1861, and had a drug store and his family on a mule train, and wanted to stop and put up a tent at Millersburg, where we had opened our express office. But he was asked such a rousing price for lots that he did not unpack, but went on across the creek and up Baboon Gulch to a big, high, open, flat, where he unpacked and put up his big, round tent, and named the place Florence. It soon became the center, and we moved our express office into that big tent and staid till a log house was built.

"One thing more: Florence was not thirty takes a just pride in Montana and especially in Butte City, where he makes his home.

Politically, he has always affiliated with the Democratic party.

HENRY M. PATTERSON, Butte City's most prominent and reliable architect, is a native of Ohio, born in Savannah, Ashland county, May 5, 1856.

His father, John Patterson, was born in Scotland in 1810, and was reared and educated in his native land, and there learned the carpenter trade. In 1835 he emigrated to this country, landing in New York city, and subsequently removing to Ohio, where he purchased land and settled down to farming. He was married in Ohio, January 5, 1843, to Miss Christiana Lawson, who was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1820. They became the parents of ten children, of whom eight are living. After a long and useful life he passed away in 1892, at the age of eighty-two years. He was a generous, whole-souled man, a hater of oppression and wrong in any form, and his house was one of the "under ground railroad" stations, where many a poor frightened slave found shelter and food. In his religious views he was a Baptist. His good wife survives him and still resides at the old home in Ohio, to which he had retired some time before his death.

Henry M. Patterson was educated in the public schools of Savannah and in the academy at that place. After leaving school he served an apprenticeship to the carpenter's trade and then worked a year at his trade in Savannah. In 1881 he came to Montana and located in Butte City. His brother, Alexander, is also a resident of this place. Here the subject of our sketch worked as a journeyman one year, and after that launched out as a contractor and builder. During all the time he was engaged in contracting and building he was constantly studying architecture and gradually worked into it, finally devoting his time and attention exclusively to architecture. As samples of his work he points with pride to the Murray Hospital, the Intermountain Building, and the Public Library, three of the most substantial structures in Butte City.

Mr. Patterson was married in 1883, to Miss Thressa Anna Scott. After a brief and happy married life, she died, leaving twins, Bessie D. and Charles T. December 29, 1891, he married Miss Jeannette Andrews, of Chillicothe, Ohio. They reside in one of the pleasant homes of Butte City.

Both he and his wife are members of the Presbyterian Church, and he is an Elder in the church. His political affiliations are with the Republican party. He is a man of broad information and the highest integrity, is public-spirited and enterprising, and is justly deserving of the proud position he holds among the leading business men of this prosperous Western city.

DAVID H. COHEN, of Butte City, came to Montana in 1865 and has had many and varied experiences, in business and otherwise, during both the early and later settlement of this part of the world.

He was born March 12, 1833, in Germany, of German parentage and ancestry, was educated in his native land and learned the tailor's trade there. In 1852, in his nineteenth year, he emigrated to America, landing at New York a poor young man and ignorant of the English language. For six weeks he worked at his trade as journeyman in New York and then sailed for San Francisco, crossing the isthmus. On the Pacific side the vessel had on board 600 passengers, among whom the Asiatic cholera broke out, carrying away fifty-three of them. He escaped the horrible disease and arrived safely at his destination June 16.

Going by way of Sacramento to Calaveras county, he engaged in placer mining at Jackson, and some days made as high as $80 to $100. He had water only when it rained, but he adhered to the business for three years. With some money he went to Sierra county, looking for better diggings and where there was more water. He mined at Rabbit Creek, now La Porte, with success. Next, he purchased a billiard hall and continued in business there about four years. The Fraser river excitement then waving over the land, he sold out and took the ship Victoria, at San Francisco, for the headquarters of the excitement, and remained in that country about six months. Not meeting, however, with the success he had miles from Millersburg but, as you see, must have been a mighty short mile.

"Another thing: Ponies and pack trains did not come in across the mountains to Florence from Elk City, but from the exactly opposite direction. You might as well try to send a pack train across Puget Sound. We did not even send a snow-shoe express to our office in Elk City by that way. Then, too, there was not a boat on the Columbia, or anywhere else up there, called Idaho before the Florence mines were found, and the Indian name of Mount I-dah-ho became famous, though Mr. Bancroft says there was one for eighteen months there before Col. Craig, the old companion of Gen. I. I. Stevens, popularized this old Indian name of Mount I-dah-ho, and so named the present State of Idaho. If there ever was such a boat at such a time the records would show it.

"Finally, one little thing more: I had served in the Indian war with Judge Hayes, of Olympia, and he and Garfield and Lander were my old friends when they came to Walla Walla on their way to speak in Oro Fino in the summer of 1861. It was arranged before they came that I should escort them, and I did so. It was a new world to them but old to me, and they naturally asked many questions in that two-hundred-mile ride up winding, Indian trails. But they could not have heard from mine or from any man's lips, as Mr. Bancroft says, the word Idaho, for no man had yet uttered it. The pretty name sounded quite differently, and to me was even sweeter than the present way of expected, he returned to La Porte, and followed mining there until 1862.

Then he started on foot, with provisions and blankets, for Nevada, camping out at night, and he arrived safely after making that wild and tedious trip. Reaching Virginia City September 22, 1862, he found all the mines had been "gobbled up," and after remaining there a time he started with a company for Cliffton, now Austin, where he was engaged in the liquor business until 1864. Selling out at length, he prospected some in quartz mining. In the spring of 1865 he bought a team and drove to Salt Lake City, arriving in April. He there learned that Abraham Lincoln had been assassinated. Next he went to Alder Gulch, arriving May 16, 1865, where he found flour at $70 to $80 per sack; it had been $100 a sack shortly before that. He engaged in placer mining, but did not succeed with it, and he packed his blankets to the Blackfoot country and arrived at Ophir City. There he found there had been a stampede, and he followed it and was the thirteenth man to arrive at McClellan Gulch; his claim was therefore No. 13.

It was September, 1865, when he took out on an average $50 a day, for six weeks. Winter then came on and he was obliged either to build a cabin and store up provisions for the long, cold season or sell out. He did the latter, coming to Helena. There he remained until 1867, engaged to a limited extent in speculating, and then went to Austin, Nevada, to see his brother and with the intention of going to Europe; but the White Pine country had just been discovered and he decided to go there, and there he arrived on the 22d day of July, 1868, but found that he was too early for business, so returned to Austin, took the overland route East and returned to Germany. There he married, December 12, 1868, Miss Regina Dawson, a native of that country.

After a few months spent there he returned with his bride to Austin, Nevada. This good wife is still spared to him, having all along been of great help to him. They have three sons: Adolph, Morris and Henry,—all now men. The eldest is in the fruit business with his father, and the others are in the employ of the Great Northern Express Company.

They resided in Austin until 1870, then went to Schellbourne and lived there three years, and in 1876 came to Butte. Here he formed a partnership with Henry Jonas in the tailoring business at Deer Lodge, and later they transferred their business to Butte. Two years afterward Mr. Cohen engaged in general merchandising, which he continued for four years, and then embarked in the wholesale and retail liquor trade. Prospering, he became at length the owner of the winter garden and built a nice house, for which he has been offered $10,000; but in 1883 he became interested in building up the mining town of Eagle, in the Coeur d'Alene country. After spending a great deal of money in the enterprise the camp went down, he dropped his footing there and returned to Butte; but the rents being high he has embarked only in the fruit and cigar trade in a small way.

Here he pre-empted and owned the cemetery ground, and, being liberal, donated freely from the same to the various religious denominations for cemetery purposes, and it is now a valuable property.

Mr. Cohen is a member of the I. O. O. F., the Hebrew Benevolent Society and the I. O. B. B. In his political principles he is a Democrat, is a peaceable, quiet, intelligent gentleman, an enterprising business man, and he and his family enjoy the respect of the entire community.

saying it; for the accent was all on the second syllable, like the names of the Indian streams along there, such as Pe-tah-ha, Al-pow-a, Sho-sho-nee.

"One thing more: Flour did not sell for twenty-four dollars per pound in Walla Walla, or even as high as one-hundredth part, that winter or ever at any other time. I had my family with me there, and was attending to that end of my express line while Joaquin Miller attended to the end in the mines. We had to feed many men and also much stock for the road, and I had to keep well-posted in prices.

"Again: English and Scott and People's did not rob Mr. Berry of one-hundred ounces of gold dust. Nor were they hung by a mob at Walla Walla, but at Lewiston, three or four days' travel distant, as men traveled then. There never was a mob, vigilantes, or anything of that sort in this fair city. The presence of a large garrison would have made that impossible even had the people been disposed to it. But they never were. Such West Point men as Grant and Stevens and Mullen made their homes here from time to time. A large number of army officers always had their wives and children here

Hon. Benjamin F. White, ex-Governor of Montana, and one of the most influential and successful citizens, is a native of the State of Massachusetts, born in New Bedford, December 3, 1838.

He is of old English ancestry, some of his ancestors having sailed on the first voyage of the Mayflower and landed at Plymouth Rock in 1620. Indeed, he is a direct descendant of P. Smith, the first child born after the landing of the Pilgrims. They have been a temperate, industrious and God-fearing family, noted for their integrity of character and also for their longevity. In Massachusetts and Rhode Island for many years they were prominent and successful manufacturers of cotton goods, and for generations they took a prominent part in all that pertained to the well-being of church and state, being mostly Baptists in their religious faith. Both grandfather William White and Governor White's father, Benjamin White, were born in Plymouth, Massachusetts. The latter married Miss Caroline Stockbridge, a native of Hanover, Massachusetts. She was also a descendant of one of the old New England families. He was all his life a prominent manufacturer of cotton sheeting and candle wick, did a successful business, and died in the ninetieth year of his age. His widow now survives and is in her eighty-sixth year. They had two sons, George M. and Benjamin Franklin, the latter being the subject of this sketch.

Benjamin F. White was educated at Pearce Academy, Middleburg, Massachusetts. Being of an adventurous spirit, he took a fancy to the life of a seafaring man, and made his first voyage on the clipper ship Katha, as a sailor before the mast, from New York to Sidney, Australia. That was in 1854. His second voyage was to San Francisco, in 1856, and while there he abandoned the sea. In 1857, in Napa county, California, he took charge of an estate which was largely a fruit farm, and continued there until 1866, at which time he removed to Idaho. While in California he had read law during his leisure hours, and in Idaho, in 1868, he was admitted to the bar and practiced in Malad City. He also served as clerk of the United States District Court, and on the Anti-Mormon ticket was elected County Clerk and Recorder. During his residence in Malad City he with others became largely interested in the manufacture of salt, the salt springs being located in the mountains about 100 miles north of Malad City. When he began this enterprise salt in Montana was worth $1 per pound. The business was remunerative and grew until they had from 250 to 300 head of oxen with which they conveyed their product to all the towns of the Territory. When the Northern Pacific Railroad was built and brought cheap transportation their business ceased to be profitable.

Mr. White became a member of the mercantile and banking firm of Sebree, Ferris & White, and followed the construction of the railroad to Butte, doing business at all the towns along the line of its construction. In 1881 they founded the first bank at Dillon, and Mr. White became its cashier. In 1884 they made it the First National Bank of Dillon. He continued in the position of cashier until 1888, at which time he became president, and has since remained in that capacity, managing its business in a most capable and efficient manner, carrying it through the great financial panic, bringing it out in better shape than at any other time in its history, and to-day it is ranked with the most successful financial institution of the State. In 1887 Mr. Sebree and Governor White started a bank at Colwell, and in 1891 they made a national bank of it. The Governor owns half of its stock and is its vice-president.

In 1880, Governor White and his partner purchased, for $12,500, the four hundred acres of land on which the beautiful city of Dillon now stands. They platted the town, and in September of that year had a sale of town lots from which they realized $14,000 in cash. Since then not a month has elapsed in which they have not made sales. Thus, they became the founders of the town, and since then have become its most prominent builders, they having erected a large proportion of the best buildings.

in those days, and Walla Walla society was then, as it is still, of the best. What this fair town ever did to Mr. Bancroft that he should drag three men down three days' journey from where they were hung in order to hang the shame of their hanging around the neck of Walla Walla I don't know; though it may be because we did not like his books about "Native Races." It would be presumptuous in me, a worn-out, old expressman, who don't pretend to know much outside of the early life here, to infer that Mr. Bancroft, who writes histories of nearly everything, did not know what he was writing about.

"One thing more: The trails of Florence were not obliterated from February till May and made impassable, nor did anybody 'suffer all the horrors of slow starvation.' The trails were not blocked at all. My express never missed connection for one single night; neither did Wells-Fargo, except once from snow blindness, when Joaquin Miller, who was on snow-shoes with the blinded messenger, took his pack of letters along with my own on his back and delivered Truthfully may it be said that every brick in these substantial buildings is a monument to Governor White's business sagacity and enterprise.

In politics he has always been a faithful Republican. When he came to Dillon, Beaver Head county was decidedly Democratic and had previous to this time elected Democratic officers. He was nominated by his party as the Representative of the Territorial Council, and was elected by a majority of 300 against one of the strongest Democrats in the county. During the session of 1882-3 he served most acceptably in that capacity. In acknowledgment of the valued service he rendered his party, as well as for his fitness for the position, President Harrison nominated him for Governor of the Territory. The nomination was confirmed March 29, 1889, and he served until Montana was admitted into the Union of States, by reason of which his term of office expired. He was a member of the State Canvassing Board, and in that capacity aided in keeping the opposition from robbing the State of its franchise. Governor White also took an active interest in the incorporation of the city of Dillon, was elected her first Mayor, and has since served in that capacity for three terms.

He was married February 14, 1879, to Miss Lizzie A. Davis, a native of England and daughter of Hon. E. J. Davis, a prominent citizen of Idaho and a member of the Legislature. Mrs. White was reared in Idaho from her childhood. They have four children, all born in Dillon, as follows: Carrie, Emrys, Ralph and Greta. The family are members of the Episcopal Church.

While Governor White has for several years been assiduously engaged in building the city of Dillon, he has also secured for himself an ample fortune, and in addition to all this has by a life of upright integrity secured the good will and esteem of his fellow citizens. Surely such a life may be called a decided success.

JOHNSON & JENSEN is the title of a successful pioneer firm of the city of Great Falls, Montana. They are the founders of the Cascade Steam Laundry, owners of the controlling interest of the Montana Brewery, and also own a ranch near the city. The gentlemen who compose this firm are brothers-in-law, and, as they have kept their business identical since coming to Great Falls, it has been considered appropriate to give their history and business career in one sketch.

Messrs. Johnson and Jensen had for some time been turning their attention to the West, looking for a prosperous new town in which to engage in business. Great Falls was finally given the preference, and they came hither in 1887. The town had then just commenced to grow. They purchased two lots where their laundry business is now located, on First avenue, north, and erected a brick building, 30 x 50, with two stories and a basement, in which they began operations. They had occupied it only three years when it was found to be inadequate in size for their rapidly growing business, and they erected a second brick building adjoining it, 22 x 100 feet, with two stories and a basement. In the rear of these buildings they put up a two-story frame house in which to board their hands. Their establishment is equipped with all the latest and most approved machinery for carrying on their large volume of business in the most successful manner. They use a fifty-horse-power engine. They were the second laundry firm in the whole country to use electricity to heat their rolls and flatirons. They also have their own dynamo and manufacture their own electric light. From the very first their business has been a success, and has increased in volume each year of its existence. In 1893 they became the purchasers of the controlling stock in the Montana Brewing Company, which has a large plant, with fine brick buildings, costing over $60,000. This they are now running day and night to its fullest capacity, turning out a superior article of beer, for which they find a ready sale. Their ranch of 200 acres is near the city limits. On it they are keeping stock and are making dairy butter, and here they also raise vegetables and poultry, in this, as in their other enterprises, meeting with marked success. They own considerable real estate in the city. Indeed, every investment they have made since coming to Great Falls has proved successful, and they are justly entitled to be classed among the foremost of the leading business men of the city.

them to John Creighton, Wells–Fargo's agent, before taking our own letters to our office. As thousands of miners saw and cheered this generous act toward the big rival express, there are still alive plenty to tell of it. This John Creighton was a great character, and the richest and most popular man there, except Jeff Standifer, Jim Warren and such. He is now a banker in Denver. He was the first big merchant there to charge a dollar a pound for anything, and he never charged any more, and he never let any man 'suffer the horrors of slow starvation!' They tell this of him: An old friend had arrived, and, going early to the store, saw a man back in a dark corner, still rolled in his blankets.

"'Good morning, Mr. Creighton!'

"'Dollar a pound!'

Fred G. Johnson, whose name is first in the firm, is a native of Sweden, born December 19, 1858. His parents were Andrew G. and Sophia (Peterson) Johnson. They emigrated to Minnesota in 1866, came to Great Falls in 1887, and the father died in 1890, at the age of sixty-nine years. The mother still survives, now (1894) in her seventy-fourth year. They had two children, Fred G. and his sister, the wife of Mr. Jensen.

Mr. Johnson was six years old when he came with his parents to Minnesota. He was educated in that State, and was for a time in the draying business in Minneapolis. His arrival in Great Falls was just before the Great Northern Railroad had completed its line to this place. Since then he has been actively engaged in business in the city. He is now the secretary and treasurer of the Montana Brewing Company. Mr. Johnson was married in 1887, to Miss Emma Johnson. She was born in Indiana, and while she had the same name she was not related to him. They have two sons and two daughters, namely: Frederick Leroy, Edna May, Myrtle Evaline and William Stuard.

Mr. Stuard R. Jensen, the other member of the firm, is a native of Denmark, born August 25, 1851. He comes of old Danish ancestry, and was educated in his native country, by his father, who was a schoolteacher. When our subject was twelve years of age, he came with his uncle to Wisconsin, and began life in America by working on a farm at $8 per month. After two years he went to Minnesota and learned the cooper trade; but during the last two years of his life in Minnesota he was in the grocery business. He preceded Mr. Johnson to Great Falls. After remaining in the city during the summer, he wrote to Mr. Johnson to join him, and upon the latter's arrival in Montana they organized the firm and embarked in business, with the results mentioned heretofore in this sketch.

Mr. Jensen was married August 24, 1875, to Miss Selma Johnson. As stated above, she is the sister of his partner. They have two children, Adel and Walter.

Both gentlemen are Populists in their political affiliations. Mr. Jensen has represented the first ward of the city as Alderman for two years, rendering efficient service in that capacity.

The above, although a brief and imperfect sketch, will serve to show something of the lives of these public-spirited and enterprising men.

CHARLES D. HARD, a prominent citizen of Montana, whose residence is located near the Montana University, four miles north of Helena, was born in Rochester, New York, December 20, 1841. His ancestors, Scotch and English people, were among the early residents of Vermont, and his father, Lemuel W. Hard, was born there in 1805. Mr. Hard's mother, who before her marriage was Miss Mary Margaret Gray, was a native of Madison county, New York, and of Scotch origin. Her family removed to Chicago at an early day, being among the first settlers of that city, and Charles M. Gray being Mayor of Chicago at one time. The father died in 1887, in the eighty-second year of his age.

Charles D. Hard, the oldest of the family, was educated in his native city. In 1864 he went by the way of the isthmus to San Francisco, and accepted a position in the store from which supplies were distributed to the soldiers stationed at forts near San Francisco. In that position he remained three years. In 1867 he came to Montana with Mr. Obannon, who received the appointment as Registrar of the first land office established in Montana. Mr. Hard at this time received the appointment of Deputy Collector of Internal Revenues for the Fifth district of Montana, served a year in that office, and was then appointed Deputy United States Marshal. His principal duties in the latter office were to suppress the illicit traffic in whisky, which was carried on by white men with the Indians and others, and as can well be imagined he had an arduous task on his hands, his life frequently being in danger. In the discharge of his duties he made many trips all over the northern portion of the country, taking with him an armed posse and making arrests of desperate, lawless men. During the four years he filled that office he succeeded to some extent in putting a stop to their lawless traffic. He was also special agent for the Interior Department for four years, and during this period at least a little about a few of the men of whom he writes so much; I cannot help calling attention to the fact that Mr. Bancroft has gone far, very far to try and point out the depravity of the brave old pioneers in these mountains. There was not nearly the crime that he tells about. For example, he gives a list to "show the condition of affairs in Idaho and on the roads there in these times,"—p. 451-2, vol. 26, History of the Pacific States. Whether considered comedy, or tragedy, geography or biography, history or romance, these books of Mr. Bancroft's are a remarkable mixture. Take this one case or two more and let us leave the subject. Frank Gallager was not killed by Berryman in Idaho or on the road there. He was killed near the Dalles, on his way to that place from Cañon City. His murderer was the first white man hanged at Cañon City. It is a long way from Idaho to the Dalles. Take this from page 656, same book: writing of early life in Montana he says:

'Public meetings were called usually Sunday, when some citizens were elected president of the district, miner's judge, sheriff, coroner.

became widely and favorably known by all the best people of the State.

Mr. Hard was married October 28, 1874, to Miss Mae L. Fisk, a native of Rochester, New York. After his marriage he purchased 160 acres of land and took a homestead claim to eighty acres more, this being the property where he now resides, the whole cost of it being $1,000. He built a little home on his land, and soon afterward made a trip East in order to procure thoroughbred and trotting horses. He brought back with him ten fine brood mares and two thoroughbred horses, and at once became a successful breeder. He had the honor of raising in Montana the first registered thoroughbred, "Peek-a-boo," with which he won the first Derby race in Montana. He continued raising horses for many years. On this subject he is considered an authority.

When the question of locating and building the Montana University was brought up, Mr. Hard, with his usual enterprise and liberality, offered to donate forty acres of his land, and the offer was accepted. He has since erected a commodious residence, built of stone, and in it he and his family are surrounded with all the comforts of life. His family is composed of four children: Carl B., Leila H., George Gray and Bessie Chester. With the means of higher education so convenient for his children, Mr. Hard feels amply repaid for his liberality to the college.

Mr. Hard has always been a reliable member of the Republican party. In addition to the offices already mentioned, he served as Under Sheriff of Lewis and Clarke county for two years, and also two years as Marshal of Helena.

JESSE ALLEN DOUGHTY, one of Helena's enterprising business men, dates his birth in Hartland, Maine, May 21, 1842. Brief record of his life is as follows:

Mr. Doughty's ancestors on the paternal side were Irish, while on the maternal side they were English. Both were early settlers of America, and were participants in the wars and early history of this country, one of his ancestors serving as a Colonel in the Revolution, and grandfather James Doughty being a participant in the war of 1812. Philip Doughty, the father of our subject, was born in Maine, May 7, 1811, and married Mahetable Allen, also a native of that State. He had in early life been a Baptist, but later became a Methodist. A ship carpenter by occupation, and for a number of years a seafaring man, he later settled down to the quiet life of a farmer. In 1855 he removed to Iowa, where he owned and improved a farm, and whence, in 1879, he removed to Reedsville, Washington county, Oregon, settled on a farm, and there spent the residue of his life. He died in the seventy-seventh year of his age, and his wife, after surviving him five years, also died in her seventy-seventh year. They had a family of eleven children, of whom ten are still living.

Jesse A. was the fourth born in this family. He spent the first thirteen years of his life in his native State, removed with his parents to Iowa, and there worked on the farm in summer and attended school in the winter until he was eighteen. Then, in the spring of 1860, he started for California, being hired to drive an ox team across the plains to Salt Lake, hauling goods to the miners. From Salt Lake he and his party continued on to Placerville, California, making this part of the journey with their own team. The trip from Iowa to Placerville consumed five months. He remained at Placerville during the winter, and the following spring purchased teams and engaged in freighting from Sacramento to Carson City. This business he continued successfully for five years. He then turned his attention to prospecting, and was one of the discoverers of gold at Reese river, and for some time was more or less interested in mines. In the meantime, however, he continued his freighting, selling lumber at $250 per 1,000 feet, and hay for $250 per ton.

As showing the enterprise of the people at that time, Mr. Doughty says that he hauled fourteen wagon loads of lumber and hardware for a man, unloaded his train at the site for the building at nine o'clock in the morning, and upon going around there at nine o'clock that evening he found the large building up, the shelves and stock in, and seven clerks selling goods.

Mr. Doughty next went to Bridger's Pass, on the over

These courts, without hesitation, granted divorces and the judges performed marriage ceremonies without question." (!!) Does Mr. Bancroft insist that the first generation of Montana is illegitimate? I have only to say in answer to this part of his Montana history that the women had not arrived yet; and as a rule you can't very well have marriages, or divorces either, till you have some women around.

The Society of California Pioneers is composed of men who came to California prior to the first day of January, 1850, and their male descendants. The proceedings hereinafter recited have been taken, therefore, after due and careful deliberation, by men who are personally familiar with the true facts of early California history, and who have been actuated by a sense of duty to themselves and to posterity in correcting certain gross misrepresentations in regard to the men and events of that early period. These misrepresentations have appeared from time to time in the books commonly known as "Bancroft's Histories," and have heretofore passed unchallenged and found common public acceptance as authority for reviewers, and others who have written upon the subject.

The time has at last arrived when, in the judgment of the now old men who yet compose the majority of members of this society, the gross mis-statements in regard to men and events which these books contain should be land stage line, where he spent a year, dealing in cattle and horses. It was then about the close of the war, and the Indians were very troublesome, stealing much of his stock. On this account he was obliged to leave. Then he returned to his friends in northwestern Iowa, married and settled on a farm of 120 acres, and resided in that vicinity for twenty-nine years. But still desiring to return to the mountain regions of the West, he sold out and selected Helena as the best and most promising city in which to locate. Accordingly, in 1888 he established himself in the grocery business on the corner of Main and Seventh streets, Helena, where he conducted a successful business for two years and a half. Then he disposed of the store, and with others invested in the Big Ox silver mine, near Marysville. After the company had expended $100,000 in its development the stringency for money caused them for the present to cease work. About this time Mr. Doughty embarked in the furniture and hardware business on Helena avenue, near the Northern Pacific depot, where he now has one store, 20 x 70 feet, full of hardware, and three large store-rooms, all on the ground floor, devoted to furniture.

It was March 20, 1866, that he was married to Miss Ester Rogers, a native of Connecticut and a daughter of Samuel Rogers, of that State. Mr. and Mrs. Doughty have had seven children, four of whom died in childhood. The others are Helen, wife of Robert W. Neill, a business man of Helena; Mabel, wife of Asbury Owens, a contractor and builder at Spirit Lake, Iowa; and Mary, who resides with her parents.

Mr. Doughty has been a Republican all his life, and for a good portion of his time while residing at Spirit Lake, Iowa, he held various offices in his township, including one term as Mayor of the city. He is an active member of the Masonic fraternity, and is at present Warden of King Solomon Lodge, No. 9, of Helena. He is also Past Chancellor of the K. of P., and their representative to the Grand Lodge, and for the past five terms he has been Master of the Exchequer. In the winter of 1866 he became a member of the Methodist Church, and for the past twenty-seven years he has been a faithful and active worker. He was Superintendent of the Sabbath school for twelve consecutive years, and has been an official member of the church almost all the time. Immediately upon his arrival in Helena he presented his letter to the church and soon after was elected one of the Trustees and a member of the building committee, and rendered material and efficient aid in the building of the fine St. Paul's Church edifice, the best in the city. He is now Treasurer of the church, is heart and soul in the work, and is considered one of the most useful pillars. As a business man he is obliging and enterprising, and is highly respected in the community in which he lives.

GEORGE BOOKER, a Montana pioneer of 1864, and one of Helena's best known citizens, is a native of St. Louis, Missouri, born February 7, 1840. He is of German and French extraction. His parents, Charles and Mary Booker, are residents of Illinois, and in his early life his father was a merchant tailor.

When George Booker was thirteen years of age he left home to do for himself, and for some time clerked and did whatever else he could find to do. In 1859 he went to Denver, Colorado, and mined there in the placer mines and also learned the trade of bricklayer, at which trade he worked until he came with a mule team to Virginia City, in 1864. After this he was engaged in freighting between Virginia City and Fort Benton, a distance of 210 miles, freighting being then a profitable employment. He received from 25 to 30 cents per pound for carrying freight, and usually handled about 2,500 pounds each trip he made with his four-mule team. This business he continued about two years. He came to Helena in 1866, his first employment here being as clerk for P. A. Ray. Then he turned his attention to the auction and commission business, in which he has ever since been engaged. He has sold at auction all kinds of properties, lands and pools, and has done more of that kind of business than any other man in the State of Montana, and is refuted, by the publication of the testimony of living witnesses, so that that testimony may go upon record and be perpetuated, and the real facts and truth of history be vindicated.

In all its proceedings upon the question this society has vainly sought to find a just motive on the part of the so-called "Historian" Bancroft for the astonishing mis-statements which he has given in his works. No excuse, no circumstance of palliation has so far been offered by him in the matter. This society can do no more, therefore, than to refer the whole subject to the deliberative judgment of a discriminating public, in the belief that the common verdict of that public as well as that of posterity will be that such so-called "history" as that herein considered will forever be held to be unworthy of credence, and will deserve and find no place in the public or private libraries of the world.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 6, 1893.

I hereby certify that this is a true copy of a paper which was enclosed in a sealed envelope, directed to Mr. Hubert H. Bancroft.

JOHN F. PINKHAM,
Marshal, Society of California Pioneers.

In accordance with this notification, your committee met on the 12th day of December, 1893, for the purpose therein stated. Mr. Bancroft not appearing before them, either in person or by representative, your committee requested Mr. Holladay to ascertain Mr. Bancroft's post-office address and to forward to him by registered letter another copy of the charges, together with a further notification, fixing the 26th day of December upon which the committee would again meet, and give him another opportunity to be heard, if he desired to do so. Your committee met again, on the date and at the hour mentioned in said last named notification, but Mr. Bancroft not appearing, and no response having been received from him, adjourned until the 9th day of January, 1894. Mr. Bancroft not then appearing and no response having been received from him, your committee adjourned until the 16th of January, 1894, at which time Mr. Bancroft still having failed to appear, and making no response, your committee deemed it unnecessary to delay the investigation further and, therefore, proceeded to hear and consider the charges, which had been formulated by Mr. Farwell and so served upon Mr. Bancroft.

This indictment—if we may so term it—is divided into seven counts, each one of which is made up of a group of specific charges, each of which charges your committee proceeded to carefully and patiently investigate by reference in Helena the principal auctioneer of the city. During all these years Mr. Booker has had various partners, his present partner being James B. Loomis, their store being located at the corner of Park avenue and Edwards street.

Mr. Booker built his pleasant residence on one of the heights in the city of Helena, No. 305 Pine street, the view from which of the city and surrounding country is magnificent. Here he and his family are surrounded with all the comforts of life. He was married in 1872, to Miss Mattie E. Walton, a native of Missouri and a daughter of Moses E. Walton, Esq., her father being now a resident of Silver City, Montana, where he is engaged in mining and farming. Mr. and Mrs. Booker have three children: Ethel Laticie, Clinton Talbert and Lester Harry, all natives of Helena.

Politically, Mr. Booker is a Democrat, and for many years he has been a member of the Fire Department of Helena. In 1868 he was made a Master Mason, and ever since that time has been devoted to the order. He has taken all the degrees in the blue lodge, chapter, council and commandry, has received the thirty-second degree in the Scottish rite, and has the honor of having filled nearly all the chairs in all the branches of Masonry. He has been Secretary of Helena Lodge, No. 3, for twenty-two years; Helena Chapter, No. 2, five years; Helena Council, No. 3, sixteen years; Helena Commandry, No. 2, eighteen years; Chapter Rose Croix, two years; and Algera Temple, A. O. O. N. M. S., four years, and is at the present time (1893) Secretary of all the branches mentioned. For two years he was Treasurer of the Grand Commandry of the State. Few have done more in Montana to advance the interests of the order than has he, and from his brother Masons he has received the name of the "Encyclopedia of the Order." At an early day during the Indian wars Mr. Booker served as transportation master, and rendered much valuable service in forwarding supplies to the soldiers.

THOMAS E. BRADY a resident of Great Falls and a prominent member of the bar of Cascade county, Montana, dates his birth in the parish of St. Antoine Abbey, Huntingdon county, Province of Quebec, July 31, 1857. His father, Phillip Brady, was born in Ireland in 1819, and when sixteen years of age came to Canada and settled in Huntingdon county, where he was subsequently married to Miss Mary Murphy, a native of Canada, and of Irish parentage. They purchased a farm, settled on it and there reared their family of eleven children, Thomas E. being their seventh born: all are living except two. The parents celebrated their golden wedding April 11, 1892, and are still living. They are devout members of the Catholic Church and their lives have been characterized by honest industry.

to, and comparison with, the several volumes of "Bancroft's Histories," at the several pages therein specifically referred to.

* * * * * * *

Fifth—The apparently malignant, and certainly cruel and unjust, attack upon the name and memory of General Grant, who, while living, was an honored, as well as an honorary member of this society, as set forth in the fifth count of this indictment, your committee find fully sustained, and cannot refrain from expressing the opinion, that to retain the name of General Grant in its list of honorary members, together with that of his maligner, Hubert Howe Bancroft, would be an act of inconsistency unworthy of the name and fame of the Society of California Pioneers.

Sixth—The group of charges comprised in the sixth count of this indictment, wherein contradictory statements, in regard to early pioneers, appear in the different editions of the same volumes, and the pusillanimous treatment of the late Judge Terry's conflict with the "Vigilance Committee" of 1856, as related and exposed, we find fully sustained.

Seventh—The closing, or seventh count of this already more than severe indictment, wherein it is shown that Mr. Bancroft's methods of writing history are, to assert certain conclusions of his own, in regard to the men and events of the period of which he has written and to denounce all who differ with him as "liars," no matter what part they may have played in these events, how much better may have been their opportunities of knowing the true facts of history, how upright may have been their lives, or how unsullied their reputations while living, we find fully sustained.

Finally, the case, as presented against Mr. Bancroft, as a whole, constitutes, in the opinion of your special committee, valid reasons why the name of Hubert Howe Bancroft should no longer be permitted to remain upon the roll of this society as an honorary member.

"Of course, I don't say that Mr. Bancroft has lied about us old fellows, but the old Californians say he has lied and I say the old Californians tell the truth and were right in expelling him for publishing so many errors concerning the moral character of the early prospectors of Montana. * * And so I leave him for aye and for aye."

Thomas E. Brady was reared on his father's farm and was educated in the common schools and the St. Theresa College, being a graduate of the latter institution with the class of 1880. In 1880 he had commenced the study of law in Plattsburg, New York, under the instructions of the firm of Palmer, Weed and Smith, and in due time completed his course, was admitted to the bar and began the practice of his profession. He remained in Plattsburg until November, 1886, when he came to Montana.

Mr. Brady's first location in Montana was at Helena, where he remained six months. From there he came to Great Falls, arriving here May 16, 1887. He at once began the practice of his profession here and has met with very satisfactory success, numbering among his clientage the largest business firms in this part of the State. His various investments have also proved fortunate. In company with others, he is largely interested in mining and sheep-raising, having as many as 12,000 sheep. He owns a large tract of ranch lands. Having been reared on a farm he acquired a love for fine horses, and he is now indulging himself in this fancy by raising trotting horses of the Belmont stock, some of his horses being specimens of which he may be justly proud. He is also largely interested in the fine and extensive system of water works in the city of Neihart, Montana, his brother William and he having received the franchise and constructed them to completion.

When he first located here he invested in city real estate, all of which has greatly advanced in value. He built a fine residence in the town, which he and his family occupy and where they are surrounded with the comforts of life. He also built a commodious barn in which he keeps his choice stock.

September 3, 1889, Mr. Brady was married in Plattsburgh, New York, to Miss M. E. Chauvin, daughter of E. Chauvin of that city. They have two children, Lillian M., and William T. C., both born in Great Falls.

Mr. and Mrs. Brady are active members of the Catholic Church. They helped to organize the church at Great Falls, have contributed largely toward its support and are ranked with its leading members. Politically, Mr. Brady is a Democrat, and for one year he has served as chairman of the Democratic city committee. He has, however, declined at all times all political nominations tendered him, and his sole aspiration is to rank well at the bar of justice, WALTER MATHESON, who has been engaged in the real-estate business in Helena, Montana, since 1877, is one of the representative men of the city.

He was born in Simcoe, Canada, February 7, 1848, and resided there until he was seventeen years of age, when he removed to Toronto, where he graduated at the military college of that place. Previous to his going to Toronto he had attended the schools of his native town, and upon his removal to that place he began the study of law, and in due time graduated and was admitted to the bar. Then he returned to Simcoe, entered upon the

CHAPTER XI.

WHERE DOES GOLD COME FROM?—SPECULATION—GEOLOGICAL—GEOLOGY WITHOUT BOOKS.

"SURELY there is a vein for the silver and a place for gold where they fine it."

This saying, from Job, as true to-day as in the time of the world's sublimest poet, was very familiar in the mouths of the California miners of old. Their rendering of it, however, was less poetical by far, though the meaning was not so widely different. "Silver has veins, but gold is wherever you can find it." This was the gold miner's rendering of the inspired verse. For truly gold in the old days of placer-mining, before men had traced gold from the gulch to its habitat and birth-place in the rocks, was wherever you could find it."

In contemplating the wondrous story of Montana we fall to marveling all the time why the millions of gold were not discovered in the gulches here in some way long before they were.

"Tons of glittering gold lying all up and down the land in the very grass roots." Trappers, traders, troops of soldiers for at least a full century, tramping this gold dust in the dirt; and even a decade or more after gold had been found in California,—even after placer fields had been emptied of their treasures to a great degree, and old miners were seeking new fields, still Montana slept on in her infant cradle, undisturbed for years by the clang and clatter of pick-ax and shovel in the gulches! Graduates of West Point, officers who were surely learned in all the mystery of precious minerals, spent season after season in Montana, notably Capt. John Mullen, in cutting out the Mullen milipractice of his profession, and continued his residence there until the spring of 1872, when he removed to Montana and settled in the Yellowstone valley. He was one of the pioneers of that place and helped to found the town of Billings, the county seat of Yellowstone county, of which he was the first Mayor, serving in that capacity two years. He also served as Coroner of Yellowstone county. He was engaged in both the real-estate and newspaper business, being at one time interested in the Billings Post and afterward in the Herald. He was also president of the Yellowstone Building Society, resigning that position in 1877, when he removed to Helena. Since coming to Helena he has given his attention to the real-estate business and has also been interested in mining, among other ventures being the development of an extensive placer mine at Emigrant Gulch, on the upper Yellowstone river.

Fraternally, Mr. Matheson is identified with the A. O. U. W. and the F. & A. M. He is also a member of the Presbyterian Church.

Mr. Matheson was married in April, 1874, to Miss Mary Gillen, of Brantford, Canada. They have four daughters, Winifred, Ruth, Catharine and Eleanor.

CAPTAIN JAMES H. MILLS, one of Montana's representative citizens, who has been identified with this part of the country from its earliest settlement, is a native of New Lisbon, Ohio, born December 21, 1837.

Captain Mills descended from English and Holland ancestors, seven generations of the family having been born on American soil,—in Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania and Ohio. Both his maternal and paternal ancestors participated in the Revolutionary war. As far back as can be traced the Mills family have been members of the Presbyterian Church, and they were for the most part artisans. Captain Mills' father, George S. Mills, was born in Pennsylvania in 1815. His mother, Susan Davis, also a native of Pennsylvania, was a daughter of John Davis, of that State, who removed to Ohio about 1814. The father died in his sixty-fourth year, the mother's untimely death occurring when she was twenty-eight, their only child being James H.

After the death of his mother, the subject of our sketch went to live with a relative, by whom he was reared and educated, his schooling being received in Eastern Ohio and at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. In early life he was inured to farm work, later engaged in mertary road, which was to tie the head-waters of the two great rivers together and make our possession of Montana and her sisters more secure, let the mountain brooks still run sweet and clear as they had done for thousands of years; the alder leaves lisped and glistened in the sun, and the trout darted, undisturbed from sedgy bank to mossy boulder's shadow, above a bed of gold!

And it is quite as much a matter of wonder that Fremont did not discover gold in California during his years of exploration there. He named the sea door of San Francisco Bay the "Golden Gate," and reported his reasons for so doing to Congress years before gold was found at Capt. Sutter's mill. His tent was pitched at the very time he named the "Golden Gate" on the mountain side above the city of Oakland, which is even to this day, perforated with pits and tunnels by miners in fruitless search of gold. And Fremont must have been familiar with the brief statement of Drake, made generations before, to the effect that gold was to be found in the interior of Alta California. Truly, "silver hath a vein," but the only certain place in which we may hope to find gold is where they refine or mint it.

How many an old gold miner will close this page here and smile half sadly as he recalls the heaps of gold-dust he has dragged his weary legs over in his weary endeavor to reach some mining camp a little further on. Ever and forever, it was only "a little further on."

In 1860 the writer, after having spent years in the California gold mines, was sent with a party to subdivide and sectionize a few townships for settlement on the south bank of the Columbia river. We pitched camp on a bar, remained there for months, completed the survey and went home, not dreaming that we had slept every night on beds of gold-dust. On passing cantile and mechanical pursuits, and finally engaged in the timber business, and was thus employed in Jefferson county, Pennsylvania, when the Civil war broke out. April 27, 1861, in response to President Lincoln's first call for volunteers, he enlisted in Company G, Eleventh Pennsylvania Reserves, Fortieth Infantry. He entered the service as a private, participated in twenty-seven general engagements, his regiment being a part of the Army of the Potomac. He was successively promoted as Corporal, First Sergeant, First Lieutenant and Captain, and for "gallant conduct" in the battles of the Wilderness and Bethesda Church (the latter occurring the last day of his term of service) was commissioned Brevet Major and Brevet Lieutenant Colonel. The regiment remained on duty nearly two months after his three years' term of service had expired, and he was mustered out with it at Pittsburg, June 13, 1864. During the entire service he passed through unscathed, notwithstanding many "close calls," seeming almost to possess a charmed life. This is the more remarkable, considering that of the more than two thousand regiments in the Union armies during the war the Eleventh Pennsylvania Reserves sustained the eighth heaviest loss.

After the war Captain Mills engaged in the wholesale leather business at Pittsburg, where he remained until the spring of 1866. At that time he came to Montana and first turned his attention to mining, operating on the Yellowstone river. In company with several others he was interested in the opening of a hydraulic claim at Emigrant Gulch. Provisions were high and very difficult to obtain at any price. He and his party gave their money to a packer to buy provisions at Bozeman and bring them to the mines, and after some weeks of anxious waiting for his return they learned that he had gambled away the money and left for parts unknown. They were thus obliged to abandon their claim. Captain Mills had sunk his money in the venture, and when he arrived in Virginia City, in November, 1866, had just ten cents in postal currency. He at once, however, secured employment there as bookkeeper for a party who had freight trains, a "corral" and a little hotel. An article which he had written for an Eastern journal soon afterward accidentally came to the notice of Mr. D. W. Tilton, and through it Captain Mills was offered the editorship of the Montana Post, which he accepted, and thus became the editor of the first paper published in the Territory of Montana, succeeding Prof. Dimsdale and Judge Blake. He entered on these duties in December, 1866. The Post was removed to Helena in 1868, and Captain Mills continued with it until 1869. In July of that year he founded the New Northwest in Deer Lodge, of which he was editor and publisher until November 1891, a period of twenty-two years, during which time he was a prominent factor in all that pertained to the welfare of Montana, and has been as thoroughly acquainted with her history, development and progress as perhaps any of her citizens.

Captain Mills has been a life-long Republican, and as that way after more than thirty years it was found that the whole bar had been turned upside down, and gold enough to load a boat taken out.

And now will you permit a bit of speculation, theory, as to the original growth or deposit of gold in the rocks? Of course all know that gold dust is simply debris or washings from some ledge of gold-bearing quartz in the mountains above; but we did not know that at first in California, nor for a long time after, eager as all were to get at the true theory of gold-dust deposits. All thinking men had their own ideas on the subject. I surely had mine, and still have them, modified from time to time, of course, by experience and careful observation; and whether or not these observations and conclusions on the formation or growth of gold and the formation and growth of the rock in which gold grows or forms will instruct or even interest, they shall be here briefly set down; for it is not easy to spend long years in looking into these things without forming some practical opinions. Some few miners have time and scientific reading enough to study books on geology to the bottom of the profound subject; but to many good men of busy lives these books mean only a confusion of strange, big words; big words and small ideas; for such, like myself, is this chapter humbly introduced.

Men of tenacious, theological trend of mind who dug gold from the placer gulches of California, formerly held that this gold had been placed there by the finger of God, on the day of creation; and even when it was found a few years later that gold dust was simply washings from veins or deposits of gold in mountains above, many still hold that these deposits were made when the world was made. Other men held that gold grows, as potatoes grow, and by camp and cabin fire these diverse points were argued hotly by the persist-such has served the party and the State in various positions. He was a member of the First Constitutional Convention of Montana. Upon the election of General Hayes to the Presidency, he appointed Captain Mills Secretary of the Territory, in which capacity he served five years, at the end of which time he declined a reappointment. In 1889 he was again nominated for a member of the convention to formulate the State Constitution. This nomination he resigned to accept appointment as Collector of Internal Revenue for the district including Montana, Idaho and Utah, in which position he served until February 28, 1893, when he resigned and accepted the appointment of State Commissioner of the Bureau of Agriculture, Labor and Industry. This bureau had just been established by an act of the Legislature. His appointment is for a period of four years, and such have been his opportunities for information on these subjects that he is eminently fitted for the position to which he is now devoting his whole time.

In 1875 Captain Mills married Miss Ella M. Hammond, a native of Wisconsin and a daughter of Martin Hammond, of that State. She came to Montana in 1865. They have three children—Mary E., Nellie G. and James H. Jr.,—all natives of Montana.

Captain Mills is a Companion of the Loyal Legion, Past Senior Vice Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, Past Grand Master Workman of the A. O. U. W., and in 1894 is Senior Grand Warden of the A. F. & A. M., of Montana. In his religious views he partakes largely of that liberality which characterizes the people of the West. Mrs. Mills became a member of the Presbyterian Church in 1876. Both are favorably known throughout the State where they have so long resided.

JOHN RANDOLPH WATSON, who is engaged in the grocery business in Helena, Montana, is one of the enterprising business men of the city. Following is a brief sketch of his life:

John Randolph Watson was born in Portland, Maine, May 29, 1837, of American ancestry, and resided there until fifteen years of age, when he accompanied his parents to Pekin, Illinois, where he lived about four years, removing thence to Warren county, Iowa. He learned photography, and while engaged in this business in Iowa was the victim of an explosion which came near causing his death, he being badly burned about the head and face, his injuries incapacitating him for work for nearly two years. Recovering, he removed to St. Louis and engaged in his profession until the breaking out of the war, when he enlisted in Merrill's Horse Cavalry, Second Missouri Regiment.

In 1864 he bought a cattle train at St. Joseph, Missouri, and, loading the wagons with corn, started for the West. At Denver he disposed of his train and stock of goods, and became one of the owners of a grocery train bound for Montana. Virginia City was his first stopping place in this State, and in December of that same year he removed to Helena, where he established the first grocery store. At that time there were only a few log houses ent gold hunters for years, even from the desert sands of Arizona to the snow-capped summits of Montana's gold fields. Time has brought forward little or no testimony for the first simple belief; nor can it as yet be boldly asserted with any great array of evidence that "gold grows as potatoes grow;" but one or two facts may be briefly set down to indicate that gold, although it does not perish and corrode, as silver, and lead and iron and other baser minerals, does really grow or form.

In 1855 some miners near Shasta, California, while taking out gold from rotten quartz in a "pocket" or "chimney" near the surface to which they had been led by rich deposits in the gulch below, found a petrified bone. The marrow of this bone had turned to quartz, and in this quartz was gold.

Doctor Ream, one of the most learned and reliable men in California, has in his collection of prehistoric skeletons and stone implements the thigh-bone of a giant, in which you can see, through a split in it, a clean white seam of quartz; the marrow having turned to what looks like good gold-bearing quartz! The statement has been made that gold may be seen in this, as was seen in the one at Shasta; but the gold is not there. The quartz, however, is there, the quartz in which gold grows or forms has grown or formed in it, out of the marrow in a man's leg. Now heed closely. This bone, like the one in Shasta,—unfortunately now destroyed,—rested on a mountain side in the great Yreka quartz and gold district.

Tell me what chemical process was required to convert what seems to have been water, with green moss, grasses, leaves, into quartz or moss agate, and can you tell what turned marrow into quartz.

Mr. Hubert Howe Bancroft's History of Wash-

scattered along the gulch. He located on a tract of land and at once built a cabin, in which he opened up his stock of goods. The site of the cabin is still owned by Mr. Watson, but a handsome brick block has succeeded the primitive structure of the early days. Groceries and provisions brought almost fabulous prices then. In the spring of 1865 there occurred the flour failure, and bread stuff sold at prices almost beyond realization. Vegetables were also a luxury. Mr. Watson became the purchaser of two wagon-loads of potatoes that were brought from the Gallatin valley and that he sold at from one to two dollars a pound. He has resided in Helena continuously since 1864, engaged in the grocery business. Aside from this he is interested in ranching and stock-raising, having ranches in the Prickley Pear and Gallatin valleys.

Mr. Watson was married in Philadelphia, in 1868, to Miss Sarah Starr, daughter of Jesse W. Starr, the Philadelphia and Camden founder, and a niece of ex-Congressman John F. Starr. Mrs. Watson died in Helena in 1871. They had one child, a son, who died at the age of five months.

HENRY KLEIN, a prominent merchant and pioneer of Helena, was born in Austria, August 4, 1837. His father, Gabriel Klein, also a native of that country, was a merchant there until he came to America, in 1863, bringing his family with him and settling in San Francisco, where he died, having attained the advanced age of ninety-three years. Three of his sons had preceded him to the United States, and were engaged in the mercantile business at San Francisco at the time he located there.

In 1866, Henry Klein severed his connection with the San Francisco firm, and in company with Louis Gans, established a mercantile business in Helena, under the firm name of Gans & Klein. Mr. Gans is now a prominent New York business man. With the business interests of the embryo city they at once became identified, and have continued with it, being now one of the most enterprising and successful firms in the State of Montana, doing a large wholesale and retail business, dealing in clothing, hats and caps, boots and shoes and gentlemen's furnishing goods. In the upper end of the town they erected a building in which they conducted their trade for fifteen years. From there they removed to their present quarters on the corner of Broadway and Main streets, this block having been erected by them, and finished and furnished with all the latest modern improvements, it being one of the fine business blocks for which Helena has become noted. It is 27x115 feet, four stories and basement, and the whole of it is occupied by Gans & Klein. They are sole agents in Montana for several large Eastern manufacturers, and by their very libera and honorable dealing, they have built up an extensive trade. During their long and successful business career here they have acquired valuable real estate, both city and country, and are also interested in farming and stock raising, and in mines and mining.

Mr. Klein has been thoroughly identified with Helena ington, Idaho and Montana, p 507, says: "In Montana quartz is not always the mother of gold when iron and copper with their sulphurets and oxides are often a matrix for it. Even driftwood long imbedded in the soil has its calcareous matter impregnated with it; and a solution of gold in the water is not rare."

This wild statement is quoted, not that Mr. Bancroft knows any more about the subject than he does about so many other things which he treats, but to show that the inquiry is and has been broad and universal, and yet no intelligent answer. For here we have been nearly fifty years in the gold fields, and yet a man writing an alleged history of these lands gravely tells us, and he certainly tells us all he knows or has learned from others, that gold is found in the driftwood of Montana and that "a solution of gold in the water is not rare." He also says, same page, that gold is often found in alluvial soil and asks if this may not be the origin of flour gold, —a sort of pulverized wheat!

With this let us proceed with our own conclusions about the growth of gold. Briefly, shall we not concede that some sort of gases from below converts certain substances into quartz ready to receive gold? Gold is found only in the mountain seams, or of upheavals, where the crust has been broken and rent asunder.

Active gold mining is going on to-day in the rediscovered old mines within a few hours of London, but the mines are in the mountains of Wales; and if ever the gold mines of Gaul, mentioned by early writers, are rediscovered, they will be found not in the valleys but in the mountains of France. Briefly to sum up, I can but conclude, after all my years of observation, that the peculiar rock in which gold is found is created from gases escaping from the rent and ever since he located here. Indeed, few men have done more to advance its interests than has he. He took stock in the companies which brought gas, electric light and electric railways to the city. He served three terms on the Council of the city, took an active part in the establishment of the public library, the erection of the library building, and also aided materially in the building of the beautiful temple erected by the few children of Israel who reside at Helena.

Mr. Klein was happily married in Helena, April 14, 1878, to Miss Annie Leon, a native of this country and a descendant of German ancestry. Their only son they named Leon. In 1887 Mrs. Klein died, and Mr. Klein has since remained single.

In politics he is a Republican, intelligent upon all the affairs of the country, but not a politician in the sense of desiring office. He has been a member of the Masonic fraternity for a number of years. As a citizen of Montana and a business man of Helena, Mr. Klein stands high, having secured the utmost confidence and esteem of hosts of friends. To give some idea of the extent of the interest his firm has taken in the improvement of the county, it may with propriety be stated here that they have spent on the improvements of their land alone no less than $200,000.

GOWAN FERGUSON, M. D., a popular and skillful young physician of Great Falls, Montana, dates his birth in Simcoe county, Ontario, July 16, 1866. His ancestors were Irish. His grandfather was an officer in the English army, who came to Canada as early as 1842, bringing with him his family, his son Isaac, Dr. Ferguson's father, being then a mere boy. They located in Simcoe county. When Isaac Ferguson grew up he was married, in Toronto, to Miss Emily J. Gowan, a native of Brockville, Ontario, and daughter of Lieutenant Colonel Ogle R. Gowan, of the Queen's Royal Borderers and a member of Parliament. They had four sons and two daughters, all of whom are living, the doctor being their second born. The father departed this life in 1889, at the age of fifty-eight years; the mother is still living. She is a member of the Episcopal Church, as was also Mr. Ferguson.

Dr. Ferguson has had excellent educational advantages. He attended the public schools, the Upper Canada College in Toronto and the University of Toronto. His medical education was obtained in the latter institution and in the New York Polyclinic school, where he graduated in 1888. He entered upon his professional career in Toronto, where he practiced two years, and whence, in May, 1891, he came to Great Falls. Here he has met with marked success. Both as a gentleman and as a physician, he is held in high esteem. He is a member of the Northern Montana Medical Association, of which he was elected and served as secretary in 1893, and he is also a member of the Montana State Medical Society and of the Medical Society of the City of Toronto. Socially, he is identified with the Elks and the Foresters.

broken crust of the earth below, and that gold is, as well, of a vapory or gaseous origin, rising from rents in the earth and forming on the walls and fissures of quartz.

"'Old Baldy' [Bald Mountain, the highest peak near Union City.] is my near neighbor. He is respected here as youth respects the venerable in all civilized communities. How long he has had his habitation where he now rests in conscious dignity, I know not. The time was, perhaps ere mortal's griefs begun, when he slept in the bottom of the sea, and the swimming tribes, from the leviathan to the modest crinoid, climbed his rugged sides and sported in his pockets. How he came to change his sphere the learned can only guess, while he remains silent. It may be that gradually the waters were called to the Eastern ocean, and he rose from his uneasy bed as centuries rolled back into the eternal past; or perchance the angry earthquake flung him up toward the heavens and bade him stay to chill the summer breezes as they kiss his bronzed cheek in their onward flight. However he came, he was not alone. In his huge arms he brought with him his old associates. The plant of the ocean still slumbers in his watchful keeping, perfect in all its fibres and leafy beauty; although he has chilled it into stone hard as his rocky coat of mail. The shell-fish came with him, hid in his curves and recesses."

It is not at all probable that when Montana and all the Rocky mountains lay cradled in the bottom billows of the ocean as the fossil sea-shells and salt-fish reveal, her gold and silver lay there as now. But when the great upheaval came shafts of fire shooting to the stars, the earth's crust, broken and banded together, bulged skyward from compression and contraction of the globe or from whatever cause in the awful crash of matter; then the rounding down, the ice age, the glacier from the cold blue waters north, the grinding into form, the clay in the potter's hand on the wheel, Ossa on Pelon here, fathomless chasms there; a crash, a cañon is filled, and the hairy monster, the giant primitive man, leaning mutely on his stone-tipped spear, looks up in the morning and Ossa is not!

RICHARD HOBACK came to Montana in 1864 with General Sully, and in 1866 settled at Helena, where he has since continuously resided.

Mr. Hoback was born in the State of Kentucky, August 11, 1835. His grandfather, Michael Hoback, was a Virginian and one of the first settlers in Kentucky. He served in the Revolution, being with Washington during the great privations that the little army of patriots underwent during the hard winter at Valley Forge. He reared four daughters and one son, and lived to be ninety years old. He was a Kentucky farmer. His son, Michael Hoback, was born in Kentucky in 1797, and married Josephine Burchin, a native of that State. Her grandfather came from Ireland to this country during the Revolution and settled in Kentucky where he engaged in farming up to the time of his death. He had been a member of the Methodist Church for forty years. Our subject's parents also had four daughters and one son. They emigrated to Indiana in 1848, where he resided until 1873, when his death occurred. His wife had died in 1849.

Their son, Richard, attended a little private school and at eleven years of age started out to do for himself. He first worked on the farm for $13 per month, which was then thought to be good wages. In 1854 he went to St. Paul, Minnesota, and worked for the Government on the Sioux Reservation. He remained there as a teamster until 1862, at which time he enlisted in the Randville Rangers to engage in subduing the Indians. His company was raised at the agency to join a regiment at Fort Snelling. They started on Friday, stopped a day at Fort Ridgley and on the 18th reached St. Peter's, where they were informed by a courier that the Indians had killed all the whites at the agency. It was claimed that 800 men, women and children were killed. The rangers returned as rapidly as possible, and were for seven days besieged by about 1,000 warriors, the rangers numbering about forty-two, with the other whites with them numbering altogether about 200. The Indians tried every plan known to savage warfare to capture the brave little band, but without avail. After the seventh day of siege General Sibley came to their relief with three regiments and attacked the Indians and drove them off. They all pursued the red men as far as Wood lake, where another battle ensued, resulting in the complete subjugation of the Indians, the capture of 500 lodges, and the rescue of 300 white women and children from worse than death. Mr. Hoback's company was not then needed and was disbanded. But the wild life of the frontier was suited to his adventurous nature, and soon after he enlisted in the Mountain Rangers and was sent out on the plains to protect the emigrants. His company struck the main camp of the Sioux at Bone Hill, now in Dakota, just across the river where Bismark is now located; fought and whipped Ages and ages roll by ; beasts less monstrous, man less a beast, grasses, God's still, small rain, gold and silver growing.

Ages roll by, storms of rain when the mountains seem melting to the sea ; peaks topple, fall slide, in their slime and mud ; rivers in their track toward the sea ; huge abutments of ice-bound mountains,—they break away and dash to the valley buttes !

In the bed of Cañon creek, Oregon, 1863, the head of a huge buffalo was found, although it is held by learned men that this beast never descended the western slope of the Rocky mountains. Cortez and his men found no living animal in Mexico larger than the mountain goat, yet recent excavations show skeletons like that dug from the mine in Oregon. We thus see that at times all life was destroyed from one end of the continent to the other, only to be restored and destroyed, destroyed and restored. Meantime, as the mountains melted down, they washed down and so ground and ground to dust the gold that had been growing from æons back. Ages and ages still of glaciers, mountains sliding toward the seas ; rivers forming ; world building.

May be the gold and silver formed more slowly as the fearful fissures, the sobbing, broken heart of earth began to heal and close under the hand of time ; may be gold and silver stopped forming or growing entirely. But, briefly, to use the vigorous phrase of the old miners of California, "gold grows as potatoes grow."

It brings us to our own time and quite out of the field of speculation, to have Prof. Whitney in his geological survey of California point out that a certain valley in California was materially changed by the fearful storms of 1861–2. No one who has not really fronted and felt the rage of the elements, as this wearing down of the earth goes on, can comprehend its terror. What they must have been before man came, when the

them, and then returned and went with Governor Ramsey up the Red river, where they made a treaty of peace with the Chippewa Indians; returned to Fort Snelling and were mustered out. In the spring of 1864 they were reorganized and formed the Second Minnesota Cavalry, being ordered south to New Orleans. Before they started on the march, however, the order was countermanded and they were sent on the plains again, where they spent the summer. They came to the Missouri river under the command of General Thomas, there met General Sully, who took command, and the forces were augumented to 5,000 men. They laid out and built Fort Rice; came out to Hart river, corraled the train there and then went north until they again reached the Sioux Indians, where a battle ensued resulting in victory to the whites; returned to their train and came on to the Bad Lands, and on the Little Missouri again struck the Indians and followed them to the Yellowstone river; crossed the river, went to old Fort Union, crossed the Missouri, took a line of march for Mouse river, and returned to Fort Rice. When they arrived at the fort they found Colonel J. Fisk and his company corraled by the Indians. A detail was sent to relieve him, and he came back to Fort Rice. They then returned to Fort Snelling and wintered there. In the summer of 1865 they were on duty on the frontier of Dakota and Minnesota, and the following winter they built Fort Wadsworth in the Dakota Territory. In the spring of 1866 they were mustered out at Fort Snelling, During these campaigns Mr. Hoback traversed a large amount of territory, did lots of hard Indian fighting, and suffered many hardships and privations.

In the spring of 1866 a large company was formed to cross the plains to Montana, and of this party Mr. Hoback was a member. Their train was composed of 300 wagons. It was formed in Minnesota and came out to Montana on the route over which the Great Northern now runs its trains. He came to Helena and entered forty acres of land for mineral purposes. On this property he was engaged in placer mining for a number of years. Afterward he platted it, and to-day it forms a portion of the seventh ward of the city of Helena, much of it being covered with residences. While engaged in mining on this property, which was then called California Bar, Mr. Hoback and another man took out a pound of gold dust in five days, the value of which was $216. He continued his mining operations up to 1885. Since then he has purchased eighty acres of land a quarter of a mile further out. He has also been in partnership with Mr. C. W. Cannon in some large land deals.

Mr. Hoback was married in 1863 to Miss Mary Hayes, a native of Pennsylvania, and they are the parents of two children, William and Josephine; the first child was born in Minnesota, the latter in Helena. Their daughter saturated and dissolving mountains went dashing down the gold-growing gorges toward the sea, who shall conceive or attempt to say?

But as I chanced to be in the mountains of Idaho that terrible winter of storms referred to by the learned geologist, Whitney, and as I have already attempted to set down what I saw there in the way of world-building and in the wearing down of gold-growing mountains and grinding of gold dust, I venture to transmit the account to these pages, you will pardon the bit of romance or fiction. The personages are all real, the scenes and the superstition as entirely correct as can be set down.

CHAPTER XII.

ROCKY MOUNTAINS NOT ROCKY—CLIMATE MILD—THE COLD MONTHS NOT COLD—FIRST MINING IN MONTANA BY OREGONIANS.

TO see Montana through the guidance of these pages with the eye of the true seer, you must lay aside many popular traditions as you enter her doors.

In the first place, then, divest your mind of the idea that the Rocky mountains of Montana are rocky, rocky mountains. So far from that, they were from the first the great pasture fields of the red man, and black with buffaloes so fat in their season that they made earth tremble with their might and numbers when their ungainly bodies rolled in a terrified mass before their pursuers. The Rocky mountains of Montana are, and are to be, fields of golden harvest, granaries of the civilized globe.

The only thing that strikes the stranger with awe and admiration, on first looking on Montana, is her massiveness.

As you climb up the rounded, grassy steeps of the Rocky mountains of Montana, whether is now the wife of Thomas Wilkinson and resides in Los Angeles, California.

Mr. Hoback is a member of the G. A. R. and A. O. U. W. Previous to the civil war he was a Douglas Democrat, but has since been a Republican. He has never been an office-seeker and he has given little time to political matters, the only office he ever held being that of Alderman of Helena. He was one of the bravest of pioneers, has been an industrious man all his life, and by his wise investments at Helena has secured a competency, to which every one feels he is richly entitled.

JOSEPH NICHOLAS KENCK, assistant cashier of the Second National Bank of Helena, has been a resident of Montana since 1866. Following is a brief sketch of his life:

Joseph N. Kenck was born in Doniphan, Kansas, February 27, 1862, and the same year his parents emigrated to Virginia City, Nevada. He is of German parentage, his father and mother being natives of Baden Baden. In 1866 the family came to Montana. Two years ago his parents removed to San Diego, California, where they now reside.

The subject of our sketch received his early education in the public schools of Montana, and spent two years in school at Atchison, Kansas. He has resided in Diamond and Washington Gulch, two famous placer-producing sections, since coming to Montana, but the major portion of his time has been spent in Helena. After finishing his education he traveled in the East and South until 1885, when he accepted a position as bookkeeper in the Second National Bank of Helena, in which institution he was promoted to the position he now holds. At the city election of 1893 he was elected Alderman from the seventh ward of Helena, and he has also received the appointment of Public Administrator of Lewis and Clark counties. He is a member of the A. O. U. W., and religiously he is a Catholic. In politics he has ever been an enthusiastic Republican.

Mr. Kenck was married June 29, 1886, to Miss Agnes M. Kaiser, of Detroit, Michigan. They have four children, three sons and one daughter.

W. M. Dullard, M. D.

from the east or from the west, you first notice a tremendous hill before you, and massive, grass-set tumuli to your right, to your left, behind and before, as you proceed. You pass huge hills dotted with herds, ribbons of rills threading down and around and running together, here and there, forming wooded streams. Then you see before you more massive, grassy hills, more herds, more massive hills now, more herds, more hills, then more massive and mighty hills.

Such was the sublime aspect of this land when my eyes first looked upon it more than a generation ago, and such it must remain until "the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds."

Man may break this sublime monotony of nature a little, as time sweeps on, by a harvest field where the ever fertile hilltops tempt him to sow and reap; he may set his little city and center of trade by the meadow brook at the base, he may gridiron the great, rounded domes of grass that stretch in billowy succession east and west and north and south, but he will never be able to drive from the mind of the stranger the conviction, as he first beholds Montana, that it was, at the first, cast in a tremendous mould.

In the second place, this northern border of the nation is not in all respects northern. This cold blue north, where the great stars glitter in the clear, sparkling air of the majestic winter, is not uncomfortably cold.

Another peculiarity of the winters in the Rocky mountains is the insensibility of residents

DR WILLIAM MASON BULLARD, a prominent member of the medical profession of Helena, Montana, was born in Indianapolis, Indiana, April 23, 1853.

Dr. Bullard's paternal ancestors came to this country from England and settled in Massachusetts, where many generations of the family have lived, among them being many prominent ministers and physicians. Indeed, the Bullards have been a family of ministers and physicians, honored and loved in their professions. The Doctor's maternal ancestors were natives of Ireland, and also professional people. Henry Ward Beecher was a relative of Dr. Bullard, Mrs. Beecher being his father's sister. Dr. Talbut Bullard, the father of our subject, was a special surgeon in the Union army, under commission from Governor Morton, and in this way served his country up to the time of his death, in June, 1863, his death resulting from overwork and exposure in the field. He left a widow and two sons, the younger of whom died about ten years ago. Mrs. Bullard is still living, now in the sixty-eighth year of her age, honored and beloved by a large circle of friends, but by none more than her son.

Dr. William M. Bullard was reared to manhood in his native city, receiving his literary education there and at Cambridgeport, Massachusetts. He took a full medical course in the Indiana Medical College at Indianapolis, where he graduated with honors and received his degree of M. D., in 1876, and also studied chemistry at Heidelberg, Germany. He was for a time assistant to the Chair of Chemistry in the Indiana Medical College, afterward succeeding Prof. H. W. Wiley, now Chief Chemist of the Agricultural Department at Washington, as Professor of Chemistry and Toxicology. After completing his studies, he entered upon his professional career in Indianapolis, serving in turn the City Hospital as interne, and the City Dispensary.

He did not, however, remain there long, for in 1880 he came to Montana to accept the position of surgeon to the Alta Montana Company at Wickes, which afterward became the Helena Mining and Reduction Company. From Wickes Dr. Bullard went to Pony, Madison county, Montana, and took charge of the hospital for the Pony Gold Mining Company, remaining there until the company ceased operations, when he settled in Helena. Here he became associated with Dr. Charles K. Cole, with office rooms in the First National Bank block, and soon found himself in the midst of a large and lucrative practice. In 1889, when the Medical Practice act went into effect, Dr. Bullard was appointed a member of the Board of Medical Examiners. At the end of the first year he received the appointment for the full term of seven years, and by the Board he has been chosen its secretary. Largely to his efforts is due the successful working of the law. He is secretary of the Lewis and Clarke County Medical Association, and also of the State Medical Association, and chairman of the Board of Health of the city of Helena. Dr. Bullard is a member of the American Medical Association, the Medico-Legal Society of New York, and the American Chemical Society of New York.

In connection with his work as a physician and surgeon, Dr. Bullard devotes considerable time to chemistry and toxicology, having been engaged in many important cases in the courts of the State. In chemical work, foods and sanitary science he is considered an authority. He is constantly at work in the broad field of scientific to cold. The air is so dry and pure that the cold is not felt as it is in the East. When the thermometer is down to zero, it is not considered unpleasant for out-door work unless there is a violent storm; and men wear fewer clothes, and suffer less, than do the people of Pennsylvania in ordinary winters. Overcoats are seldom worn, save by travelers. * * * Rheumatism is unknown in this climate,—excepting among miners who work in wet placer-diggings in winter; and even among them it is very rare. I have not seen a single resident of Montana who was suffering from a cold,—the complaint so common, and so fatal, in the East. Not a case of consumption has been contracted in the Territory. Persons suffering from it in the incipient stages have invariably been cured; and those who had reached the secondary stage have been apparently hastened to the grave. The infirm of Montana are those who came here the victims of fatal disease, or who are suffering from some of the many accidents incident to new mining countries. There are asthmatic patients here who would be glad to "go home," but dare not. After breathing the pure invigorating air of the mountains, they would return only to die. Mountain fevers occasionally result from exposure; and they are the most obstinate cases far Western physicians have to treat. They are now seldom fatal; but, even after the tedious course of the fever is run, patients rally more slowly than fever subjects in the States. I doubt whether any other portion of the world can excel Montana in healthful climate; and the time is not far distant when it will be one of the great resorts of the continent. —Col. A. K. McClure, in the New York Tribune.

investigation, being conscientious and painstaking at all times, and his services are much in demand by his professional associates and the courts.

Dr. Bullard was married in 1878 to Miss Eunice Fletcher Allen, a native of Providence, Rhode Island, and a daughter of Samuel Allen, a merchant of that city. They have had four children, three of whom—Katharine Armington, Esther Allen and Harriet Fletcher—are living. Their little son Talbut died in his fifth year.

Dr. Bullard is a Past Grand Master of the A. O. U. W. and a member of the Supreme Lodge. He is Grand Inner Guard of the K. of P., is a Royal Arch Mason, a prominent Odd Fellow, having reached the position of Lieutenant Colonel and Assistant Surgeon General of the Patriarchs Militant, I. O. O. F., Division of the Lakes; a member of the K. O. T. M., and Department Surgeon in the order of Sons of Veterans. In politics he is a stanch Republican. He was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention of Montana, held in 1889, which formulated the laws for the new State. His religious creed is that of the Presbyterian Church, and of that church he is a consistent member.

OGDEN A. SOUTHMAYD is a prominent factor in the business affairs of Helena, and as such it is fitting that biographical mention be made of him in this work. Briefly given, a sketch of his life is as follows:

Mr. Southmayd is a native of Connecticut, born in Middletown, February 6, 1832. The progenitor of the Southmayd family in America came from England to this country and settled in Massachusetts about 150 years ago. He married a daughter of one of the early presidents of Yale College, and their descendants were prominent in the early history of Middletown, being large land holders and taking an active part in the affairs of the country. They were represented in the Revolutionary war. Although it is known that William Southmayd came to this country from England, yet it is a question whether his ancestors were English or Irish.

John B. Southmayd, the father of our subject, was born in Durham, Connecticut, in 1794. He married Miss Elizabeth M. Perkins, a native of Bath, England, and they became the parents of eight children, of whom six are still living. He and his wife were members of the Episcopal Church, and by occupation he was a furniture manufacturer. She died in the fifty-sixth year of her age and he lived to be seventy-six. All his life he was a Jackson Democrat, and for a time served as a Colonel of artillery. During the war of 1812 he was a drummer boy.

Ogden A. Southmayd was next to the youngest of his father's family. He was reared and educated in his native town and was prepared for college in Chase's Preparatory School. Before he reached maturity he became the accountant of an iron manufacturer, and was in this business three years. He then went to Wisconsin, and was there at the time the Civil war broke out. He was among the first to enter the Union ranks, enlisting in Company I, Eighteenth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and was on its organization commissioned Second Lieutenant. In his first engagement, at the battle of Shiloh, he was taken prisoner and was held for seven months, after which he was paroled and later returned to his regiment. He was then on duty at Fort Picking, but because of greatly impaired health he was compelled to resign. Recovering his health, in the summer of 1864 he re-entered the army as First Lieutenant of Battery M, First Wisconsin Heavy Artillery, in which capacity he served until the close of the war, at which time he was in command at Fort Weed. It was his privilege to witness the grand review of the victorious army at Washington.

The war over, Mr. Southmayd returned to Wisconsin and entered the office of the Bank Controllers at Madison, where he remained until the office was discontinued in 1867. After this he was for a time engaged in agricultural pursuits. He was elected County Clerk of Columbia county, Wisconsin, in which capacity he served Explain to me why Japan can ship oranges from her northern latitudes, and I then will undertake to explain why the summits of the Rocky mountains in our extreme north are, even in mid-winter, one vast cattle farm, where stock feeds in reasonable security on the bounty of nature alone.

The two countries, Japan and Montana, probably owe their comparative immunity from cold to the same kind favor of nature, whatever may be the reason for it. True, it is not the same quality of temperature. The same measure of cold in the moist atmosphere of London that is meted out to Montana would make England an iceberg. This seems unreasonable, but I can only rest the case on the facts and go forward.

It may be briefly noted here also that the clear and dry cold of a Montana winter does not obtain continuously. Now mark a phenomenon of nature.

The winter of 1861–2 was a terrible one,—the most terrible, according to official reports forwarded to Washington from our posts that were thinly scattered through this region, that has been known since our occupation of the Northwest. Yet that coldest winter witnessed the most remarkable display of this phenomenon yet recorded. At least, this is the testimony from Walla Walla.

The snow was brisket deep to cattle, alike in valley or on hill, everywhere. On this snow a sleet fell and froze to a crust. Men tramped on this, drew sleds by hand, bore great loads on three terms, and for seven years thereafter he was an insurance inspector and adjustor. Then on account of the illness of one of his daughters, he decided to make a change of location, and removed to Bismarck, from which place he subsequently came on to Montana, settling in Helena. Here he has for a time been the manager of the Paynter Drug Company, and is also now engaged in mining, connected in these enterprises with some of Helena's best men. He was one of the incorporators of the Ontario Mining Company, of which he is a trustee, stockholder and secretary and treasurer. Their property is located in Deer Lodge county. Besides this Mr. Southmayd also has various other mining interests.

In 1859 he was married to Miss Lucy B. Richmond, a native of Livonia, New York, and a descendant of one of the old English families who were among the early settlers of Rhode Island. Mr. and Mrs. Southmayd have had five children, four of whom are now living. Grace C., the invalid daughter above referred to, became the wife of A. C. Logan. She never recovered her health and died in the twenty-seventh year of her age. Of the other children we record that Mary R. is the wife of Joseph R. McKay, Miles City, Montana; Bessie P is the wife of A. C. Logan, Helena; Harriet W. married George A. Maloney and lives in Portland, Oregon; and John B. is engaged in mining at Marysville, Montana. The family are members of the Episcopal Church. Mr. Southmayd has affiliated with the Republican party ever since the war, but is a free-trader in sentiment and holds to the old cardinal principles of the Democracy—"The greatest good for the greatest number." He is a member of the G. A. R. A genial and kind-hearted gentleman, he has made many friends since coming to Helena.

W. J. WINTERS, one of the leading contractors and builders of Great Falls, Montana, and one of her most enterprising business men, was born at his father's farm six miles from the city of Ypsilanti, Washtenaw county, Michigan, March 9, 1856.

Mr. Winters is of English extraction. His father, George Winters, was born in England in 1828, was reared in his native land, and was there married to Miss Elizabeth Kerby, a native of his own town. Their marriage occurred in 1853 and immediately thereafter they set sail for America. Upon their arrival in the United States, they located at Superior, near the city of Ypsilanti, where five of their nine children were born. After improving his land and living on it until 1865, he sold out and removed to Allegan, Michigan. There he purchased another farm and on it spent the residue of his life and died, his death occurring in 1887. His widow still resides there. He had been reared an Episcopalian, but after their coming to America he and his wife were converted to Methodism and became active and devoted members of that church. George Winters was a man of many sterling traits of character and was highly esteemed all by those who knew him.

William Jefferson Winters, the subject of this sketch, was the second born in his father's family. His boyhood days were spent in the public schools and with the best of home training, and when he grew up he learned the trade of plasterer. In 1878 a spirit for adventure and a desire for new fields of labor brought him out West to Fort Benton, Montana. The first two winters of his stay in Montana were spent in hunting buffalo, while during the summer he worked at his trade. He continued at Fort Benton until 1885. That year he identified himself with their backs, and made good headway, but horses broke through, cut their legs, struggled along for a few hours, leaving a bloody track, and then died. Cattle stood to their briskets in the crust, lowing and freezing to death. I had walked all the way from Florence to Walla Walla on this crust, nearly 200 miles as the trail ran, with nearly 100 pounds of gold-dust and letters on my back and with no discomfort from the intense but crisp, dry cold, passing thousands of dead or dying cattle by the way. Suddenly, on the evening of my arrival, the packed express office began to be deserted. Eager miners ceased asking after the mines and poured out into the populous streets.

"The Chinook wind! The Chinook wind!" This was the wild cry that saluted my ears as I rushed out also. I heard the long, heavy icicles hanging from the eaves crash to the pavement and a hot breath blew up the streets as from an oven.

The next morning, while portions of our little board city were floating in the river that boomed down our one street so that I could not leave the office, I saw a little, brown honey-bee panting against my office window. By evening the brown, grassy hilltops were bare and men were cutting roads through the snow by which their cattle could reach them; and by another morning several of the "shake" houses of Walla Walla were far on their way to the Columbia river. This brief account, easily verified by the new town of Great Falls, and soon after coming here formed a partnership with Mr. William Roberts. They soon took the lead as contractors and builders. They erected the large school house and many of the best business blocks in the town, and they not only put up buildings for other parties but also on their own account erected a number of business houses and residences, which they rent. They built the Milwaukee House in the spring of 1887. This building they still own, it being under the management of Mr. Winters. It contains forty-two rooms, is well finished and nicely furnished, and is well patronized by the traveling public. He and his partner keep a large force of hands constantly employed, and to these enterprising men is due much credit for the rapid growth Great Falls has enjoyed.

Politically, Mr. Winters is a Republican. He has served as a Justice of the Peace for a number of years. Official position, however, has always been distasteful to him and he has often declined such honors. Fraternally, he is a Knight of Pythias.

C. O. Davidson, of the Davidson Grocery Company, Butte City, Montana, is one of the enterprising business men of the place, he being associated with his brother, R. M. Davidson. The commodious brick block, 318 and 320 North Main street, which they occupy and which bears their name, was built by them in 1892. It is thirty feet wide by a hundred feet long, has two stories and a basement, and the whole of it is devoted to their wholesale and retail grocery business. They get their goods for cash in car-load lots and sell large quantities to smaller dealers and mining camps and also do a city retail trade. Both gentlemen are thoroughly posted in the grocery business, have ample capital for carrying on the business on an extensive scale, and are men of the highest integrity of character.

The Davidson brothers are of Scotch descent. Their father, Charles A. Davidson, was born in the highlands of Scotland, and in 1850, when a mere lad, landed in America and settled in New York city. He was there married to Miss Margaret Mowbray, a native of Ireland, and they became the parents of seven children, six of whom are living. The parents are also still living, are highly respected people and are worthy members of the Episcopal Church. The father was for many years a clothing merchant and did a successful business.

R. M. Davidson was born in New York city in 1862 and was educated in Chattanooga, Tennessee. For some time he was engaged in commissary work in Mississippi and Louisiana on the levees and railroads, and while thus occupied formed the acquaintance of Absalom F. Bray, with whom he subsequently came to Montana. They engaged in the grocery business in Butte City, in 1884, under the firm name of Bray & Davidson, which association was continued until 1890. That year C. O. Davidson joined his brother in Butte City, purchased Mr. Bray's interest in the firm, and the business, under the name of the Davidson Grocery Company, has since been successfully carried on by them. Therefore R. M. Davidson, although the younger of the two, is the senior member of the firm. He is married and has two children, his wife's maiden name being Caroline Abernathy.

Charles O. Davidson was born in New York city in 1860. His education was received in the public schools of Tennessee, to which State his father had moved and where he was engaged in the clothing business. He was for some time associated in business with his father. Previous to his coming to Montana he sold his interest in the clothing store to a brother, and, as above stated, has been identified with the grocery trade ever since he landed in Butte City.

Government reports, is set down here as an example of that phenomenon in the elements which makes the winters of Montana most tolerable, even in the severest "spell of weather;" for the Chinook wind prevails, like any other wind, as well in one part of this wondrous Northwest as in another, though it is somewhat modified as it sweeps forward and is carromed from mountain of snow to mountain of snow; and, as before said, this one here at Walla Walla, which brought a little bee from his hive to look for flowers where cattle had been freezing to death brisket deep in the snow only a few hours before, was a very much emphasized "Chinook."

It took its name from the Indians or Chinooks. In earlier times, when winters were at their hardest and the poor emigrants' cattle were at the point of death, the Indians always promised this wind. We believed in those days, and many cattle men will insist still, that these warm winds are pumped up from the arid sands of Arizona by the dry, crisp, cold around the mountain tops of Montana. But this marvelous benefaction must await a broader interpretation of its origin and mission. Montana has her share of the effects; let us leave the cause to men of science, pausing only to observe that here again is the stranger liable to whistle, "The World Turned Upside Down," as he peers forth from his car window over the huge and endless panorama of hills;

The Messrs. Davidson are Republicans. They are deeply interested in the welfare of the city in which they have cast their lot and are doing everything in their power to advance its growth and prosperity.

JOHN STEDMAN, a representative manufacturer and pioneer of Montana, residing in Helena, dates his birth in Hartland Maine, February 11, 1836. His ancestors emigrated from England to this country as early as 1680, and settled in New England. They were people of the highest integrity, and were prominent factors in the development of the country.

Mr. Stedman's father, Isaac Stedman, was born in Sidney, Maine, in 1799, and at his native place he spent the whole of his life, engaged in agricultural pursuits, and died at the age of eighty-one. His wife, whose maiden name was Eunice Hammond, and who was a native of Genesee Falls, New York, died several years before her husband, she being sixty-four at the time of death. They were Methodists. They reared a family of ten children, John being the seventh born and one of the seven who are still living.

John Stedman spent the first twenty years of his life at the old homestead, working on the farm in summer and attending the public school in winter. In the fall of 1855 he made the journey to California by way of the Nicaragua route. From San Francisco he went direct to Oroville, Butte county, then a new mining camp, and in the placer mines he spent some time, meeting with indifferent success. In 1858 the Frazer river excitement took him to British Columbia. He was for a time in Victoria and in British Columbia, and in the latter place he built a sawmill and engaged in the lumber business.

It was in 1867 that Mr. Stedman left British Columbia and came to Helena, Montana, making the journey on horseback from The Dalles and being accompanied by his two brothers. At that time there were few white people living between Walla Walla and Helena. In 1870 Mr. Stedman built the first planing-mill in Helena, the material for which was furnished by A. M Holter. In 1877 Mr. Stedman engaged in the foundry and machinery business, manufacturing all kinds of machinery and doing repairing, but making a specialty of mining machinery. He ran the business alone until 1890, when it was formed into a stock company, he being a large stockholder and retained as the general manager of the business. The establishment now employs about fifty men. Beside Mr. Stedman the stockholders are A. M. Holter, Nicholas Kessler, J. R. Sanford and a few others.

In 1873 Mr. Stedman married Miss Alice Armor, a native of Pennsylvania and a daughter of James Armor of that State. The year he was married he built a good residence on the corner of Dearborn and Spencer streets, and in this home he has since resided. He and his wife have three children: Clara M., Blanche and William.

Mr. Stedman is prominently identified with the Masonic fraternity. In 1878 he held the office of Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Montana. Politically, he is a Republican. He was elected by his party in 1880 as a member of the Territorial Legislature, in which he served most acceptably. He has also been a member of the City Council of Helena, serving as such for a number of terms, and also serving six years as a School Trustee. He is vice-president of the Board of Trade of Helena. Mr. Stedman is a thorough mechanic, a man of high integrity, and in Helena, where he has so long resided, he has the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens.

MARCUS LISSNER came to Montana in 1865, and since that date has been prominently identified with her growth and development.

He was born in Prussia, January 17, 1834, the son of a for, unlike any other land on earth, where the snows melt first from the valley and last from the mountain, these hill tops, or mountain tops as they would be called in any country cast in a less massive mould, are bare of snow, with cattle feeding there in the long, brown, grasses, while the brooks far below are bridled with bits of ice and the valleys belt them to the waist with snow.

Where and when was gold first found in Montana? I have endeavored in vain to find anything like a united answer, such as might be given to the same question when applied to Carolina or California. More than a dozen letters from leading men who knew Montana and her glittering story well have given the substantial glory to almost as many names, localities and dates. True, the really busy man of Montana may have no time to be curious; he bothers his head only with results; but the man of leisure and of other lands likes to know, and, frankly, I cannot tell. Yet, if required to place my finger on the exact spot where gold-mining was first carried on in what is now Montana soil, I should say it could be done with tolerable certainty.

Late in the '50s, a party of Oregonians from a little town near the head of navigation merchant of that place. Reared and educated in his native land, he came to America in 1851, landing in New York, whence he directed his course toward Georgia, and in that State was engaged in merchandising in a small way for three years. He then returned to New York, and in August, 1853, sailed for California, making the voyage via the isthmus of Panama, and in due time landing in San Francisco. After a month spent in that port he went to Sacramento, where he conducted a merchandise business that winter. The following spring he went to Forest City, Sierra county, California, where for two years he was engaged in the cigar business. Next we find him in Comptonville, Yuba county, where he continued the cigar business two years longer. In the meantime he was engaged in mining at the latter place, at times meeting with more than ordinary success. In one day he took out $1,700 worth of gold, single pieces being worth as much as $27. These diggings, however, soon became exhausted, and his next move was to Virginia City. At the latter place he remained one year. Next, he went to Austin, Nevada, where he conducted business a year, and whence he went to Salt Lake. In August, 1864, we find him in Virginia City, Montana, and soon after on a prospecting tour to Silver Bow. In January of the following year he came to Helena. Here, after prospecting and mining for awhile, he started a restaurant-saloon in a little log house that was located on the present site of his International Hotel. His business had increased to such an extent in 1866 that he was enabled to erect a larger building, and two years later he built a hotel. His hotel was destroyed in 1874, and as he had no insurance the loss he sustained was about $30,000. Not discouraged, however, he began dredging for gold in the Missouri river, and with the gold thus obtained he rebuilt his hotel and was once again on a fair way to success, when disaster again overtook him, his establishment being burned down in 1879, and this time also without any insurance, his loss being about the same as before. Filled with undaunted courage, he set about the work of rebuilding again, and from that time up to the present his efforts have been attended with success. Twice he has made additions to his hotel, and he has also acquired considerable other valuable real estate, besides his own residence having erected in the city twelve other buildings which he rents. On one piece of his property he discovered a fine mineral spring, the water from which he piped to his hotel, and crowds of people may be seen daily drinking from this health-giving fountain. As soon as it proved efficacious in diseases of the kidneys, indigestion and catarrh of the stomach and bowels, he began the erection of bottling works; and, notwithstanding that the virtue of the springs was only discovered in 1890, there is already a large and growing demand for the water, which he is as rapidly as possible preparing to supply.

A Democrat all his life, Mr. Lissner has been the choice of his party to fill important positions, the duties of all of which he has ever discharged with the strictest fidelity. In 1882 he was nominated and elected Alderman of the city of Helena, and such has been the character of his service in that capacity that he has six times been elected for a term of two years each; and while he has labored for an economical administration of the affairs of the city, still he has voted for every franchise and measure that would promote the improvement and wellbeing of the place.

In 1875 Mr. Lissner was married to Miss Jennie Sabolyky, a native of Prussia, and they have eight children, all natives of Montana, namely: Jacob, Jette, Lillie, Dore, Annie, Alice, Harry and Bernice.

Mr. Lissner is a good example of the numerous hardy pioneers who came to Montana at an early day to better their financial condition, and while they have been factors in the improvement of the country they have also by their own industrious efforts secured a competency for themselves and families.

J. E. Richards

on the Willamette river opened placer mines in what is now the pan-handle of Idaho and extended operations in a small way into the adjacent mountains of Montana. An intense excitement soon followed, drawing thousands of Oregonians to the scene. A steamer was built and operated for a time on Pend d'Oreille lake and other crafts on Cœur d'Alene and tributary waters; but the adventurous miner flocked back the same season entirely disheartened. The steamboats were left to wreck and rot and the mines were, for a time, practically abandoned. So, while it is literally true, as is stoutly claimed by Oregon, that she was the first in the field of Montana discoveries, no great stress can be laid on the distinction, since the enterprise was not in the line of subsequent great developments which turned the eyes of the world upon the northern extreme of the American Rocky mountains. These mines were known at the time as the Kootenai Diggings, so called from the river there of that name.

The first steamer launched on these inland waters was under the direction of Wes. Briggs, backed by the Oregon Navigation Company.

Let me not be understood as willing to rob Oregon of any glory in this, or in anything else; for whether in war or in peace, she was always the peer of her more pretentious and assuming neighbor State to the south of her. There was never anything so splendid in all the history of California as the gathering of these Oregonians together under their tall, black fir trees, as before observed, far back in the '40s, and resolving that they were not subjects of England but citizens of the United States, and, if necessary, they were ready to submit the HON. JOHN E. RICKARDS, Governor of Montana, was born in 1848 in the State of Delaware, where his ancestors had resided for several generations. His great-grandfather was wounded in the Revolutionary war, and in that struggle other members of the family also took part. David T. Rickards, the Governor's father, was born in Delaware in 1812, and married Miss Mary Burris, a native of that State and a decendant of one of the earliest families that settled there. The father attained the age of seventy-six years. He was a merchant and farmer, and also a "local preacher" in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The subject of this sketch was only six years old when his mother died, and was reared on a farm by an uncle until his fifteenth year. He received an academic education, and upon leaving school accepted a position as clerk in a house-furnishing establishment at Wilmington, Delaware. In his twentieth year he went to Philadelphia, where he clerked in a wholesale grocery until 1870. He had then become impressed with the idea that there were greater opportunites for a young man to better his condition in the West, and, acting upon this, he directed his course toward Colorado, where he engaged in clerking, bookkeeping and general merchandising.

From 1879 to 1882 he was engaged in business in San Francisco, California, and during the latter year came to Butte, Montana, where he first engaged in merchandising, but later became interested in real estate and various business enterprises, and soon became one of the leading business men in the city.

Here was the commencement of his public career, the public spirit he evinced leading to his election as one of the Aldermen of the city; and his record in that position led to his election as Representative from Silver Bow county in the upper house of the Territorial Legislature. In 1889 he was elected a member of the constitutional convention which framed the State constitution. The prominent and active part he took in that body gave him a State-wide reputation, and, upon the admission of Montana as a State, he was elected Lieutenant Governor by the largest majority received by any candidate on his ticket. In this position he rendered signal service to the State and the Republican party. During the great struggle that followed the first State election, resulting in dismembering the Legislature and the selection of two sets of United States Senators, Mr. Rickards proved himself equal to the responsibilities of his position as President of the State Senate. The organization of that body was finally effected by his ruling that members present and not voting could not be regarded as absentees. This ruling made possible a joint session and the election of two Republican United States Senators. A few days later Speaker Reed made a similar ruling in the national Congress, thus proving the correctness of Lieutenant Governor Rickards' ruling.

The ability, sterling integrity and undaunted courage shown by Mr. Rickards, and his stalwart Republicanism, tempered by a just conception of the equities of public life, gave him great popularity in the State; and in 1892, in a tide of popular approval, he was elected Governor of question to the decision of the sword; and, when the Indian's signal fires for war burned in such an array on their mountain tops that they were literally encompassed and cut off from all help, they met again under their great, somber capitol dome and declared war on their own account. It is not fancy, but a fact that they dug gold with their own hands from their own grounds as best they could while the war went on all around them, and with their own hands coined it to pay their little army when they had conquered peace. This coin was made of pure, virgin gold, as it came from the ground. One side bore the figure of a beaver at his work, as representing the patient industry of her people; the reverse a sheaf of wheat, indicating the prolific fertility of her soil.

But, for all that, it was the experienced gold hunter of California, rather than the brave, patriotic and pastoral husbandman of Oregon, who led the golden way to the heart of the world's heart—Montana. Nor is there anything in the idea that either the missionaries or men of war first found gold in Montana. As said before, these are only traditions. Both the War Department and the Department of the Interior have furnished maps, data, and made all reasonable research for me in their endeavor to facilitate this work and if possible throw some light on the subject in question; but not a line has been found in the reports of army officers or In-

Montana, in which position he is now serving, his administration giving evidence of his fitness for the high office he holds. He has been a business man all his life, and is thoroughly practical, possessing sound business judgment, which dominates his official actions: and his administration as the chief executive of Montana is one devoted to the highest good of the citizens of the whole State. Many problems have arisen in the life of the new State requiring prompt and careful analysis, and Governor Rickards has proven himself equal to them all. He has devoted himself to the interests of the educational and eleemosynary institutions of the State and accomplished much in their behalf, while his efforts have secured to the commonwealth public lands of inestimable value to the Montana of the future. Ever since he became a voter in 1869 he has been a firm believer in the principles of Republicanism and labored assiduously for their promotion.

In 1876 he married Miss Lizzie M. Wilson, a native of Newark, Delaware, and three sons,—Homer C., Earl M. and Seward A., were born to them. Mrs. Rickards died in San Francisco, and her remains lie buried in that city. In 1883 Governor Rickards married Mrs. Eliza A. Boucher, a daughter of Thomas B. Ellis, of Pembroke, Ontario. She had a daughter by her former husband. By this last marriage there have been five children, two of whom died in infancy. The living are Howard B., Carlisle and Rachel. Mrs. Rickards is an accomplished and refined lady. Upon her devolved the honor of unveiling Montana's silver statue of Justice at the World's Fair at Chicago. This agreeable duty she discharged most creditably, and delivered an address on the occasion which elicited many favorable comments.

As a worthy member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Governor Rickards has been twice elected to represent the lay members in Montana at the General Conference. This he prizes as one of the greatest honors ever conferred upon him. He is past Grand Chancellor of the Knights of Pythias, and has served as Supreme Representative of the order. He is also a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and is well known in fraternal circles.

JACOB SWITZER was born in Alsace, Germany, formerly a province of France, October 17, 1839, of French ancestry.

In 1857, when in his eighteenth year, he came to America to try his fortune in the land of the free, and first settled in Leavenworth, Kansas, where he was employed as a common day laborer. By industry and frugality he soon succeeded in accumulating some money, and while in that city was engaged in various enterprises. He remained there for twenty years, being in Kansas during all the noted Kansas troubles at the time the State was formed. In the spring of 1877 he came direct to Helena and engaged in the liquor business. In the fall of that year he purchased an interest in a wholesale liquor establishment, of which he afterward became sole owner, and of which he is still proprietor. As time passed by he, like most other residents of Montana, became interested in mines and mining. He has also been deeply interested in the improvement of Helena, doing much to advance her development in various ways.

Seeing the need of manufactories, he turned his attention, among other things, to the manufacture of brick. At Blossburg he purchased lands containing an inexhaustable quantity of clay suitable for the manufacture of fire brick, terra cotta, and everything in that line, and there he built a plant, the capacity of which is 150,000 bricks in ten hours. To this business he is giving a large amount dian agents of an earlier date than the discoveries of the Kootenai, Oro Fino, I-dah-ho and other placer gold mines on the way to or within Montana. And yet, nearly a decade before gold was made a feature in what is now Montana, General Stevens, who fell in the civil war, and who, after leaving West Point, may be almost said to have begun life in Montana, told me that he firmly believed that there was more gold to be found along the line of the Mullen road than in all California. Of course you must allow for his zealous efforts to get this road, at that time the great enterprise of his life, completed as a sort of line of defense against English encroachments. On the other hand, possibly, he may have found gold in plenty, but kept the fact to himself, the better to keep his men at their work. It may be mentioned that his friend and companion, Colonel Craig, of the Lapwai Indian agency, better known now as the Cut Nose or Nez Perce Indian agency, was in the habit of using a red-clay pipe, made by Blackfeet Indians, which was studded with bits of virgin gold.

But I might fill a book with these stories and still be believed, for they are true in the main; and it is likely enough that Stevens, Craig, Mullen, and many more in the service saw gold first of all men in Montana. Some say that Father De Smet and other good missionaries knew all about gold here, even before it was found in California, but kept the secret, as they would keep the evils of Pandora to save the red children from destruction by the white man.

Bear in mind that Montana was in her last days of savage and unbridled simplicity, almost entirely surrounded by armies of adventurous gold hunters. Some of these men had grown of his attention. He manufactures pressed brick of the best quality and of all the shapes needed in ornamental work, also vitrified brick, terra cotta articles and a large quantity of tiling. The vitrified brick is pronounced the best material yet discovered for street pavements. Mr. Switzer's plant is equipped with the latest and most improved machinery, and employs a force of between fifty and sixty men to operate it. His entire product is of the very best quality and his chief market is in Helena. He built a mile and a half of railroad from his manufactory to the depot, thereby securing the convenience of loading cars on his premises and facilitating shipment. He now has the ability to fill any kind of an order, no matter how extensive. Besides his interests already referred to, he has invested largely in city property and in farming lands.

Mr. Switzer was married in 1881 to Miss Louise A. Sarstedt, a native of Philadelphia. They reside in one of the comfortable and attractive homes of Helena, planned and built by them.

Politically, Mr. Switzer is a Republican, He has given little time, however, to politics, as his extensive business operations have received his undivided attention.

WILLIAM ROBERTS, a prominent contractor and builder of Great Falls, Montana, and one of her pioneer settlers, was born in New York city, January 25, 1854.

He is of Welsh extraction. His father, August Roberts, was born in Canada in 1822, some years later removed to New York, where, in 1849, he married Miss Sophia De Foie. William was their first born. When he was three years old and his sister Caroline was a year and a half old their mother died. In 1863 he went with his father to California and settled at Marysville, where he received his early education in the public schools and where his father was engaged in contracting and building. His father now resides at San Francisco, retired from active business.

Mr. Roberts took a course in the Pacific Business College and graduated in that institution in 1869. After completing his education he took up the business of contractor and builder, with which he was familiar, having worked at it with his father. He was thus occupied in San Francisco and in Virginia City, Nevada, for some years. He was married in Vallejo, California, to Miss Julia Stotter, a native of New Orleans and a daughter of Claus Stotter, a German by birth. They have one child, a son, born in the Golden State.

In 1881 Mr. Roberts came to Montana, and spent about two years in Butte City and Fort Benton. During that time he formed a most favorable opinion of Montana, and in 1886 he came back, this time taking up his abode at Great Falls, with which he has since been identified. Soon after his arrival here he formed a partnership with Mr. W. J. Winters. Their firm has been a prominent factor in building up and improving the city. They erected the large school building and many of the best business blocks here, and they have also erected a number of buildings on their own account, both business houses and residences, which they still own and rent. Among the buildings owned by them is the Milwaukee House, which gray in California gold fields. They had dug gold with a little iron bar and rocked it out with a wooden Mexican bowl. They had worked with the "ground sluice," the "rocker," the "long tom" and "box sluice;" they had graduated as gold hunters; they were still hunting; so the finding of gold in Montana was no accident as in Carolina and California, but the result of persistent quest by men who were armed and equipped for their work like veterans.

And so it resulted that the gold-built battlements of Montana were carried by storm, by steel-armed men who poured down from the rich mines of British Possessions, up from Idaho, over from Utah and across from Nevada, to say nothing of the audacious Greeks already there in the belly of the wooden horse.

It is hard to pass over the dramatic splendor of this impetuous charge. In the name of peace; in the name of progress and commerce, pastoral life and prosperity to all who came, the final charge was made on the last remaining stronghold of heathendom. It was all done in a single night, as it seems now, and when the sun rose he looked down on an inundation of stalwart heroes charging the rock-ribbed passes with double-pointed steel, the startled savage, gun in hand, looking warily from his ambush. But we must not linger longer. These are for the painters and poets unborn as yet.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE FIRST GOLD FOUND IN MONTANA BY CALIFORNIANS—THE FIRST MINING—SOME INTELLIGENT CALIFORNIA MINERS.

MONTANA was most fortunate in her first historian, Granville Stuart,* a Virginian by birth, later from the mines of northern California. Like Lewis and Clarke he kept a journal, and seems to have set down, day by day, so far as he could, during his hazardous and hard ventures, all of import that he saw, felt or hoped for. This work is invaluable to the historian. He was not making a book to sell, so it is simple in language, brief and to the purpose. His direct narrative untangles the skein where the threads so often cross and become entwined one with another; and where you would, but for this little book, find only confusion and tumultuous clashing of accounts, all is made plain as a newly blazed trail. You they built in 1887. Mr. Roberts also owns considerable valuable mining stock, and is interested in other enterprises. He was one of the organizers of the Sun Brick Company, which company has the largest plant of its kind in Great Falls and manufactures no less than 5,000,000 of bricks per annum. He and his family occupy an elegant brick residence.

Mr. Roberts is an active member of the Democratic party and takes a lively interest in public affairs. He is now serving as one of the Aldermen of Great Falls, to which office he was elected in 1893.

JOSEPH H. JOHNSON, one of Great Falls' successful real-estate dealers, is a native of Pennsylvania, born in Allegheny county, August 3, 1855, of German ancestors. Herman H. Johnson, his father, was born in Pennsylvania and was there married to Miss Margaret D. Raway, a native of Germany. He died in the prime of life, leaving his widow with five small children, Joseph H. being then only two years old.

follow this trail confidently, for it is as true on its face as the mint mark on the gold of Montana, which he was, along with those who were with him, really the first to discover. In my earnest quest to find the very first mine or mines in Montana I have been furnished with enough information to make a fair-sized volume; and in this the usual silent and mysterious man with a long beard and a long bag of gold dust comes more than once to the front. But there are so many ways for a man to get a bag of dust without digging it out of the ground that the story of the bearded man with the big bag has ceased to be very substantial as that of a discovery. I have also two stories, much alike, about a "Lost Dutchman," with a big nugget: also a long account about the "lost cabin,"—this latter clearly of California origin. So it is decided to put them all aside, giving the distinction of discovery to the Stuarts. But the following, on the site of Butte City, from a voluminous, and, as I believe, a reliable book, is at least of remarkable interest on this subject:

"At the time Humphreys and Allison came into the Silver Bow valley no stakes were stuck, nor were there any signs of any work having been done, except upon what is known as the Original Lode, on which was found a hole four or five feet deep. Near the hole were elk horns, which had been used as gads. From all indications this hole had been dug years before, but by whom there is no way of telling, and it will probably never be known.—Leeson's History of Mont., p. 917.

And right here you who know the story of Montana entirely will close this page impatiently and insist that it was "Benetsee," a half-breed Indian from the Red river country, who first found gold on a stream that bears his name; and that after him came the Government explorers who found it on the same stream, and not knowing of the half-breed's discovery, rechristened it Gold Creek. Granted. But neither Benetsee nor the head of the Government expedition found enough to concern them; and, but for Stuart and his party, who

When he was eight years of age, young Johnson began helping his mother to earn a living, and consequently had a very limited education, so far as book knowledge goes; but the hard experiences of life were his schoolmasters, and he was an apt scholar, and as the years passed by he grew up to be a capable business man. As a little boy he was employed in herding stock for the neighbors, and, in fact, he did odd jobs of any kind that he could get. When he grew up he worked in the coal mines of his native State and later mined in Iowa. In 1869 he went to California, was engaged in the butchering business in Oakland one year, and from there went to Portland, Oregon, where he continued butchering until 1872. That year he took up Government lands near Dayton, Walla Walla county, Washington Territory, where he also dealt in stock and continued the butchering business. In the meantime he became interested in property in Seattle, Tacoma, Spokane and other places in the Territory, and soon found himself dealing quite extensively in real estate. His stock business brought him into contact with some of the dealers in northern Montana. From them he learned of Great Falls, its wonderful water power, the building of the railroad, and the mineral wealth of the country, and he decided to make it the field of his future operations; so he came hither in 1888, and at once invested in property and began his real-estate operations. Realty advanced rapidly in value and he soon ranked with the most successful dealers in real estate in the town. He also erected several valuable business blocks and residences, and was one of the builders of the Montana Brewery, which cost over $100,000. During all this time he was careful in his investments, always exercising the best of judgment in his purchases, and when the financial depression came on his business affairs were in such excellent condition that he has been enabled to continue operations while many others have suspended. While his sales are being made at a very low rate, he is still realizing a profit, and his faith in the future prosperity of Great Falls is as strong to-day as ever.

Mr. Johnson is also interested in mining and banking. He is president and secretary of various mining corporations, and some of the mines in which he is interested are producing large quantities of rich ore. One of these mines, the Moulton, is located at Barker, and another, the Great Western, is at Nihart. He was one of the organizers of the Security Bank of Great Falls, in which he is still a stockholder and director.

threw off their coats and first swung pick-axes in Montana, we might never have heard any more of Benetsee, or Francois Finlay, nor of the Government explorers in this connection for all time. These first found the color. Stuart and his friends made long sluice boxes and opened placer gold mines on this same stream, having dug a ditch for mining purposes the year before. This was in the spring of 1862, several years after the Oregonians had prosecuted gold mining along the northwestern borders of what is now Montana, in what was known as the Kootenai country. Here, on Gold creek, with Granville and James Stuart at the head, civilization first set up her tabernacle of rest in this State.

Because this first and most reliable of the several histories of Montana is out of print, and also because it is better than anything I could now give, since Stuart wrote with eye and ear to the keyhole while events went on, I venture to copy copiously from his book as I go forward and parallel in these notes his better work with my own. You will observe how generously he gives the discovery of gold in Montana to the credit of another. But I repeat that the verdict of time will tell the coming generations that Granville and James Stuart and their immediate following, who persisted in their work and finally pushed reluctant fortune to the wall, were the real first finders of gold in paying quantities at the feet of the "Shining mountains." Mr. Stuart's history is dated Virginia City, Montana, 1865, and opens as follows:

"The name 'Montana' properly belongs to a certain part of Spain, and means 'mountainous,' a name that is applicable to the country, for a wonder. Still, I think that the Snake Indian name of 'Tóyabe-Shockup,' or 'The Country of the Mountains,' would have been more appropriate, for some parts of Montana have been the home of these Indians from a time far anterior to the discovery of America.

Mr. Johnson was married in 1881 to Miss Theresa Bruestle, a native of Scott county, Minnesota, and a daughter of John Bruestle, now of Great Falls. They have six children, namely: Mabel D., Ida and Pearly (twins), Joseph, Eddie and Walter. He and his family reside in one of the elegant homes in Great Falls, where they are surrounded with all the comforts of life. They attend the Presbyterian Church. Politically, he has always affiliated with the Republican party and has taken a commendable interest in public affairs, not, however, aspiring to official position, as his own private business has occupied the whole of his time and attention.

Such is a brief sketch of one of the enterprising and public-spirited men of Cascade county.

Miss Mary E. Jackman, principal of the shorthand department of the Montana University, Helena, is a native of Indiana. Her parents, Wesley and Sarah (Baxter) Jackman, natives of Ohio and Pennsylvania, respectively, removed to Indiana after their marriage and settled on a farm where they reared their family of eight children. They are worthy members of the Methodist Episcopal Church and are highly esteemed in the community in which they live.

Miss Jackman completed her education at the Central Normal College of Indiana, where she graduated in 1883. For a number of years she taught successfully in Indiana and one year she was employed as teacher in the Colored State University, in Alabama. Then, turning her attention to the study of stenography, she thoroughly mastered it, and for two years taught it in Professor Garland's College in Indianapolis. In 1890 she came to Helena, Montana, to visit her brother, Charles Jackman, and so pleased was she with Helena and its surroundings that she decided to remain and teach here. At first she had a desk in the office of the New York Life Insurance Company, where she remained until 1892, since which time she has found it necessary to have her own apartments because of the number of pupils who come to her for instruction, and has occupied rooms in the Bailey Block. In 1893 the Montana University organized a shorthand department, and she was selected as its principal. In addition to her duties in the University, she also continues teaching on her own account. Several of her pupils have already obtained high standing and good positions as shorthand reporters, one of them being now the county court reporter at Deer Lodge, and another occupies a position in the Surveyor General's office, Helena.

Since coming to Montana Miss Jackman has made some investments in real estate in Bozeman. She is a member of the W. C. T. U., the Methodist Church and the Epworth League, and is a teacher in the Sunday-school at St. Paul Church. She makes herself generally useful in every good work and has by her amiable life won the good wishes of all with whom she is acquainted

"Montana consists of a series of basins, five in number, of which four lie on the east side of the Rocky mountains and one on the west. These basins are generally subdivided into a number of valleys by spurs of mountains jutting down from the main chain of the Rocky mountains. These spurs are often of great height, frequently exceeding that of the main chain, but there are many low passes among them, thus connecting the valleys with each other by low gaps that are passable at all times of the year.

"The basin west of the Rocky mountains, in the northwestern corner of the Territory, is drained by the Missoula and Flat-Head rivers and their branches, the last named being the outlet of the Flat-Head lake, a beautiful sheet of water about forty miles long by twenty wide, which lies at the foot of the Rocky mountains, near the northern end of the basin, and not far from the line of British Columbia.

"This lake is surrounded by some beautiful country, a portion of which is valuable in an agricultural point of view. From the lake there extends south along the foot of the Rocky mountains to the Pend d'Oreille mission, a distance of over fifty miles, a well-wooded, gently-rolling country, clothed with a good growth of grass, a large proportion of it being excellent farming land. Then leaving the mission and crossing a range of hills to the south you enter the valley of the Jocko, which is small, but in beauty and fertility it is unsurpassed. Here is located the reserve of the Pend d'Oreille Indians. Then crossing by an easy pass, over the lofty spur of mountains running down from the main chain between the Jocko and Hellgate rivers, you enter the lovely valley of the Hellgate, which is about twenty-five miles long, with an average breadth of about six miles. It is almost all good farming land, with a good growth of bunch grass, and it is enough to make a man from the prairies of Iowa or Illinois cry to see the good pine timber that is going to waste here.

"Here comes in from the south the river and valley of the 'Bitter-Root,' a lovely and fertile

HON. WILLIAM E. CULLEN, of Helena, a pioneer and prominent member of the bar of Montana, was born in Mansfield, Ohio, June 30, 1837. He comes of Scotch ancestry. His great-grandfather emigrated from Edinburgh, Scotland, to this country in 1768, and was a Greek professor in one of the early colleges of Pennsylvania. John Cullen, the professor's son, was born in that State, and his eldest son, Thomas W. Cullen, was also born and educated there. Thomas W. Cullen was a manufacturer of woolen goods in Pennsylvania, and he and his wife, whose maiden name was Isabella Morrison, and whom he wedded in that State in 1805, moved to Ohio in 1835, where they were respected citizens and members of the Episcopal Church for many years. She died in her sixtieth year and he in his seventy-seventh.

They reared a family of five children, all of whom are living, William E. being the oldest.

Judge Cullen, as the subject of our sketch is familiarly called, resided with his parents until his sixteenth year, and up to that time attended the public schools. He was then sent to an academy for three years. At the end of the three years he went to Minnesota, where he received the appointment of Superintendent of Instruction for the Winnebago Indians. For two years he held this position, and during this period all his leisure time was spent in the study of law. He then entered the office of Judge Charles E. Flandreau, at that time Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of Minnesota, and under the instructions of this noted lawyer he continued his studies. In June, 1862, he was admitted to the Minnesota bar. During the Sioux outrages in that State he entered the service as Second Lieutenant, and in that capacity served through the campaign. He began the practice of his profession at St. Peter, Minnesota, and soon afterward formed a law partnership with Major S. A. Buell, a brother of General Buell. They continued in business together until 1866, at which time Mr. Cullen came to the Territory of Montana.

He crossed the plains with oxen and in an expedition commanded by Colonel James Fisk, Helena being reached in August, 1866. Here Mr. Cullen at once began the practice of his profession. The following year he was elected a member of the Legislative Council of the Territory, consisting at that time of seven members, it being the first Legislative Assembly to meet in Montana after the amendment of the laws in 1866. Since then he has several times served as a member of the Legislature. In 1867 he became associated in the practice of law with region extending south about sixty miles, with an average breadth of seven or eight miles. In this valley is situated Fort Owen, surrounded by a thriving settlement. This fort is not, nor ever was, a Government fort. It was established in 1851 or 1852 by the untiring energy and perseverance of Mr. John Owen, for the purpose of trading with the Indians, and it is at present the best building in Montana.

"The valleys of the Bitter-Root and Hellgate contain many settlers, whose number is rapidly increasing. The Missoula river is formed by the junction of the Hellgate and Bitter-Root.

"These valleys are bounded on the west by the Bitter-Root mountains, which are very lofty, snow lying on many of the peaks during the entire year. These mountains cover an extent of country about seventy-five miles wide, reaching to the valley of Snake river in Idaho, and about two hundred miles in length, forming a howling wilderness of yawning cañons and huge mountains, covered with a heavy growth of pine and fir timber, and affording a home to a few elks and a large number of grouse, but of no earthly use for anything but the mineral wealth they contain, which is very great, as is proven by Florence City, Elk City, Oro Fino, and many other places of less note.

"Leaving the Hellgate valley, and going up the Hellgate river, which comes from the south-east, we enter Hellgate cañon—which I have described elsewhere—and in a short distance we reach the mouth of 'Big Blackfoot river.' Coming in from the east, it runs through a cañon for some fifteen miles above its mouth, above which it opens out into a large and beautiful valley, well timbered and watered, forming a good grazing region, and, most probably, farming also; but it has never been tried. Then, going up Hellgate cañon forty miles, we emerge into the rolling grassy hills which reach twelve miles to the valley of Flint creek, a beautiful place, well calculated for grazing and farming. Thence up the Hellgate river, through much good farming land, bordered by rolling, grassy country, twenty miles to the lower end of Deer

H. P. Smith, who had been previously banished from Montana by the Vigilant Committee for his too zealous defence of the road agents. Mr. Smith was a man of very ardent temperament and threw his whole soul into the cases which he espoused, and for this reason had to leave, but after the excitement died out he returned, and remained unmolested. They remained in business together until Mr. Smith's health gave out, and he died in Helena in 1870. In 1876 Judge Cullen became associated with Colonel Wilbur F. Sanders. In 1885 they took into the firm Colonel Sanders' son, a graduate of the Columbia

JOHN MOFFITT, a Montana pioneer of 1864, and for several years Chief Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue for the district of Montana, is a native of Dublin, Ireland, and is of Scotch ancestry. His grandfather, John Moffitt, was born in Scotland, was a British soldier, and served in the battle of Waterloo under the Duke of Wellington. His son, John Moffitt, Jr., was born in Scotland and was a Sergeant Major in the Royal Horse Artillery. He married Miss Ellen Riddle, a native of Scotland. As a soldier, he was stationed in different parts of the English realm, and there were born to him and his wife, at different places, four children. He died in the army, in Ceylon in the East Indies, in the thirty-sixth year of his age. His widow survived him until 1890, when her death occurred in the seventieth year of her age. Three of their children are still living.

John, who is the subject of this sketch, was their eldest child; was born in 1836, and was educated in the Royal Hibernian Military School, Phœnix Park, Dublin. In 1851, when fifteen years of age, he emigrated to the United States and settled in Ohio, where he obtained work in a nursery at $8 per month. Two years later he went to Iowa, making the journey by wagon, as there were then no railroads in the country. In Iowa he secured employment as clerk in a store and postoffice at $20 per month and board. Two years afterward he removed to Topeka, Kansas, and clerked there also until 1861, at which time he enlisted in Company A, Second Regiment, Kansas Volunteer Infantry. He was enrolled April 19, 1861, in answer to President Lincoln's first call for volunteers, and served in the army of the frontier. At the close of his three months' term he re-enlisted in the Second Kansas Cavalry, and was promoted to First Lieutenant by order from the War Department. He was assigned to Company F, Second Regiment, Indian Brigade, and served as Adjutant and Quartermaster for the Lodge valley, passing by 'Gold creek,' where are the first gold mines ever found and worked in what is now 'Montana.' These mines were discovered in the following manner:

"About the year 1852, a French half-breed from Red river of the north, named François Finlay, but commonly known by the sobriquet of 'Benetsee,' who had been to California, began to prospect on a branch of the Hellgate, now known as Gold creek. He found small quantities of light float gold in the surface along this stream, but not in sufficient abundance to pay. This became noised about among the mountaineers; and when Reese Anderson, my brother James, and I, were delayed by sickness at the head of Malad creek, on Hudspeth's cut-off, as we were on our way from California to the States in the summer of 1857, we saw some men who had passed 'Benetsee's creek,' as it was then called, in 1856, and they said they had got good prospects there, and as we had an inclination to see a little mountain life, we concluded to go out to that region and winter, and look around a little. We accordingly wintered on Big-Hole, just above the 'Backbone,' in company with Robert Dempsey, Jake Meeks, and others; and in the spring of 1858, we went over to Deer Lodge and prospected a little on Benetsee creek, but, not having any 'grub' or tools to work with, we soon quit in disgust, without having found anything that would pay, or done enough to enable us to form a reliable estimate of the richness of this vicinity. We then went back to the emigrant road, and remained there trading with the emigrants over two years, very frequently talking of the probability of there being good mines in Deer Lodge, until in the fall of 1860, we moved out to the mouth of Stinking Water river, intending to winter there and go over and try our luck prospecting in the spring. But the Indians became insolent and began to kill our cattle, when we moved over, late in the fall, and settled down at the mouth of Gold creek and began to prospect. We succeeded, during the following summer, in finding prospects that we considered very good, upon which we began to made preparations to take it out 'big,' and wrote regiment. He served until January, 1864, at which time he resigned his commission and returned home.

After his return he received the appointment of Enrolling Clerk in the Kansas Legislature. Soon after this, hearing of the discovery of gold in Montana, he fitted out a four-horse team and crossed the plains, bringing with him to this State a year's provisions, and arriving at Virginia City July 10, 1864. While crossing the plains the Indians were hostile, but he and his party succeeded in keeping them off. At Virginia City he engaged in placer mining with the pick and shovel; was there two months and then came to Last Chance Gulch, arriving on the 10th of October, 1864. There he prospected and mined a little until 1865, when he accepted the position of Deputy County Recorder, and was commissioned by Hon. Thomas Francis Meagher, Secretary of State, Clerk and Recorder, and served nineteen days. After this he was engaged in news-dealing; sold many papers for fifty cents each, and was the first to put the price down to twenty-five cents. With others he was engaged in mining at Diamond City, where they took out $48,000 and gave up mining. In 1872 Mr. Moffitt received the appointment of deputy Postmaster, and served in that capacity eight years. In 1882 he went to Fort Benton and embarked in the harness and saddlery business, and remained there until 1883, when he received the appointment of Chief Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue, in which capacity he has served under all administrations since. The collections in the district amount in round numbers to about $200,000 per anum. Since he became connected with the office the receipts have increased from $90,000 to the present figures. Mr. Moffitt has, through his long experience in the business, become very familiar with the internal revenue laws, and makes a very reliable and satisfactory officer.

He was married, in 1876, to Miss Fidelia O. Mather, a native of Elkhorn, Wisconsin. She was spared to him only five years, when she died of consumption. In 1883 he married Miss Phebia W. Duer, a native of Baltimore, Maryland.

Mr. Moffitt was one of the organizers of Helena Lodge, No. 3, A. F. & A. M. He also belongs to the chapter and commandry and has held various offices in all. He is also a member of the A. O. U. W., served three terms as Assistant Adjutant General of the Department of Montana, G. A. R., and is a member of the Loyal Legion.

to our brother Thomas, who was at 'Pike's Peak,' as Colorado was then called, to come out and join us, as we thought this a better country than the 'Peak.' How events have fulfilled this prediction will be seen hereafter. Thomas showed our letters to quite a number of his friends, and they became quite excited over them, and in the spring of 1862 many of them started out to find us, but became lost and went to old Fort Lemhi, on Salmon river, and from there they scattered all over the country, a few of them reaching us about the first of July. We were then mining on Pioneer creek, a small fork of Gold creek, without making more than a living, although some adjacent claims paid good wages.

"About this time quite a number of people arrived who had come up the Missouri river, intending to go to the mines at Florence and Oro Fino, but not liking the news from that region, when they arrived in Deer Lodge, a part of them went no farther, but scattered out and began to prospect. * * * The 'Pike's Peakers,' soon after their arrival, struck some good pay on a small branch of Gold creek, now known as Pike's Peak gulch. The diggings of this region did not, as a general thing, pay very well that summer, and they have not been much worked or prospected since from the following cause: Many of the 'Pike's Peakers' became rather lost and bewildered in their attempts to reach Deer Lodge and were scattered all about through the mountains; this, though a source of infinite vexation to them at the time, proved of great ultimate benefit to the country, for one small party of them discovered some gulch mines at the head of Big-Hole prairie that paid tolerably well during the summer of 1862, but they seem to have been exhausted, as they have not been worked since that time. I have been

During a residence of twenty-nine years in Montana, Mr. Moffitt has gained an extensive acquaintance and has now the esteem of all with whom he has come in contact.

J. F. McCLELLAND, County Treasurer of Cascade county, Montana, was born in Canton, Pennsylvania, November 15, 1858, and is a descendant of Scotch ancestors. His great-grandfather, John McClelland, emigrated to America prior to the Revolution, espoused the cause of the Colonies and fought in the war for independence. He lived to be eighty years of age. His wife's maiden name was Anna Maria Weller. Their son, Frederick, served through the Mexican war. He married a Miss Carr, daughter of James Carr, a native of New Hampshire and a Major in the Revolution. Their son, Reuben W., the father of our subject, was born in Orange county, New York, October 14, 1830. He was married to Catharine Santee, a native of Pennsylvania, and ten days his junior. She died in 1873, in the forty-third year of her age, leaving three children, all of whom are still living, J. F. being the oldest. Reuben W. McClelland died July 26, 1894, at Canton, Pennsylvania, where early in life he was engaged in farming, later turning his attention to the lumber business.

J. F. McClelland received a public school and academic education in his native town. He was then engaged in merchandising at Williamsport, later was in the hotel business at Altoona, Pennsylvania, and in 1882 he came West with the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to Forsyth, where he was superintendent of one of the company's dining cars. We next find him in Portland, Oregon, employed as manager of the Merchants' Hotel. He remained there one year. In 1887, when the Park Hotel was opened at Great Falls, he came hither to take charge of it. A year later he turned his attention to the real-estate and insurance business, and while doing a successful business in that line, in the fall of 1889, he was elected on the Republican ticket to the office of County Treasurer. Here he has rendered the highest degree of satisfaction, and he is now (1894) serving on his second term.

Mr. McClelland was married February 13, 1882, to Miss Ann Espenlaub, a native of Altoona, Pennsylvania, and a daughter of John Espenlaub, who came to this country from Germany. Mr. and Mrs. McClelland have two children, Ed. W. and Bretta M.

In Masonic circles Mr. McClelland is prominent and active, being a Blue Lodge, Royal Arch, Commandery and Shrine Mason. Recently he has also become identified with the order of Sons of the Revolution. He is justly ranked with the enterprising and most reliable men of Cascade county.

ALBERT FORREST LONGEWAY, M. D., of Great Falls, Montana, is a native of Dunham, Province of Quebec, born April 6, 1865.

Dr. Longeway is of French descent, his ancestors being among the early settlers of Canada. His father, George R. Longeway, was born in Clarenceville, Canada, December 13, 1825. When the California gold fever spread over the country he was one of the victims, and in 1850 he told by men who worked there that they worked across a vein of good coal thirty feet wide in the bed of the gulch, and that they put some in the fire and it burned brilliantly. If this is the case this locality will become valuable in a short time.

"Another party happening to camp on Willard's creek, began to prospect and found very rich diggings, where a great many men made fortunes during the summer and winter. This attracted almost every man in the country to the spot and the mines at Gold creek were deserted for the richer ones at 'Bannack City,' as a small town that had sprung up at the head of the cañon of Willard's creek was called, and have virtually remained so ever since; for, about the time that the Bannack mines began to decline a little and people began to think of branching out again, a party of six who had started to the Yellowstone country on a prospecting tour, and had been driven back by the Crow Indians, who robbed them of nearly everything they had, camped, as they were returning, on a small branch of the Stinking-Water river, afterward called Alder creek because of the heavy growth of that wood along it, not a single tree of which is now to be seen, the wants of the miners having used them up long ago, and the banks and the bed of the stream are dug up and piled about in a most extraordinary manner, considering the short time that has elapsed since its discovery. But to return to the discoveries. They camped on the creek about half a mile above where the city of Virginia now stands, and on washing a few pans of dirt they 'struck it big,' getting as high as four dollars to the pan. They staked off their claims and went to Bannack City to get a supply of provisions, and to tell their friends to return with them and take claims, which they did. The creek proved almost fabulously rich, thousands of men having made fortunes in it, and still it is not half worked out.

"But I am digressing from my description of the basins that constitute Montana. I have described Deer Lodge elsewhere, with the exception of the rich placer and quartz mines situated in a kind of secondary valley, situated sought the new El Dorado of the West. After a few years spent in the placer mines of California, he returned to his native country, bringing with him a good supply of gold, with which he purchased a farm. On this farm he resided until recently, when he retired and moved into town. He and his wife are Methodists. Her maiden name was Mary Jane Derrick, and she too is a native of Clarenceville. They have had five children, of whom Albert F. is the third. Four are still living.

The subject of our sketch had excellent educational advantages. He graduated at the McGill Normal School in 1882. Then he took a four-years' course in medicine at Bishop College in Montreal, and graduated at that institution in 1886. His high standing in college and the proficiency he displayed at a special examination in surgery won for him two gold medals.

After graduating, Dr. Longeway entered upon his professional career at Highgate Springs. Soon, however, he returned to Montreal and accepted the position of assistant demonstrator of anatomy in Bishop College. At the same time he served as attending physician at the Montreal Dispensary. A year later he decided to seek a location in the West. When he reached St. Louis he was still undecided where to go, having in view both El Paso, Texas, and Butte City, Montana. He flipped a nickel to decide the matter. The choice fell to the latter place, and he arrived in Butte City on the 4th of July, 1887. The railroad was then being built to Great Falls, and this place offered many inducements for him to locate here. Two other physicians were in practice here when he opened his office. From the very first he met with success and soon established a large and lucrative practice, now being ranked with the leading physicians of the city. He is a member of the State Medical Association, the North Montana District Medical Association, and the National Association of Railroad Surgeons. Since coming to Great Falls he has been employed as railroad surgeon.

Dr. Longeway was married August 23, 1889, to Miss Gertrude Welsh, a native of Stanbridge, Province of Quebec, and a daughter of Ira A. Welsh, of that place. They have four children, all born in Great Falls: Albertine Ada Estella, Josephine Theodore, Gertrude and Albert F., Jr. Mrs. Longeway is a Congregationalist. The Doctor is liberal and independent in both his religious and political views. He is fully identified with the city of his adopat the head of the main one, and a slight description of which will be proper here. They were discovered during the summer of 1864, the large number of gold and silver-bearing quartz leads first attracted the attention of some prospectors, who began to examine the country and found it to be of unexampled richness, there having been discovered up to this time (January, 1865) over 150 leads of gold and silver-bearing quartz within a space of six by ten miles, several of the silver leads assaying better than the Comstock lead in Nevada Territory, and one in particular, the Original, producing seventy per cent. of metal when melted down in a common forge, the proportion being $2,800 in silver to the ton of rock, $200 in gold and copper—enough to pay all expenses of working. A great many of these leads project above the surface of the grounds, and can be traced for hundreds of yards by the eye while standing in one spot, there is no doubt but this vicinity will prove as good, if not better, than the renowned Washoe mines. Wood and water are plenty and easy of access, and it is besides an excellent grass country. There are also several large leads of argentiferous galena, which furnish all the lead that may be wanted, and which contain a sufficient quantity of silver to pay a handsome profit to the workers.

"In addition to the quartz leads, which are known to form a network over a large extent of country bordering Deer Lodge valley, there is interspersed among these leads a large extent of placer or surface diggings, some of which were worked during the past fall and yielded largely, and which will afford remunerative employment to a large number of men for years to come.

"This ends the description of the northwestern basin, which contains eight principal valleys, to wit: The valley of the Flat Head lake, of the Mission, of the Jocko, of Hellgate, of the Bitter-Root, of Big Blackfoot, of Flint creek and of Deer Lodge, besides many other smaller ones of great beauty and fertility. This basin drains toward the northwest, and is about two hundred and fifty miles long by an average of about seventy-five miles wide. It is by far the tion, and is considered one of her most enterprising citizens.

A. NATHAN, one of Great Falls' representative business men, is a native of Prussia, born of Prussian parents, December 20, 1851.

He received his early education in his native land, learned the trade of tailor there, and when only sixteen years of age came to America, landing in New York, where he entered a retail clothing store, learning the business and the trade of custom cutter, which he followed until the spring of 1879, at which time he directed his course westward and took up his abode at Fort Benton, Montana. At Fort Benton, with Joseph Hirshberg as partner, he engaged in business on his own account, and they continued there for several years. In 1884 Mr. Nathan established a house in Butte, which was discontinued the next year. In 1886 he established a house at Great Falls, where the business prospered so well that two years later, having previously dissolved the partnership with Mr. Hirshberg at Benton, he consolidated the business at Great Falls, where he has since met with eminent success, carrying everything in the line of men's wear. Since locating here he has built a nice residence on Fourth avenue north, and also his elegant business block No. 222 Centre avenue, one of the best business locations in the city. This block is 25 x 125 feet, and its three floors are occupied by his large stock. Also he has recently opened a branch house at Neihart, Meagher county, where he is doing a prosperous business. He erected the building he occupies there.

Mr. Nathan was married in 1883 to Miss Frances Caskel, a native of New York, and they have two sons, Robert S. and Herbert A., both natives of Montana.

Mr. Nathan is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and is a stanch Republican. He takes a commendable interest in public affairs, has served as Alderman of his ward, and during his residence in Great Falls has won an enviable reputation as an enterprising and successful business man.

ASHER WARE PAUL, a respected Montana pioneer of 1866, now engaged in the livery business at Great Falls, Cascade county, was born in the town of South Bristol, Ontario county, New York, April 14, 1836.

Mr. Paul is of Welsh extraction. His father, George W. Paul, was born in Massachusetts in the year 1804, and married Miss Mary Root, whose birth occurred in Con-best timbered part of the Territory, owing to the moist warm winds of the Pacific ocean, which reach to the Rocky mountains along here, and cause a more luxuriant growth of vegetation than farther south, where their moisture is absorbed and rather dried up in crossing the arid surface of the 'Great basin,' which is destitute of timber, except in a few places.

"Sickness is almost unknown in this basin, or indeed in any of the others, for I can truly say that no healthier country can be found in the world than that comprised within the limits of the Territory of Montana.

"Next is the northeastern basin, lying on the east side of the Rocky mountains, and between them and the low dividing ridge that separates the waters of the Saskatchewan, Red river of the north, and the Missi-sippi river, from those of the Missouri. The basin extends in fact from the Rocky mountains to the eastern border of the Territory, along its north end, a distance of nearly six hundred miles in length, by about one hundred and fifty in breadth, a small part of its northern edge lying in British possessions. The eastern portion of this vast basin is composed of clay table lands, or 'mauvaise terres,' but there is a large amount of good land along the streams. There are several spurs and bunches of mountains, as the Bear's Paw, Little Rocky mountains, Three Buttes, etc., scattered about in it. It drains to the east by the Missouri river, Milk river, Marias river, Teton river, Sun river, and Dearborn, the first three putting into the Missouri necticut in 1807. They emigrated to Michigan when it was a Territory, and subsequently returned to New York State where they remained until 1847. That year they again turned their faces westward, the Territory of Wisconsin being their objective point, and in Delavan township, Walworth county, they took claim to a tract of Government land. There he improved a farm and there he spent the rest of his life and died, his death occurring in 1865, in the sixty-first year of his age. Both he and his wife were members of the Congregational Church. Their lives were characterized by honest industry and they had the confidence and esteem of all who knew them. In their family were twelve children, Asher W. being the sixth born and one of the five who are still living.

Asher W. Paul grew up on his father's farm. Early in life he was inured to hard work, his summers being spent in the field and his winters in attendance at the district school, which was held in a log cabin. After he reached his majority he was for one term a student at Delavan, and when he started out in life for himself it was as a farmer. In 1866 he and some of his neighbors—four families in all—started across the country for Montana, allured hither by reports of the gold discovery. They traveled with ox teams, joined a large emigrant train composed of 180 wagons, 1,400 head of stock and nearly 200 men, and made the journey in safety. As their company was so large and so well armed, they were not molested by the Indians.

Arrived in Montana, Mr. Paul located on a ranch fifty miles north of Virginia City, in Willow Creek valley, Madison county, where he engaged in the dairy business, keeping about seventy cows. At that time the most of the people in Montana were engaged in prospecting and mining, and provisions of all kinds were high. He received as high as $1.50 per pound for his butter and found a ready market at Helena, Diamond City, and the various mining camps. Although the dairy busines was very profitable it was attended with much hard labor, the work all being done by hand, and he did not continue his butter making after 1874. He, however, kept his stock.

Mr. Paul was the builder of the bridges at the forks of the Missouri river, and he also built four miles of toll road. This road and these bridges formed the key to the whole country, as the most of the emigrants to Montana passed along this route. Here he also built a hotel. These improvements not only resulted in financial success to him but they also proved of great value and convenience to the traveling public. He conducted the hotel and kept the toll road and bridges until 1884, when he sold out to an English syndicate for $30,000. The property is now owned by Marcus Daly, who gave $142,000 for it.

In 1887, soon after Great Falls began to boom, Mr. Paul came here and purchased property and started the Cascade livery stable, which he has since conducted successfully. For a number of years he has been raising blooded horses and at this writing is the owner of "King Rock," a valuable Hambletonian horse. Like the most of Montana's business men, he is interested in mining land, having 160 acres of land covered with rich placer mines. For twenty-two years he has held a patent for this tract.

Mr. Paul was married in 1864 to Miss Mary C. Hanley, a native of the State of Maine. She crossed the plains with him and has been the sharer of his joys and sorrows all through his pioneer life. They now occupy one of the most cozy and delightful homes in Great Falls.

Politically, Mr. Paul is a Republican.

below Fort Benton, and the last two a short distance above the Great Falls. The western portion of this basin is but little broken up by mountains, yet only about one-third of its surface is available for farming, consisting of a strip from ten to twenty miles in width and about one hundred and fifty long, running along the east foot of the Rocky mountains, which afford a good supply of timber. This strip is clothed with bunch-grass, but as you leave the mountains and go down into the plains, the country becomes a succession of clay terraces or table lands, more commonly known as 'bad lands,' which are sterile, with but a scanty growth of stunted grass. The streams have worn down through these table lands until they now run in cañons several hundred feet below you, meandering through the narrow bottoms that border it. These bottoms, though narrow, are generally fertile and well supplied with grass. Timber, however, is not very plenty, what there is being principally cottonwood. It is possible that a large proportion of these table lands may be rendered productive by a well-directed system of irrigation.

"The want of timber may also be supplied by coal, of which I have reason to believe there are large deposits in this basin.

"There have not been any discoveries that would pay of precious minerals in this basin as yet, but there has been a small amount of superficial prospecting done. This has established the fact that gold exists in unknown quantities in the cañons and streams that put into this basin from the Rocky mountains. I am, however, of the opinion that when this region is thoroughly prospected it will be found equally as rich as its sister basins.

"Next comes the western central basin, drained to the east by the Jefferson fork of the Missouri and its tributaries, of which the following are the principal: Big-Hole river, which comes in from the northeast, and which, I think, affords more than the Beaverhead river,

JUDGE THOMAS C. BACH, a prominent member of the bench and bar of Montana, was born in Brooklyn, New York, October 10, 1853, and is a descendent from English and Irish ancestors. His grandfather, Robert Bach, came from England to this country and settled on Long Island at an early day. He was there when the war of 1812 began, and when the attack was made on Long Island he joined the American forces and fought until the brave American army conquered the invading foe. He engaged successfully in the wholesale drug business and erected the first brick house in the city of Brooklyn. This building was afterward sold, and finally passed into the hands of a charitable society, and is now used as a home for aged and infirm women. He was married in Brooklyn to Miss Margaret Cowan, a native of Ireland. Their son, John Casnave Bach, the father of our subject, was born in Brooklyn in 1814. He married Elizabeth Nostrand, who was born on Long Island in 1820. They had eleven children, of whom eight are still living. John C. Bach, like his father, was a druggist, and both were members of the Episcopal Church. He died in 1885, in the seventy-first year of his age, and his wife survived him two years, her death occurring in 1887, at the age of sixty-seven.

Judge Bach was the eighth child in his father's family, and when he was eight years old they removed to New York city, where he was reared to manhood. He graduated in the Columbia College in 1875, with the degree of A. B., and in 1877 he completed his studies in the law department of the School of Arts, graduating with the degrees of A. M. and LL. B. Immediately after his graduation he entered the office of Arnoux, Ritch & Woodford, with whom he spent one year, and after that was with the firm of Tenney & Aymar two years. The following two years he was engaged in the practice of his profession alone. In 1884 he came to Montana, and, after a short residence in Bozeman, formed a law partnership with Judge DeWitte of Butte, where he remained until 1886. That year President Cleveland appointed him Judge of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Montana, and upon receiving his appointment he came immediately to Helena, where he has since resided. He held the office of Supreme Judge until 1889, when Montana was made a State. In 1892 he was elected a member of the State Legislature, and was Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and, being a man of marked ability and great force of character, he was the recognized leader of the Democracy during the great Senatorial contest of that year. During all the first part of the session he was a strong supporter of ex-Governor S. T. Hauser, until that most worthy candidate withdrew, and the leadership of the Clark forces was then forced upon which has generally been considered the main stream, and properly so, because it runs through the center of the basin, and drains a much larger extent of country than the Big-Hole, which has along its course, and in a huge semicircle around its head, some of the loftiest peaks in this part of the Rocky mountains, and on which the snow falls to a great depth, and as it melts in the spring and summer, causes the Big-Hole, which has a much steeper grade than the Beaverhead, to become a rushing torrent of formidable dimensions. The Big-Hole and the Beaverhead unite near the eastern edge of the basin, and form the Jefferson fork of the Missouri, which runs through a cañon into the 'Eastern Central basin,' where it makes a junction at the 'Three Forks' with the Madison and Gallatin rivers.

"Rattlesnake creek comes in from the northwest, as does Williams' creek a few miles farther west. Horse Prairie creek, which is the head-water of the Beaverhead, comes in from the west. Red Rock creek comes in from the south; Black-Tailed Deer creek from the southeast, and Stinking Water river from the southeast. These streams drain this basin, which lies much in the shape of a spread fan, being about 150 miles wide by 100 long.

"There have been no mines discovered on the Big-Hole, except a small patch at its head, of which I have spoken elsewhere.

"Rattlesnake creek is crossed in the cañon above its valley by numerous ledges of the richest quartz silver that has yet been discovered in Montana, some of them assaying as high as $5,000 to the ton of rock. * * *

"The round smooth boulders and gravel commonly known as the 'wash,' that are always found in placer diggings, have evidently been caused by the grinding, pulverizing action of glaciers, the country having undergone great changes of upheaval and depression since that time; and in gold-bearing localities the action of the elements during countless ages has collected the gold that was ground out of the ledges and rocks by the action of the glaciers into the ravines, creeks and rivers of the vicinity. * * *

him, a position which he did not desire, but one to which he seemed in duty bound. During all this time Judge Bach showed himself to be most thoroughly conversant with the constitution, as well as an expert parliamentarian and possessed of great mental activity and force. Still, as he did not succeed in the cause he championed, he has very much regretted the part that devolved upon him, while both friends and foes admire his talents and conceded ability.

In 1889 he was married to Miss Kathryn Child, a native of San Francisco, California, and they have two children, Dorothy and Marjorie.

Judge Bach has invested in mines and mining since coming to Montana, and is now interested in valuable property. He has joined no societies since the Delta Psi of his college, and ever since he graduated he has been a powerful advocate of tariff reform.

Such is in simple words the life of one of Montana's most eminent jurists. During his term of service in the Supreme Court of Montana, Judge Bach passed upon many cases of great importance and involving many fine points; but the compass of this article will not permit special reference to them, beyond the statement that few men had occupied his position and have had so few of their decisions reversed. His opinions are fine specimens of judicial thought; always clear, logical, and as brief as the character of the case would permit. He never enlarged beyond the necessities of legal thought in order to indulge in the drapery of literature. Eminently practical in all his thought and actions, Judge Bach has shown unquestioned ability for political leadership. A forceful speaker, an entertaining conversationalist, stanch in friendship, and loyal in trust, he merits the high esteem in which he is held by a host of admirers and friends.

CAPTAIN SAMUEL A. SWIGGETT, Register of the Land Office, Helena, Montana, is a native of Maryland, born in Dorchester county, May 19, 1834.

Captain Swiggett's ancestors were among the early emigrants to this country from England, and were prominent factors in the early development of the colonies and States. His maternal grandfather, Samuel Hurst, fought for independence on the Revolutionary battle-fields. Samuel Hurst was also the grandfather of Bishop Hurst, of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Grandfather Aaron Swiggett was a Major in the war of 1812. He was born in "Bannack City stands at the upper end of the cañon on Willard's creek, where it opens out into a small valley. The mines extend down the creek seven or eight miles, and have paid big, but are now declining somewhat.

"In this cañon are situated many leads of gold-bearing quartz of exceeding richness, among which is the famous 'Dacotah' lead which is now being worked with great success. There is also the Waddam lead, the California lead, and many others that assay quite rich. In fact, few places in the world possess greater mineral wealth than the vicinity of Bannack City.

"Passing by Horse Prairie, Red Rock, and Black-Tailed Deer creeks, each of which has a valley of considerable extent which is admirably adapted for grazing and probably for farming also, but on which no mines have as yet been discovered, we come to Stinking-Water river, which has a valley of considerable size, but only a portion of which was fertile and well grassed; but the spur of mountains that run down between it and the Madison river, and which are over fifty miles long, running due north and south, are very rich. The first stream that comes out of these mountains into the valley of the Stinking-Water is the 'Wisconsin gulch,' so called because it was first worked by a party from that State. This gulch has only been partially prospected, it being deep to the bedrock, yet there has been found a considerable extent of placer diggings in and adjacent to it. A few miles farther up the valley comes out Mill creek, so called because Gammell & Co. built a mill on it last year. There has been no placer mines discovered on this creek, but along the base of the mountains in its vicinity is a large number of rich gold and silver-bearing quartz leads, among which are the Rothschilds lode, the Eclipse lode, the Antelope, the Mountain Queen, the Gibraltar, and many others that assay rich.

"This is the only place in this range where silver leads are found. Some of them assay from one to two thousand dollars to the ton of rock, and they are very easy of access. Here is also a thriving village, called Brandon, which bids fair to rival Virginia City.

Delaware and was for many years one of the prominent citizens of that State. His son, William H., the father of our subject, was born in Delaware in 1810, and for his wife married Hemetta Maria Hurst, a native of Maryland. They became the parents of seven children, of whom four sons are living. The mother died in her thirty-second year, and the father lived to be sixty-five. Both were worthy members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. William H. Swiggett had resided in his native State until his marriage, when he removed to Maryland, and it was in the latter State that the subject of this sketch was born; the parents soon removed to Delaware, and reared their family there.

Captain Swiggett, the first born in his father's family, received a limited education in Delaware and Maryland, and after reaching his fourteenth year came West as far as Indiana and engaged in the merchant-tailoring and clothing business. Subsequently he removed to Iowa and continued in the same business, being thus occupied when the war of the Rebellion burst upon the country.

He enlisted in the ranks in September, 1862, and became a member of the Thirty-sixth Iowa Volunteers. He had been active in recruiting for this and other regiments, and was elected Captain of his company. They were sent to the front in the Department of the Mississippi, their first engagements being at Helena and Little Rock, Arkansas. In the spring they left Little Rock for Shreveport, and while his brigade was guarding a train from Camden to Pine Bluffs, Arkansas, they were attacked by 9,000 mounted infantry, and, after a fight which lasted two and a half hours, the entire brigade was either killed or captured. Seventy-three men in Captain Swiggett's company were killed and wounded, the rest, thirty-four, were captured. The latter were taken as prisoners of war to Tyler, Texas. The following August, Captain Swiggett with five other officers of the Thirty-sixth Iowa, bribed the guards and by that means they made their escape. They traveled by night, remained hidden in the woods during the day, and in this way succeeded in covering a distance of 110 miles; but when they reached the vicinity of Boston, Texas, they were recaptured and were marched back to Tyler. When taken, most of the men were exhausted from exposure and want of food, and the return to Tyler was made under the most distressing circumstances. They were put in the stockades the last of September. On the 23d of "A few miles from Mill creek comes out 'Ram's-Horn gulch,' so called from the large number of mountain sheep horns lying along it, it having once been a resort for them. This stream, like Mill creek, possesses no placer diggings, but it has not been thoroughly prospected. It has, however, many rich leads of gold-bearing quartz, among which is the famous 'Monitor,' which is very rich. A little farther up the valley comes out Biven's gulch—named after the man who first 'struck it'—in this creek, which has paid, and is still, paying remarkably well in 'coarse gold,' pieces having been taken out of this gulch weighing as high as $320. A short distance further along the base of the mountain, and we come to 'Harris gulch,' named after its discoverer, as usual, and which has paid well in places, in beautiful coarse gold, but this gulch is what is called 'spotted,' in mining parlance; that is, the gold is scattered about in irregular spots. Only a small portion of this gulch has paid well.

"There is another ravine, called California gulch, which comes into Harris gulch on the south, before it enters the valley of the Stinking-Water. This gulch is similar to Harris's, except that it is still more 'spotted,' and has not paid so well.

"A few miles farther south comes out the famous Alder creek—the derivation of which name I have given elsewhere—on the banks of which, a few miles above the first cañon, where it opens out into a kind of basin, are situated the cities of Virginia, Central and Nevada, which are fast being merged into one, with a population of about ten thousand, and rapidly increasing. Alder creek is incredibly rich, from its head down to near where it enters the valley of the Stinking-Water, a distance of about fifteen miles. Near its head, pieces have been found weighing from $50 to as high as $720, the gold getting coarser as the head of the stream is approached.

"In the hills bordering the stream, a large number of gold-bearing quartz leads have been discovered. Those in Summit district being of December, Captain Swiggett, with two officers of the One Hundred and Twentieth Ohio Infantry, made a second attempt to escape, and after traveling twenty-one nights they reached the Codo river, 275 miles from Tyler, and again he and the two officers who were with him were captured, this time being confined from time to time in different jails and finally landed in the stockade at Shreveport. While the other prisoners, members of his company and regiment, were exchanged, Captain Swiggett, on account of his having tried to make his escape, was sent back on foot again to Tyler, this being the third time he had been marched there as a prisoner. There he was kept until June, 1865, when the war was over, and the last prisoners in the stockade were exchanged; and as a matter of fact he was the last man out of the stockade. He then returned to Duval's Bluff, Arkansas, where he rejoined his regiment, with them being honorably discharged and mustered out in October, at Davenport, Iowa.

Upon his return to Iowa, Captain Swiggett engaged in merchandising. Soon after this he was elected Sheriff of Wapello county. At the end of his first term he was re-elected and served a second term. He continued his mercantile business there until 1837, when he came to Montana. Upon his arrival here, he purchased an interest in a quartz mine, and has since been engaged in mining. After being a resident of Jefferson county, Montana, one year, he attended the Republican county convention. There were sixty-two members in the convention, only two of whom he knew; nevertheless, he was nominated by the convention on the Legislative ticket. He was elected to that office and served the last term of the Territorial Legislature of Montana, after which he resumed his mining operations in Jefferson county. In 1890 he was appointed by President Harrison as Register of the United States Land Office at Helena, Montana. He had not been an applicant for this position and did not know of his appointment until he received a dispatch asking him to accept. He did so, and is now performing the duties of this office.

Captain Swiggett was married in 1856 to Miss Eliza H. Van Cleve, a native of Indiana and a daughter of Cyrus Van Cleve, a native of Kentucky. There are two children living, a son and daughter,—Levin V. and Gertrude, the latter being now the wife of Thomas S. Wilson; and three dead,—Annie, Elfing W. and Lida. Mrs. Wilson is an elocutionist, and she and her husband have a college at Spokane, Washington. Mrs. Swiggett almost unexampled richness, while in the mountains at the head of the creek, is a coal field of unknown extent, which is now being developed. This is the second place in this basin where coal has been discovered, and, in a country so sparsely timbered as this, coal fields are of incalculable value. In fact, nature has placed within the limits of Montana all the requisites to enable her to become the wealthiest part of the United States. Abounding in all the minerals, precious and otherwise, with coal and water power unlimited to work them, the future of Montana will equal in reality those gorgeous fictions of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

"This basin contains eight valleys of considerable size, to wit: The valley of the upper part of the Jefferson and Beaverhead, of Big-Hole river, of Big-Hole prairie, of Rattlesnake, of Horse prairie, of Red Rock, of Black-Tailed Deer, of Stinking-Water. This ends the description of the Western Central basin, which contains in itself all the essentials necessary for the prosperity of a mighty nation.

"Next comes the Eastern Central basin, which is drained by the Missouri river, below the Three Forks, and above them by the Jefferson fork, into which empty the North Boulder creek, South Boulder creek and Willow creek, on the first and last of which are some placer diggings of limited extent and richness, and many quartz leads that prospect rich. This basin is further drained by the Madison and Gallatin forks, which form a junction with the Jefferson in a fertile plain of considerable extent.

"The basin contains a large amount of arable lands, with a climate fully as good as Utah. It is about 150 miles long north and south, by about eighty east and west. It contains five principal valleys, to wit: The valley of the passed away on April 13, 1893, dying from the effects of a malignant tumor, which caused her great suffering for eight months. She died as she had lived--a full believer in the saving blood of Christ, and would often say to her husband and friends, in the most cheerful manner, that she had more friends in heaven than on earth, and was anxious to go. Her remains were interred in the family lot in the cemetery in Ottumwa, Iowa, by the side of her children.

Captain Swiggett has been a member of the Baptist Church since 1856. He cast his first vote for General Fremont that year, and has been a consistent Republican ever since. The Captain is in the full vigor of manhood, is most genial and sociable in his intercourse with his fellow men, and wherever he has resided he has hosts of warm friends.

WINTHROP RAYMOND landed in Montana in 1865 and has since been identified with its interests. As one of the representative stockmen of the Ruby valley and as the founder of the town of Sheridan, he is entitled to more than a passing notice in this work. Following is a sketch of his life;

Winthrop Raymond was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, October 22, 1848. Of his ancestors be it recorded that some of them came from England to America in 1632 and settled in Connecticut on a grant of land they had received from the Crown. They were prominent in the early history of that part of the country, among them being successful farmers and eminent lawyers and doctors. Grandfather Christopher Raymond married Miss Rachel Hillhouse, she, too, being a descendant of an old Connecticut family. She died in the sixty-sixth year of her age and he lived to be seventy-three. In their family were thirteen children. Their son, Daniel Fitch Raymond, was born September 12, 1786. By his first wife, nee Sara Amos, he had two children, and by his second wife, whose maiden name was Delilah Mattock, he had six children. Four of the latter are still living, and three of them are prominent citizens of Montana. Daniel Fitch Raymond died in Cincinnati, Ohio, July 13, 1849, leaving a widow, who at this writing is in her eighty-first year. For many years she has been a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, while Mr. Raymond was a Presbyterian. Professionally, he was a lawyer ,and gained eminence at the bar.

Winthrop Raymond is the youngest in the above family. His early life was spent in Missouri, and in 1865, when in his sixteenth year, he crossed the plains, his mother, brother William H. and sister, making the journey at the same time. They had two yoke of oxen, a yoke of cows and a span of horses. The oxen hauled the wagon on which they brought their provisions and goods, and the horses were attached to a light wagon in which the mother and sister rode. They were over six months in making the journey. Some of the time traveling in this way was very enjoyable, while at other times it was attended with great danger, as the Indians were often troublesome. Our party were pretty well protected, Three Forks, of North Boulder, of the lower part of the Jefferson, of the Madison, of the Gallatin. It contains a greater amount of farming lands than the basin of the Beaverhead and tributaries.

"Next and last comes the basin of the Yellowstone and its branches. It drains toward the east, and is about 400 miles long, by about 150 wide. But little is known about the mineral resources of this great valley, the hostility of the Crow Indians rendering it very dangerous prospecting within its limits. They have already killed several men who were exploring the country, and robbed and set on foot many others.

"The indefatigable miners have, however, succeeded in finding a creek at the western edge of the basin, where it approaches nearest the valley of the Gallatin, which they have called Emigrant gulch, because it was mostly taken up by the emigrants who arrived by the Bridger and Jacobs road. There is a small village on this creek, which prospects very well in places, and will probably prove very rich, but it is very hard to work, because of the vast quantity of granite boulders scattered along its bed and banks.

"There is every reason to believe, however, that the basin of the Yellowstone will prove fully as rich in precious minerals as the others, however, as they journeyed with a train in which were one hundred able-bodied men, and which was officered with captain and guards. On part of the journey they traveled ninety miles without water, and during this time some members of the train as well as some of their cattle died.

It was on the 7th of September, 1865, that they landed safe in Virginia City. There, the brothers opened a wholesale grocery house and conducted it successfully for a number of years. Later they engaged in banking under the firm name of Raymond, Harrington & Company, and they had the honor of being the first bankers of the town. The banking business they sold to Mr. Hall and it is now known as the Hall-Bennett Bank. They also owned Bellm on Park, were engaged in importing and breeding blooded horses, and were thus prominent factors in this line, and to them is due the credit of having been the importers and owners of several of the fastest trotters in Montana. After being engaged in this business for a number of years, the subject of our sketch sold his interest in it to his brother, who still carries it on successfuliy.

In 1889 Mr. Raymond came to his present place in the Ruby valley. Here he became the owner of 1,080 acres of choice land. The party who had formerly owned it had in 1885 platted a part of the town of Sheridan, and since then Mr. Raymond has platted, improved and sold lots He still owns a large portion of the town and rents a number of buildings which he has erected. On his ranch he raises hay and stock—horses and cattle. He also loans considerable money in a private way.

February 28, 1876, Mr. Raymond married Miss Hannah E. Bateman, who was born near Detroit, Michigan. Mr. and Mrs. Raymond have three children, all natives of Virginia City, their names being Carrie Bell, Daniel Walcott and Delilah Ellen. Mrs. Raymond is a member of the Episcopal Church.

In politics, Mr. Raymond has always affiliated with the Democratic party, but he has never sought or desired office, preferring to give his whole time and attention to own private affairs, in the management of which he has met with signal success.

HON. JOHN L. SLOANE, attorney, is now chief clerk in the Land Office at Missoula, Montana. He is a native of New York city, born March 28, 1847. His ancestors were Scotch-Irish. Robert and Jeanne (Sloane) Sloane, his parents, were cousins. They started on the voyage to America early in 1847, with their family of twelve children, and before they reached their destination Mr. Sloane died and was buried at sea. Mrs. Sloane landed at New York city with her children, and there, soon after their arrival she gave birth to the subject of this sketch. She died in 1854, in her fiftieth year, and only two of the family now survive.

John L. Sloane was reared in New York, and when he was fifteen years of age entered the employ of Vyse & Sons, wholesale dealers in straw goods, and with them he remained from 1862 until 1864. In March of the latter year, when only seventeen years of age, he enlisted in Company A, Fifth New York Veteran Volunteers, Duryea's Zouaves, and with his command immediately went to the front. He served in the Army of the Potomac, First Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, and was in all the hard-fought battles of the spring campaign of 1864, and continued in the service until the surrender of General Lee. He then took part in the grand review of the victorious army in Washington. During his one year and one-half of service he had many thrilling experiences. He had entered the service as a private, was promoted to the rank of Second Lieutenant, Second California Volunteer Cavalry, and in that capacity served until January, 1866, at which time his regiment was mustered out. At the battle of Weldon Railroad, August 18, and it is known to contain large fields of coal, which are very accessible and among which are numbers of petroleum or oil springs. In climate and fertility this valley is a medium between the valleys of the mountains and the prairies of the Western States. Corn, beans, pumpkins, etc., grow finely in it.

"This basin contains eight principal valleys, as follows: The main valley of the Yellowstone, of Shield's river, of the Rosebud, of Clark's Fork, of Pryor's Fork, of the Big-Horn river, of Tongue river, and of Powder river, and many smaller ones. * * *

"Thus ends this slight description of 'the country of the mountains,' which, it will be seen, contains five large basins, which inclose within their limits thirty valleys, each of which is as large as three or four German principalities, besides many smaller ones not much larger than Rhode Island or Delaware."

As observed a few pages back, civilization first started on Gold creek, on the arrival of the Stuarts. True, there was Fort Benton, 400 miles distant, on the far eastern frontier, while here and there were other military posts of more or less importance, and around these gathered, as gather they will more or less, for good or ill, all sorts of civilians. But the idea of agriculture, gold-mining or any other sort of toil never in any way pervades the atmosphere of an agency or post.

From Stuart's journal it appears that he and his party coquetted with Fortune for months, even years, before taking her seriously on trial by appealing, with pick and shovel, to the heart of Mother Earth. James Stuart and his brother Granville had left northern California nearly five years before opening their mines in Montana and had traveled, traded, ranched, prospected, done all sorts of legitimate things in stock-raising and 1864, he was slightly wounded, being hit four times in one day.

After the war Mr. Sloane went to Sedgwick, Kansas, opened the first store in that town, and remained in business there until 1873. From 1873 until 1877 he was in New Orleans. In 1877 he came direct to Missoula, Montana, and accepted the position of express agent for the Northern Pacific Express Company, and ever since he first located here he has been prominently identified with the best interests of the town. He served six years as Police Magistrate of the city, five years as Chief Clerk of the District Court, and is now serving as chief clerk of the Land Office. He is a fine penman and an obliging and otherwise efficient business man.

Mr. Sloane was married at Wichita, Kansas, February 4, 1871, to Miss Lizzie A. Mansfield, a native of Sidney, Illinois, and a daughter of John M. Mansfield of that State. Mr. and Mrs. Sloane have six children, Jessie E., Mary E., Gertrude F., Robert Hugh, Ona M. and Frank Harold; all at home except Jessie E., who is the wife of Tylar B. Thompson, a Missoula business man. They also lost one child, Ama Hazel, twin of Frank Harold, who died at the age of ten months.

Mr. Sloane has been a member of the Democratic party all his life, and was in 1892 the nominee of his party for Clerk of the Supreme Court of his State (Montana). With fraternal circles he is prominently identified. He is Past Master of Missoula Lodge, No. 13, A. F. & A. M.; is Past Grand Chancellor of the Knights of Pythias of Montana; is Past Department Commander of the G. A. R. of Montana; and is Past Master Workman of Union Lodge, No. 3, A. O. U. W. Beside his comfortable and attractive home at No. 522 East Front street, Missoula, he owns other property in the city and also has 400 acres of land within a mile and a half of Missoula.

C. D. Eliot, County Assessor of Cascade county, Montana, was born in Auburn, Maine, July 2, 1855.

Andrew Eliot, the progenitor of the Eliots of New England, emigrated from England to this country in 1679, and settled at Beverly, Massachusetts, where he was a prominent citizen and where he died at the ripe old age of eighty years. He left a large family. The Eliots of New Hampshire, Maine and New York all sprang from him. C D. Eliot's great-grandfather, John Eliot, was a soldier in the Revolutiou, fought in the battle of Bunker Hill, and rendered the cause of independence his faithful service until the close of the war. He lived to be ninety-one years of age. He had a family of twelve children, of whom John Eliot, our subject's father, was the second. John Eliot was born in Nottingham, Massachusetts, October 5, 1801; was educated at Westbrook, and at the Troy Theological Seminary, New York; and married Arabella Berry, a native of Lisbon, Maine, by whom he had five children, three of whom are living. His father being a member of the Congregational Church, he was reared in that faith and educated for the ministry. During the early part of his life he was a missionary in western New York and the last twenty years of trading during the interval. It was not till the winter of 1860 that they permanently pitched tent in Deer Lodge valley, at the mouth of Gold creek. As all along through the previous years, they now had all sorts of trouble from Indians, and it was not till the date given before that they could gather together supplies, tools and the required equipments to make earnest trial of fortune.

Meantime, they had, along with some new arrivals by way of the Mullen road over the Rocky mountains, as well as some of the nomadic laborers of Mullen's road, petitioned the legislature of Washington Territory for the rights of local civil government.

The result was that in the winter of 1860–1, the legislature in session at Olympia, nearly 1,000 miles distant as the passable roads ran at that time, authorized the existence of two counties on her border to the east, Shoshonee and Missoula. Of this latter county, James Stuart was chosen Sheriff at the first election, held July 14, 1862, the first sheriff in all Montana, as the other county fell to Idaho in the final division.

The work of a border sheriff is neither onerous nor profitable. There is a prevailing opinion to the contrary all over the world, an opinion which might as well be disposed of here as elsewhere. Nor does crime prevail in as great a his life were spent as pastor of the Rumford Point Congregational Church in Maine. He died in 1879, in the seventy eighth year of his age. His wife died in 1889, at the age of sixty-six.

Charles Dwight Eliot, the third born in his father's family, was reared in his native State and was educated at Kent's Hill Wesleyan Seminary. In 1874, after leaving college, he went to Boston and from that time until 1884 he was bookkeeper for the Barstow Stove Company. In 1884 he came to Belt, Montana, and engaged in the sheep business, which he has since successfully carried on. Since coming to this State he has from time to time made investments in real estate and sheep.

In 1892 Mr. Eliot was elected by the Republicans to the office of County Assessor, in which position he is serving most efficiently. He is thoroughly informed on the property values of the county, and in his office he introduced an improved system of land and town-lot books. This system greatly simplifies the work of the assessor.

Like his father and grandfather before him, Mr. Eliot is a member of the Congregational Church, which he joined at Rumford Point and where his membership still remains. Recently he has become identified with the Sons of the Revolution in Cascade county.

Howard Crosby, County Clerk and ex officio Recorder of Cascade county, Montana, is a native of the State of New York, born in New York city, July 1, 1853.

He belongs to the eighth generation of Crosbys in America and is a direct descendant of Simon and Ann Crosby, who sailed from London, England, April 18, 1635, on the ship Susan Ellyn and landed at Cambridge, Massachusetts. They became large land-holders and prominent among the early settlers of Cambridge. They had three sons: Thomas, born in 1635; Simon, 1637; and Joseph, 1639. Simon Crosby, Sr., died in 1640. From his oldest son, Thomas, our subject descended. Thomas Crosby graduated at Harvard College in 1653; became a Congregational minister and preached for many years at Eastham, Massachusetts; died in Boston, June 13, 1702. He and his wife, nee Sarah Bracket, had a son John who was born December 4, 1670, and died May 25, 1714. John Crosby's son David was born April 13, 1709, and was married June 19, 1735, to Rebecca Hopkins. He removed from Eastham, Massachusetts, to South-East, New York in 1750, and died there February 25, 1788. His son David was born September 6, 1737, and died November 16, 1816. His wife, whose maiden name was Bethia Hopkins, died July 2, 1776, at the age of forty-one years. Their son, Peter Crosby, our subject's grandfather, was born in South-East, New York, September 4, 1763, and, January 25, 1783, married Ruth Waring. He was Sheriff of Putnam county, New York, during the years 1813–14–15. His death occurred November 9, 1831, and his wife died July 31, 1830. They had eleven children. Their youngest child, Peter Crosby, was born in South-East, Putnam county, New York, November 26, 1807, and on the 4th of March, 1850, married Elizabeth Petty, a native of Southampton, Long Island. When he was sixteen years of age he went to New York city, where, from that time until he was twenty-one, he served an apprenticeship to the jewelry business. Afterward he turned his attention to real-estate business. He died in Brooklyn, New York, November, 1878. His wife died August 10, 1861, in that State, at the age of thirty-one. She left two children: Howard, the subject of this sketch; and George, born March 20, 1855.

Howard Crosby was educated at Union Hall Academy, Long Island, New York. In 1870 he was employed as clerk in a dry-goods store, and continued thus occupied eleven years. At the expiration of that time he went to Bogota, South America, as Vice Consul, and occupied that degree as is generally taught in paper covers, or histories of a sensational class that are made merely to sell. In the first place, cowards never court the border to any great extent, and it is only the coward who comes in contact with the law, as a rule. True, bad men have been hung while making a great show of bravery; but it is merely show, and is no more bravery than brass is gold, however much it may look like it, for fine brass may be made to appear even brighter than gold.

Let the truth be told. Montana has a history higher than her record of crime and catalogue of criminals, and no good can come to her or ever has come to her by these bloody annals. It has been pointed out in a previous chapter how an alleged historian of these great Northwest communities imported criminals and criminal records to swell his list of outlawry. To what lasting good?

This of itself is a crime, a crime greater than any in his catalogue. He who would steal the good name of the gray old men who battled here and built up this State is to be pitied and despised. I am told by men who are in a position to know that not one-half the crimes laid at the doors of Montana ever had any real existence on her soil. And I know of my own knowledge that the sheriffs of new countries, while generally capable and most fit in all ways, as was this first one of Missoula, as a rule followed mining or some other solid employment in quest of fortune, during incumbency of office, as at other times.

position about one year. Then he and the consul, W. W. Randall, became partners in a street railway franchise in Bogota. Mr. Crosby returned to New York in order to place the franchise, which he did successfully, and made three trips to Europe, placing the stock of their company in London, Berlin, Paris and St. Petersburg. In the spring of 1886 he came to Helena, Montana, and thence to Great Falls. He took claim to a tract of Government land at Big or Lower Falls and remained at that place a year and a half, after which he sold out. At Great Falls he accepted the appointment of Deputy County Clerk and Recorder, served in that position a year, and was then, in 1889, elected on the Republican ticket to the office of County Clerk and Recorder, which office he still holds, having been re-elected. Since coming to Great Falls he has invested in city property and all his investments have proved valuable ones.

Mr. Crosby was married at Great Falls October 28, 1891, to Miss Elizabeth E. Trusty, a native of Fort Dodge, Iowa, and the daughter of Joseph S. M. Trusty of that city. They have one child, Howard, Jr., born July 22, 1894.

Mr. Crosby is a member of the A. O. U. W. and of the various clubs of Great Falls. He is a pleasant, prompt and energetic business man, and as such is highly esteemed by his many friends in Cascade county.

HERMAN H. POTTING, the leading grocery dealer of Marysville, was born in Germany, December 13, 1838. When three years of age he came with his parents to America, locating in New Orleans, but afterward removed to St. Louis, Missouri, receiving his education at the latter place. At the age of seventeen years he went to California, via the Nicaragua route. After arriving in that State, Mr. Potting mined in Nevada and Sierra counties a number of years, at times meeting with flattering success, but, like all miners, also suffered serious reverses. In 1862 he went to British Columbia in search of gold, and in the following year to Idaho, undergoing many hardships and dangers during the journey. During his wanderings he had saved $20,000, but lost the entire amount in speculation.

With the same fever for gold unabated, Mr. Potting came to Montana in 1865; discovered the Magpie Gulch in Meagher county, afterward sold his interest there; conducted a meat market at New York Gulch one year; next resumed mining at Trout Creek, and continued to search for the glittering treasure at Quartz Gulch, but in 1872 abandoned mining. Mr. Potting then returned to St. Louis, where he followed the wood business on the Mississippi river, also the commission business. In 1876 he went to the Black Hills, from there again returned to St. Louis, and in 1877 located in Meagher county, Montana, where he was engaged in farming and quartz-mining ten years. In 1887 he embarked in the butcher business in Marysville, but in 1889 opened his grocery store, and his entire career in this city has been one of success. He is still prominently connected with mining interests, being a stockholder in the Pigeon and Ball Butte and in various placer mines. Mr. Potting has erected a residence, store and warehouse in Marysville; owns other city property, and is considered one of its most enterprising citizens.

In St. Louis, in 1872, our subject was united in marriage with Miss Annie Toppe, a native of Germany. They have three children,—Edward, Harry and Fred. Harry is associated with his father in the store, and is one of the prominent young business men of the place. Mr. Potting has been a life-long Democrat in political matters; has held the offices of Notary Public and Constable, CHAPTER XIV.

THE INFANT CRYING ALOUD IN ITS CRADLE—PROSPECTORS—INDIANS—ALDER CREEK—THE RICHEST PLACER MINES EVER YET DISCOVERED ON THE GLOBE.

IT must not be imagined that the immediate exploration and development of Montana ceased for a moment with the first beginning at Gold Creek. In the early days miners of California were wont to quote the old German on finding a rattlesnake in his field: "Now you looks out, you poys, vere dere's vone rattleshnake dere's alvaysh two, sure."

Stuart and his company made only "China wages" at first, but soon they were making an ounce a day to the man over at Bannack City. Then there was a store, two stores, a string of log and "shake" houses, and two, three strings or groups of cabins. The thieving Indians being steadily persistent at their normal trade, the people who now poured in by way of the Mullen road and Salt Lake, from the East as well as the West, and from other ways as well, found safety, or comparative security, at least, in grouping as closely together as they well could. Out from this first "city" the California prospectors went in little bands, up and down, east and west, right and left, till not only the other snake but many another one appeared. Yet these two first, Gold Creek and Bannack City, long held the central places; and then, being fortunate in having an intelligent but gives his attention principally to his business relations. He is a strong advocate of the free coinage of silver, and takes a deep interest in the welware of Montana.

HON. GRANVILLE STUART, United States Minister to Paraguay and Uruguay, was born near Clarksburg, Harrison county, Virginia, August 27, 1834, and when he was three years of age his parents moved with their children to Princeton, Illinois, and one year later to Iowa, where young Granville was employed on the farm during the summer and attended the pioneer school during the winter season until 1852.

In 1849 his father went to California in search of gold and returned in 1851. In 1852, his father and brother James crossed the plains, arriving at Neal's ranch in the Sacramento valley in October, after a very adventurous trip, the Indians being very hostile that season, especially along the Humboldt river; and this also was the year of the cholera epidemic, which carried off many emigrants across the plains. Every camping place along Platte river showed newly-made graves, and hundreds lie along its banks with nothing to indicate their resting places. Their rude head-boards were either burned by the annual prairie fires that swept across those vast plains, or in after years the remaining head-boards were used by the emigrants for fire-wood, and the graves unmarked soon sank back into the boundless prairie.

The outfit of Mr. Stuart's party was a small one,—two four-horse teams and but four men,—the father, two brothers and a companion. They traveled swiftly to get beyond the epidemic, passing train after train, and lying in camp, with not well men enough to drive the teams. They went by way of Salt Lake to recruit their horses, which were becoming thin, and here they remained three weeks, boarding with John Taylor, who at that time was one of the twelve "apostles" of the Mormon Church, and who subsequently, on the death of Brigham Young, succeeded to the presidency of the church.

Proceeding westward, the party went down the Humboldt river and by way of the Truckee river to Beckworth valley, to Spanish ranch in the American valley, and to Bidwell's bar on Feather river. Soon, however, they went on to Neal's ranch, in the land of perpetual summer.

After feeding and resting up they went into the mountains and became miners on Little Butte creek and the west branch of Feather river. The rain season setting in with heavy rains, their cabins and works were swept away by the floods. Subsequently they mined at Rabbit creek, Warren Hill and Spanish Flat, in Sierra county, and at Shasta and Yreka in Siskiyou county, and while they were in this country the Rogue river outbreak of the Indians occurred, and Mr. Stuart served in Captain White's company of scouts around the lakes where Gen man who kept account of these earlier times for posterity to receive, they still keep, and will keep to the end, a special place in the great mental and moral heart of Montana.

The store here, as it had ever been in the bright, new days of California, was where the better elements of mining towns were to be met with. The storekeeper was always a man of might and worth. Not infrequently he was the miner's broker and banker. When in luck the miner laid his bag of bright dust in his hands for safer keeping; when out of luck he went to the storekeeper for "tick;" and if a good man, as he nearly always was, he got all he wanted. The average scope and conduct of the genuine miner's life was simple and direct. He bent his back all day, more than all day, sixteen hours in the twenty-four sometimes, beside the slushing, dripping sluice-box, pick or shovel in hand; from daylight till starlight, if we except the shortest sort of an hour for his beans and bacon, he strained his eyes toward the bedrock, looking for nuggets; then, pick and shovel on his dripping shoulder, gold-pan tilted to one side under his arm, showing a little yellow seam on the edge of the bottom, his great, long gum boots whetting and whipping together with a creak as he strode on up toward eral Canby was afterward massacred by the Modocs in 1874.

In June, 1857, in company with his brother, James, and nine others, he started on horseback with pack animals to return to the States. On the 4th of July they suffered greatly from a snow-storm at Stony Point, on the Humboldt, and July 17, at the head of Malad creek, Mr. Stuart fell ill, and was compelled to remain in camp. After waiting here a week, eight of the party went on, leaving Mr. Stuart and his brother and companion (R. Anderson) to follow. Mr. Stuart was very ill for five weeks, and remained in camp until their provisions were pretty well exhausted.

This was the year of the Mormon war, and Colonel Albert Sidney Johnston was about this time coming up to the South Pass, with 5,000 United States troops to reduce them to subjection, they having seceded and begun to defy the general Government. Brigham Young put Utah—or "Deseret," as the Mormons called it—under martial law, imposing heavy penalties for selling provisions or ammunition to the "Gentiles;" and Mormon rangers were stationed throughout the country, patrolling the roads and passes, and arresting all "Gentiles" as spies, and surreptitiously condemning them to death. Being hemmed in on both sides, and with but few provisions, the Stuart party began to cast about for some loop-hole for escape. A man named J. Meek, who was a trader with the emigrants, advised them to go with him and others about 400 miles north, to Beaver Head valley, at the head of the Missouri river, and to winter with them there. Having no other alternative, and being of an adventurous disposition, they determined to do so. Before starting, the problem of supplies presented a serious question for them to solve; but finally, in spite of Brigham's prohibition, a kind-hearted old Mormon secretly sold them provisions enough and ammunition to last them through a portion of the winter, which he delivered to them at midnight; and by morning they were well out of the country. Finding plenty of wild game on the way, they managed to get through safely. During the latter portion of the winter, however, they had to subsist almost exclusively on wild meat, and that without salt.

By this time they had discovered that the country was a mineral one, and they tried to do some prospecting, but their tools were limited to an old shovel, a piece of a pick with a willow handle, and a tin pan. They found good prospects, but the lack of facilities and embarrassment by the Blackfeet Indians prevented them from doing any mining.

They decided to go to Fort Bridger, 114 miles east of Salt Lake, with the few horses they had left, and sell them there, and get another outfit and return to their discovered gold-mining places; but on arriving at the fort they found that the army had moved on into Salt Lake valley, whither they followed them. Here, however, they ascertained that they could not outfit sufficiently well to warrant them in returning at once; and they sold their horses to the soldiers and camp-followers, and went to Green River, Utah, and engaged in trading with the Indians and California emigrants until the fall of 1860.

During this year they returned to Montana and located at Benetsi's Creek, at the lower end of the Deer Lodge valley, and continued their prospecting. They were still in adequately equipped, and the Indians stole most of their horses; but in the fall of 1861 they succeeded in obtaining a whipsaw and picks and shovels packed in Walla Walla, 425 miles distant. Their flour was brought from Salt Lake, 500 miles away, in another direction. Their first mining adventures were not very renumerative, as they operated only in the gulches; afterward they found better diggings on the hillsides and in the bars, and they continued to mine here during the years 1862–3. In the general history of Montana contained in this volume, Mr. Stuart and his brother James have the credit of being the first discoverers of gold in Montana.

In the meantime a younger brother had come West to his cabin, his fellows following along at intervals, stopping now to twist the dirty water from a draggled sleeve, now sitting down on a wayside boulder to take off a boot and remove a rasping gravel stone, lifting his great bearded face now and then toward the hazy horizon as if he thought an Indian might be coming with the darkness.

So, at length the last man got to the cabin where the leader was drying, weighing and sacking the dust. Silence, absolute silence, was the rule or practice. No one asked or seemed to care how much. One drew his sheath knife, sharpened it on a jamb of the boulder-built fireplace, and then yanked down the "sow-belly," laid it sidewise on the table and began to saw off slices; one took the now empty gold-pan, and, pipe in teeth, assaulted the mouth of the flour sack. One, the youngest generally, and also pipe in teeth, took a rifle from the buck-horn rack above the fireplace, and, after looking carefully to see if it was capped and primed, sauntered forth to lead in the picketed horse, bringing a load of dry wood or sage-brush on its back for the breakfast fire as he led in the pony.

Supper ready, they sat down on their heavy stools, all silent still. Tired men are very Colorado, and had been written to come to Montana, as it was a better gold-mining country than Colorado. The letter being shown to parties in Colorado, a Montana fever was started there, and men in considerable numbers started for Deer Lodge. Some of them became lost, scattered about and found other diggings. Mr. Stuart relates many interesting events in the early history of these diggings, which are substantially incorporated in the formal history of Montana, in this volume, and is the author of some published accounts, as "Vigilantes" and "James Stuarts's Expedition to the Yellowstone."

He continued mining for several years at various places, some of which have turned out to be rich in gold. During most of this time, in connection with his brother, he also had stores at Deer Lodge and Phillipsburg. In 1871 they quit merchandising and confined themselves mostly to mining until 1879, in which year our subject engaged in the range cattle business, and continued the same for ten years, in eastern Montana, on the lower branches of the Musselshell river; and between Indian depredations and the white cattle kings he led an active and exciting life.

Retiring from the active supervision of this business in 1887, he again engaged in quartz-mining until 1881, and he holds many mining interests to the present time.

In 1891 he was appointed by Governor Toole as State Land Agent, and filled the office for two years. He has also been School Trustee for sixteen years, was seven years president of the State and Territorial Board of Live Stock Commissioners, and for several years was president of the Live Stock Association of the Territory. For five terms he was a member of the Territorial Legislature; has served as a director of the State prison, and has held numerous other public offices. It was in March, 1894, that he was appointed by the President of the United States (Cleveland) as United States Minister to Paraguay and Uruguay, South America, and he is now serving in that responsible position.

Mr. Stuart is still an active citizen of Montana, and has been an important factor in the common weal of the State. He is a Democrat and has been actively interested in the movements of public interest, particularly in educational matters, during all his long residence in Montana. His peculiarly active life and experiences have made him a shrewd diplomatic and efficient representative of the product of the earlier influences of our Western frontier. His life has been replete with denouements of interest and excitement, and his association with the classes and influences which surrounded his life here peculiarly fit him for the position to which he has been recently appointed.

JOHN B. LAURIN, the pioneer settler of the Ruby valley and the founder of the town of Laurin, the county seat of Madison county, forms the subject of this article.

John B. Laurin is a native of Canada. He was born in St. Martin, twelve miles north of Montreal, August 21, 1821, and is of French descent. His parents, Paul and Margret (Charthran) Laurin, were both born in Canada. The father was a merchant and farmer. He died at the age eighty-nine years and his wife passed away in her seventy-ninth year. They were devout Catholics. Their family was composed of thirteen children, seven of whom, four daughters and three sons, still survive.

John B. was the sixth born in this family. He was reared at his native place, his boyhood days being spent at work on the farm and in the store with his father. When he was sixteen he began learning the tanner's business, and after working at it three years opened a leather and shoe supply store in the city of Montreal. This store he conducted two years. His next venture was in the Serefena Hotel, which establishment he ran five years, with fair success. In 1849 he crossed the plains to Utah. There he opened a store and also engaged in the stock business, raising, buying and selling, and for eleven years had a large and remunerative trade with the Indians.

human. They all know that silence means rest, rest of mind as well as body; and let it be written down that these big men rarely quarreled, even under the most adverse fortune.

Their tea was strong as lye and black as soot, and served in tin cups usually worn at the belt. Each man used the sheath or "crevassing" knife worn at his side, and sometimes they had homemade forks made of sharpened little sticks. Their plates were of tin, and, after a meal, turned over, so that the little chipmunk or Douglass squirrel or woolly-tailed wood rat might leave his tracks on the convex bottom instead of the concave inside. This plate was always turned right side up with a bang. I don't know why: perhaps to make it clean! Yes, it was washed sometimes, on Sundays. But in a place so new, where there are so many streams coming down the mountains, laughing and lisping a thousand pretty stories of gold, fortune, far-away home—ah! sometimes the miner's Sundays were months apart, and so the plate was not a bit worn of its thin tin coat by being too much washed.

In the autumn of 1863 Thompson and Blevins came into the mines of Idaho from Eugene, Oregon, with a wagon-load of cats. A small consignment of this remarkable merchan-

In 1863 it was that Mr. Laurin came to his present location in the Ruby valley, Montana, his arrival being on the 15th of July. He was among the first settlers in this beautiful valley. Here he at once opened a miner's supply store and soon found himself doing a successful business. Prices were high and goods in demand. In 1865 he sold flour for $160 per sack of 100 pounds, and he gave a good horse for a firkin of butter. The pioneers lived chiefly on beef and bread. When the land was surveyed he took a homestead and a pre-emption claim, together amounting to 320 acres, and afterward from time to time as he prospered he added to his landed estate until he became the owner of 1,700 acres, in different parts of the valley. He continued in the mercantile and stock business until 1886. For forty years he was a successful merchant, a portion of the time conducting two branch houses in connection with his main business. As above stated, he founded the town which bears his name. From 1867 until 1886 he was its Postmaster, and until 1875 he ran a hotel in the town. His stock business has already been referred to. At one time he had as high as 7,000 head of sheep, and he also had large droves of Shorthorn cattle. He still owns some fine horses of the Clydesdale breed.

Mr. Laurin was married June 9, 1855, to Mrs. Adaline Boothe, a native of Canada and the danghter of Antone La Gris. She started to cross the plains with her husband, Mr. Boothe, in 1854, and while on their journey he was accidentally shot, on the 16th of October, and died on the 22d of the same month. Her only child by her first husband died at the age of nine months. She and Mr. Laurin have reared fourteen foster children, who are all alive and doing well. Both Mr. and Mrs. Laurin are members of the Catholic Church and have liberally aided in its advancement here. Politically, he is a Democrat.

Few, if any, are more fully acquainted with the history of this part of the country than is Mr. Laurin, he having been here during all its early exciting times. Indeed, one of the "road agents" was tried in his store, was convicted and was taken out and hung near by. While he was landlord of the hotel at Laurin he entertained nearly all the pioneers of the State, and both he and his good wife are as highly esteemed as their circle of acquaintances is wide.

JOHN A. SUMMERS, a prominent and successful stock raiser of the Bitter Root valley, was born in Taney county, Missouri, August 22, 1849. In an early day his ancestors came from England to the colony of Virginia, and they were Loyalists during the Revolutionary war. The grandfather of our subject, John Summers, was born in Virginia, but in an early day removed to Kentucky, where he was among the brave pioneers. His son, Henry L., the father of our subject, was born in that State in 1824, was married in Missouri to Miss Mary Olive Samuel, a native of Tennessee, and they had seven children. Although of Southern birth, Mr. Summers was a Union man during the late war. His death occurred in 1861, from the effects of a severe cold. His wife is still living, aged sixty-two years.

John A., their eldest child, received his education in the public schools of his native State. At the age of eighteen years he began learning the blacksmith's trade, and two years afterward made the journey to Montana. He came by rail to Corinne, and walked the remainder of the distance, paying $10 for the privilege of joining a party, who carried his blankets for him. After arriving in this State Mr. Summers worked as a journeyman at Deer Lodge for three years, receiving $5 a day; next conducted a blacksmith shop at Blackfoot City two seasons; traveled through Oregon and California; in the following spring returned to Montana; conducted a shop at Missoula one year; followed that occupation in Corvallis from 1875 until 1883; and in the latter year came to what is now the town of Grantsdale. Mr. Summers purchased 480 acres of his present farm, and has since been successfully engaged in raising, buying and selling cattle. He has dise was forwarded to Bannack, Montana, and sold "like hot cakes" at prices ranging from one to four ounces, according to "sex, age and condition of servitude." It is told on good authority that in a cabin where a cat was kept, the men, on rising from the table, no longer turned down their tin plates in preparation for the next meal. But do not misunderstand me. The cat was there to catch mice, not to polish up the new tin plates with a little red napkin.

And oh, the rats, mice, vermin of all conceivable sorts in the mines! This spring—1863—two of my former schoolmates who had been with me in Idaho, John Thompson and Jeff Blevins, set out from Eugene, Oregon, with a wagon load of cats. Their cage was capsized in the Tembi pass at great loss of cats; and packers and teamsters passing that way for a long time told wild stories of weird Indian cries at night in that region; but a woman went out one day with her children and quite a string of cats followed her home, and the strange weird screams were heard no more. Thompson and Blevins told me they sold their cats as fast as they could hand them out, at from $10 to $75 each, according to sex, color, condition and former degree of servitude.—From the Journal of my Brother, John D. Miller.

And didn't the man wash his hands before he mixed the dough? Don't be inquisitive. Miners nearly all had long beards, and they had to wash their faces to get the bread-crumbs added to his original purchase until he now owns 800 acres, on which, in 1888, he erected a beautiful and commodious residence.

Mr. Summers was married January 6, 1878, to Miss Judie Chaffin, a daughter of Elijah Chaffin. She was born near Fort Scott, Kansas, and came with her parents to Montana in 1864. To this union have been born six children—Mary M. (deceased at the age of three years), Viola Inez, Maggie F., Nettie Edith, Frederick and Herbert L. Mr. Summers has been a stanch, lifelong Republican, and while at Corvallis he received the appointment of Postmaster from President Arthur, which position he held three years, or until his removal from the town. He is a Master Mason and a strong temperance man.

HON. ROBERT T. WING, a Montana pioneer of 1863 and one of Dillon's most prominent business men, is of old English ancestry. His forefathers were early settlers of New England, and for many generations residents of the State of Massachusetts, where his father, George Wing, was born, in 1797, and where he was married to Miss Deborah Russell, of his own town. They had a family of five children. His death occurred in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He had been a ship-owner and a whaler, and in religion was a Quaker. His wife survived him and lived to be eighty years of age.

Robert T. was the youngest of the family. He was born in Yarmouth, October 19, 1837, was educated in the public schools of New Bedford, and when fifteen years of age began his business career as a clerk in a dry-goods and clothing store. Then he learned the heating and plumbing business in New York city, and from there in the spring of 1860 crossed the plains to Pike's Peak, where he prospected for a time, after which he purchased an interest in a claim in California Gulch. He mined for a year in California Gulch, and during that time took out considerable gold. We next find him at Buckskin Jo Gulch, near Leadville, where he continued to mine until 1833, when he came with mule teams to Alder Gulch. There he was successfully engaged in mining for two years. Nearly all the excitement over the road agents occurred while he was there. He joined the Vigilantes and did his share toward ridding the Territory of the nefarious characters who had murdered and robbed the miners. During those two years eight of the desperadoes were hung. In 1865 he went to the Black-foot country, and was among the first to arrive there. He secured a claim and mined one season. His claim in Virginia City he sold for $1,000, and soon after the party to whom he sold it took out $1,700. From the Blackfoot country he returned to his home in the East, where he spent the winter. The following year he came back to Montana and engaged in silver mining at Argenta, in Beaver Head county, and spent considerable money in improvements and prospecting up to the fall of 1880. In 1881 he was elected on the Republican ticket to fill the office of Probate Judge, and served acceptably two years. Following that term he was elected Treasurer of the county, of which office he was the incumbent four years. In 1889 he was elected a member of the first State Legislature, of which he was an active and efficient member, serving on a number of important committees.

In 1888 Mr. Wing had purchased an interest in Mr. George W. Dart's hardware business. They organized a stock company with $20,000 capital, have since continued the business, and are to-day the leading hardware merchants of Dillon, doing a large and remunerative business. Their trade extends throughout their own and Madison and Jefferson counties, and also into the State of Idaho. Mr. George W. Dart was the founder of this establishment, and had by a most honorable course in business built up a large trade, which is now handled by the new firm. These gentlemen own a section of land, on which they raise large crops of hay and oats. They were among the organizers and stockholders in the Beaver Head Canal Company, which company has brought water from the Beaver Head river and irrigated eight and the bacon-grease and the black tea out of their beards; and so you see they nearly all washed their faces, and of course their hands, too, when through with their meal.

Supper through with, one by one they pushed back, rose up—and how tall they were, how long their legs, arms, bodies—and drew a long breath. The silence was broken by a sly joke or two as each man slowly dug down into his pocket and dug up a piece of black "nigger heel." Watch him! The greasy sheath knife is wiped on the boot-leg or the rear flank of the "duck" breeches, the tobacco is whittled off slowly, the knife restored to its place, and then slowly the crumbling tobacco is ground to dust in the heels of the palms and carefully fingered into the bowl of the pipe, pressed hard in place with the thumb, a coal of fire added and—puff, puff, puff! What would the gold miner here, aye, anywhere, from San Diego to Cariboo, have done without his pipe?

One by one they saunter out and down to the store. Nail kegs, cracker boxes, even the counter, are all crowded like a chicken roost, and there is no more silence. Gossip? No: gold! It seems as if it might be no later than the sixth day in this new world, and the woman is not yet made.

sections of land. This enterprise cost $17,000. In all the enterprises intended to advance the welfare of the city they have taken an active part, and for their enterprise, their public spirit and their generosity they are justly ranked with the best of Dillon's citizens.

Mr. Wing is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and is Junior Warden of the lodge at Dillon. He is also Secretary of the Pioneer Society of Beaver Head county, which he helped to organize.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BUTTE CITY, Montana, is one of the most substantial financial institutions of the State.

This bank was opened for business December 21, 1881, by A. J. Davis, Sr., J. A. Talbott and S. T. Hauser, with a capital stock of $100,000, and with officers as follows: A. J. Davis, Sr., president; S. T. Hauser, vice president; and Charles L. Dahler, cashier. In 1882 Joseph A. Hyde became cashier. A. J. Davis, Sr., purchased Mr. Hauser's interest in the bank in 1884, and before his death, which occurred March 11, 1890, he presented his bank stock to his nephew, A. J. Davis, Jr., who had for some time been connected with the institution. Thus the principal part of the bank stock passed into the hands of the younger Davis, who became cashier and who is still acting in that capacity. The present officers of the bank are: Judge Knowles, president; James A. Talbott, vice president; and A. J. Davis, cashier. From the time the senior Mr. Davis acquired a controlling interest in this institution up to the present it has met with continued and increasing prosperity. It sells exchange on other banks in all parts of the world and does a general banking business. Further mention of the president and other officers will be found elsewhere in this work.

A. J. DAVIS, cashier and principal stockholder of the First National Bank of Butte City, Montana, dates his birth in Rockford, Illinois, December 3, 1863.

He is a son of John A. and Theah J. (Boyd) Davis. His father was for many years engaged in selling goods in Chicago and other places, their home being in Chicago. He died in 1893. His widow is still living and a resident of that city, she being now sixty-one years of age. The subject of this sketch, Andrew Jackson Davis, was their fourth son, their family being composed of seven sons and one daughter, all of whom are living except one son and the daughter.

Mr. Davis in very early life showed a disposition to make something and to take care of himself. While attending the public schools of Chicago he spent his mornings and evenings in work in stores and later in the Times office, and in this way paid his own way. His uncle, A. J. Davis, who had named the child after himself, and who had always taken an interest in him, admired his pluck and kindly offered to defray his expenses through business college. The offer was thankfully accepted and young Davis entered upon a course in the evening session of Bryant and Stratton's Business College, Chicago, and made the best of his opportunities. In 1882, after having completed his course in this college, he came to Butte City, Montana. At that time he was nineteen years of age. Here his uncle gave him a position as clerk and collector in the First National Bank of Butte, and in this position he performed his duty with the strictest fidelity and proved himself worthy of promotion. In 1884 when the senior Mr. Davis obtained entire control of the bank the nephew was promoted to assistant cashier, and in 1887 he was made cashier, which office he still retains. A short before his uncle died the latter gave to our subject ninety-five percent. of his $100,000 bank stock, and thus the cashier became the principal stockholder of the bank.

From the above it will be seen that Mr. Davis has been identified with the banking interests of Butte City ever since he arrived here. His gentlemanly bearing, his strict attention to business and his honorable and upright dealings not only gained for him the love and handsome gift from his uncle, but they have also proved to his business associates and to all who know him that he is in Such was the genial, plain, simple and unromantic miner, habits and heart. The unreal miner, the miner of romance, of story books, was quite another creature; and he had quite another place to spend the evening—the saloon. But the one which I have been in duty bound to describe here is the only real one. I beg you to bear this truth in mind from title page to calophon. Rarely indeed did a real miner haunt the saloon or lower resorts that follow in his wake. True, he sometimes saw these places, knew them as an intelligent man should know his environment; he was strong enough in his own sense of integrity not to fear them, but he did not court them—had little or no business there. And so let it be repeated and remembered that the real miner of Montana was, as a rule, not to be found anywhere, day or night, save in the path of duty.

F. H. Carter

As a fair sample of the early men of Montana, their soberness, culture, capacity to attend to their own business, and above all their endurance and dauntless courage, I quote here the journal of James Stuart, one of the discoverers of gold in Montana, and the first Sheriff. The manuscript is retained as one of the most sacred things in the archives of the Historical Society of Montana, and is published at length in the every way worthy of all that his uncle bestowed upon him. Under his management the bank continues to do a large business, holding rank with the leading financial institutions of the State.

Mr. Davis was married in October, 1890, to Miss Helen M. Gaylord, a native of Waterbury, Connecticut, and a daughter of J. E. Gaylord, now a resident of Butte City and manager of the Parrot Silver and Mining property. Mr. and Mrs. Davis have two children, Andrew Jackson and Grace Theah. Mrs. Davis is a member and communicant of the Episcopal Church. In politics he is a Democrat and fraternally he is a Master Mason. They are among the most highly esteemed people of the city and occupy one of its delightful homes.

THOMAS H. CARTER, of Helena, was born in Scioto county, Ohio, October 30, 1854. He received a common-school education in Illinois. His early life was spent on a farm. He engaged in railroad work later, and from that went to school teaching. While engaged in that profession he studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He had located in Burlington, Iowa, but, not finding that field of opportunity which his energy demanded, he moved westward and came to Helena in 1882. Upon his arrival in Helena he immediately entered upon the practice of the law. He became associated with John B. Clayberg, and this partnership was continued for some years, the firm of Carter & Clayberg becoming one of the most successful legal firms in the State.

In 1888 Mr. Carter was selected by the Republican convention of Montana as its standard-bearer in the Congressional campaign. Montana was then a Territory. It had elected a Republican delegate to Congress but once in its history, in 1871. Hon. W. A. Clark, of Butte City was Mr. Carter's opponent in this contest, one of the most memorable in the history of the politics of the State. Mr. Carter was elected by a majority of 5,126 votes over his opponent. In the following year Montana was admitted into the Union, and the office of Territorial delegate expired with the birth of the new State. Mr. Carter was again called to lead his party, this time as a candidate for full Congressional honors. He was again elected, defeating Hon. Martin Maginnis, the Democratic candidate, by 1,648 votes. He was the last delegate of the Territory and the first Representative of the State of Montana in the national House of Representatives.

Mr. Carter gained a national reputation in the Fifty-first Congress by his indefatigable work upon the floor of the House, and by those qualities of leadership which became manifest from the moment he entered the sphere of political action. His tireless efforts, and able appeals to the committees of the House in behalf of the various interests of his State, soon gave him a foremost place among the men who commanded the respect and confidence of that body. His executive ability was so clearly recognized that he was chosen secretary of the Republican Congressional committee during the campaign of 1890.

While engaged in his duties as secretary of this committee, the Republican party of Montana assembled in convention at Butte City, and for the third time nominated Mr. Carter as their candidate for Congress. This was done against his advice and contrary to his wishes; but he promptly suspended his work in Washington and returned to his district to assume for the third time in two years the brunt of political conflict. The Democratic party had in the meantime nominated Hon. W. W. Dixon, of Butte City as Mr. Carter's opponent, and after an exciting contest Mr. Carter was defeated by a close majority.

Upon the expiration of his term in Congress, in the spring of 1891, Mr. Carter was appointed, by President Harrison, Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington. His appointment was received with universal satisfaction throughout the West. The duties of the Commissioner of the General Land Office are clearly allied with the interests of the people of the West, and first volume issued by that most laudable association. The following is from his record of the Yellowstone expedition, which he commanded early in 1863:

"Thursday, April 9, 1863.—Our party started from Bannack City for the Fifteen-mile creek (now known as Rattlesnake creek), in squads of two and three. As soon as a man got ready he started for camp on said creek. I arrived there at 10 P. M., and found only nine men all told. We concluded to remain in camp to-morrow, so that we could get all the party together; then we will organize and start in good order. At the time I left town the inhabitants were nearly all the worse for their experiments with old Jim Gammell's minie-rifle whisky. Did not have either horse or night guard, for there are no Indians in this vicinity now. Traveled fifteen miles.

"10th.—Organized our company in the forenoon while waiting for some of the men to find their horses. The form of organization adopted was as follows: 'Having determined to explore a portion of the country drained by the "Yellowstone," for the purpose of discovering gold mines and securing town sites, and believing this object could be better accomplished by forming ourselves into a regularly organized its affairs are best administered by an official who is in touch with them—who knows their needs and necessities, and who can, by a practical knowledge of their condition, apply the law with enlightened exactness in whatever attitude their concerns approach judicial determination. Mr. Carter fulfilled these personal requirements admirably, evoking the commendation of friend and foe alike. His decisions were eminently wise, just and liberal. He left the office with a record which added fresh laurels to his fast-ripening fame as a public man.

Mr. Carter took a prominent position in the Republican national convention of 1892 as manager of the forces favorable to the renomination of General Harrison, whose confidence, in a large degree, he possessed. Shortly afterward he was elected chairman of the Republican national committee, which position he now holds. He resigned the Commissionership of the General Land Office for the purpose of devoting his time to the conduct of the national campaign of 1892.

After the election in November, 1892, he returned to Montana and resumed the practice of law. In addition to his law practice, he is interested in mining, real estate and banking operations.

Mr. Carter's rise as a lawyer and as a public character of prominence has been phenomenal. He was achieving marked success in his profession when called to the field of politics in 1888. From that time onward, his participation in State and national affairs has developed in him a high order of statecraft, and gained for him a reputation as a writer, orator, and leader of party organization and sentiment such as is rarely given to men of such brief prominence in public affairs. He is fertile in expedient, and meets every occasion with a full measure of equality. His originality, condensation, and force of expression, his active, aggressive, and sanguine temperament; his powers of physical endurance; his tact, sagacity and judgment; and his cordial and unaffected intercourse with men, are the instrumental factors of his success in public life. As a lawyer Mr. Carter is in the forefront of his profession.

Mr. Carter married in 1886, Miss Nellie L. Galen. They have two children, both boys.

J. FRED LOEBER, the pioneer butcher and meat-market man of Butte City, is a native of Germany, born in 1840. His father was a farmer and dealer in horses.

Mr. Loeber was brought up and educated in his native land and learned his trade there. In his twenty-second year he came to America, first stopping at Frankfort, Nebraska, and forming a partnership there; but the crops were destroyed by the grasshoppers and he removed to Sioux City, Iowa, and obtained employment in the War Eagle House. April 27, 1865, he enlisted in the Omaha Volunteers, under Col. James Sawyer, and served on the plains keeping the Indians straight and making a road across the country from Sioux City, Iowa, to Virginia City, Montana. On arriving at the latter place his company was disbanded, and he went to the Blackfoot country and engaged in driving stage to Deer Lodge and return for about seven months. Next he obtained a position in a meat-market at Blackfoot, which he filled for eighteen months. Then, going to Deer Lodge, he was employed in driving cattle from Deer Lodge valley to Deer Lodge, Blackfoot, Pioneer and Helena. At Pioneer, in the spring of 1869, he engaged in butchering, in partnership with Conrad Kohrs, and continued in this business four years. Next he engaged in placer mining at Yam Hill, and then in quartz mining at the Bismarck hill, sixteen miles from Helena, for three years, but without success, and left there "broke."

Coming then to Butte City, he engaged in his trade of butchering and in dealing in live stock. Prosperity came to him, and he continued in the business until 1882, at which time he retired.

In 1876 he built the Butte meat-market, in 1877 the California brewery, and since then the Loeber block on East Granite street, and for himself a good residence.

company, we hereby appoint James Stuart captain, agreeing upon our word of honor to obey all orders given or issued by him or any subordinate officer appointed by him. In case of any member refusing to obey an order or orders from said captain, he shall be forcibly expelled from our camp. It is further understood and agreed, that we all do our equal portion of work, the captain being umpire in all cases, sharing equally the benefits of said labor both as to the discovery of gold and securing town sites. (Signed) James Stuart, Cyrus D. Watkins, John Vanderbilt, James N. York, Richard McCafferty, James Hauxhurst, Drewyer Underwood, Samuel T. Hauser, Henry A. Bell, William Roach, A. Sterne Blake, George H. Smith, Henry T. Geery, Ephraim Bostwick.' The fifteenth man, George Ives, did not sign the agreement, because he did not overtake the party until next day, when it seems to have been forgotten. In the afternoon I had to go to Burr's ranch, on Big Hole river, after my roan horse. The rest of the party will wait until morning, to give the rear guard a chance to overtake us.

"11th.—I stayed at Burr's last night. Blake also came there about dark. This morning he and I left Burr's and met the train about noon.

He has also two silver and copper mines in the Fourth-of-July district,—the Four Johns and the King Solomon. Since 1882 he has been retired from active business, living comfortably on his income from rents and interest.

In 1872 he was first initiated into the mysteries of Freemasonry, in Deer Lodge, and was raised to higher degrees in Butte City; he is a Knight Templar and initiated into the Temple of the Mystic Shrine. He has held the office of Junior Warden in the Blue Lodge and that of King in the Chapter. In 1887 he became a member of the Territorial Militia, and was Captain of Company F. When the regiment was organized he was elected its Quartermaster, in which office he has served up to the present time. He has also been president of the Liederkranz, a German singing society in Butte, and in 1886 he organized an expedition for them to the National Park. About thirty individuals comprised the expedition, which was under his direct management and supervision; they were absent about five weeks, enjoying a good time. Dr. W. H. Dudley accompanied the expedition as its physician, and after their return he edited and Mr. Loeber published, in book form, an account of their trip. It is entitled "The National Park, from the Hurricane Deck of a Cayuse," is dedicated to the members of the Liederkranz and is a very interesting book. The publication of this little book is one of the evidences of the liberal and public spirit possessed by Mr. Loeber.

All his life Mr. Loeber has been a Republican. He has served in the Common Council two years. He is a man of liberal impulses and is generous to a fault, and is well known to most of the pioneers of Montana.

June 18, 1882, he married Elizabeth Otto.

ALEXANDER METZEL, a pioneer of 1863 to Montana, and now owning one of the finest stock ranches in the State at Puller Springs, Madison county, is a native of York, Pennsylvania; born on the 14th of January, 1835, of German ancestry on his father's side and of English on his mother's. His father, Thomas A. Metzel, also a native of Pennsylvania, married Miss Hannah Mathews, and they continued to reside in York until their death. They owned and conducted the Metzel House there for many years. He died in 1858 in the sixty-second year of his age, and she lived to be eighty years old, departing this life in 1893. Mr. Metzel was married twice; by his first wife he had six children and by the second, eight. Only five of the family now survive.

Alexander, a member of the second family, was reared at his home in York until 1857, attending the common school and afterward learning the butcher's trade. In 1857, the year before his father died, he went to Iowa City, Iowa, and was employed there at $15 a month until 1860, and then crossed the plains to Pike's Peak. He carried on the butcher's business at Denver for several months, returned to Iowa City and proceeded on to Rock Island, where he obtained work as trimmer in a packing house. Returning to Iowa City again, he purchased teams and took the family of his employer, who was then at Denver, across the plains to that city in the spring of 1861, and was employed there until the following winter.

Then he returned to Iowa and at Indianola married Miss Anna Spicer, a native of Pennsylvania. Soon afterward he started with his bride across the plains to Denver, where he was re-employed by the same man he had been working for during the preceding season.

In 1863 he came to Montana and engaged in the butchering business at Nevada City, near Alder Gulch. July 15, 1864, having seen much of the good work done by the "vigilantes," and having participated with them to some extent, he returned to Denver for his wife, whom he had left there, and on arriving there he concluded to remain awhile. He had a stock of 200 head of cows, which, by the cold of the preceding winter, had been reduced to four head. As a reminiscence of his work in Montana there he states that he bought and dressed the first hog that was killed there, which cost 75 cents a pound when dressed, and it weighed 300 pounds. He sold it at a del

We camped for the night on Big Hole river, below the 'Backbone.' George Smith's horse gave out and was left five miles from camp. Johnny Campbell, with a party from the Three Forks of the Missouri, camped near us. He saw Worden, Powell and others, from the west side, start down the river from Fort Benton. I killed a wolf and two geese to-day. Weather nearly clear, light wind and pleasant. The rear guard (George Ives) reached camp from Bannack City a little after dark. Traveled twenty-three miles.

"Sunday, April 12th.—We had a guard last night for the first time; it seemed like old times to have to stand guard. Early this morning Ives and Smith went to the Campbell party's camp and traded Smith's exhausted horse for a colt. We boiled our geese all night and tried to eat them for breakfast, but they were too tough. Had to leave them for the coyotes. I broke a white-tailed deer's leg, but lost it in the bush. I also shot at and missed a goose. Cloudy, with showers of rain. No frost last night. Passed two creeks that come into Stinking Water river from the north, and camped on the third one. They are all about the same size, having three or four sluice-heads of water in each. Traveled twenty-five miles.

lar a pound. He made a considerable proportion of it into sausage, which was mixed with beef and sold at $1 per pound.

Next Mr. Metzel returned to Nevada City and engaged in his trade there until 1872, and then moved to his present location at Puller Springs, fifteen miles southeast of Virginia City, where he now has 6,000 acres of land, with large and capacious buildings and everything necessary for conducting a first-class stock farm. On this property he raises large quantities of oats and cuts from 600 to 800 tons of hay annually. He has the credit of being the first Montana stockman to import thoroughbred Durham cattle. His first importation was from Kentucky in the spring of 1871, and since then he has done a large business in supplying the farmers throughout the State with that class of animals. He now has 200 head of this stock, pedigreed. His enterprise in this direction has been of great value in improving the cattle of Montana. He has also been largely engaged in the breeding of fine horses. He raised the dam of the fastest horse bred in the State, namely, Frank Quirk: record, 2:12½. He was by Defiance. Mr. Metzel now has a band of 1,000 horses, comprising some splendid specimens of both draft and trotting horses, and 6,000 head of grade range cattle.

During the administration of President Grant Mr. Metzel was appointed Postmaster of Puller Springs, and he has held that office ever since. He is a Republican. He has also served his county four years as Commissioner, and in 1893 his party gave him the nomination of State Representative; and, notwithstanding that he persistently endeavored to have his declination of the office accepted, and the further fact that he did no electioneering, he was elected, receiving votes far ahead of his ticket, and he is now representing his county in the State Legislative Assembly. September 1, 1894, he was enthusiastically and unanimously renominated for the same office. For a number of years also he has been appointed by the Governor of the State a member of the County Board of Stock Commissioners. Mr. Metzel is a man of large experience and executive ability, full of "vim" and business enterprise. As a member of the Legislature he has secured the erection of the Orphans' Home in this county, at Twin Bridges, and has procured the enactment of two useful laws relating to live stock. He seems to be in the prime of life, and is a fair representative of the Montana pioneer of 1863.

He has six children, namely: Frank S., born in Colorado and now in the sawmill business and a member of the stock company which his father organized by giving each of his sons a thousand head of calves, each head being considered a share of the stock. The father remains president and the enterprise has proven a great success. The next son, Charles Montana, was one of the first white boys born in the Territory; he is now at Livingston engaged in the butchering business. Thomas A. is a stock broker, having offices in Chicago and New York. The two younger sons, William O. and Lewis Albert, are at home with their father in the stock business; and one daughter, Clara May, died January 26, 1880.

Mrs. Metzel, the beloved wife and kind and indulgent mother, died on the 9th of May, 1878, and her husband speaks of her as the noblest of women, and as such she was most highly esteemed by all who knew her. Since her death Mr. Metzel has remained single.

DUNCAN HUNTER, a business man of Helena, was born in Scotland July 3, 1863, and received his early education in Scotland and England. In 1882 he emigrated to America and located in Dakota, where he remained two years, coming from there in 1884 to Montana and taking up his abode at Three Forks. There, with others, he was the owner of a ranch of 6,000 acres and was engaged extensively in the stock business, making a specialty of fine cattle. He was one of the founders of the town of Three Forks. In 1889 he sold his interests there and came to Helena, at once becoming connected with the Equitable

Louis Simmons and party were to have met us at the mouth of the Stinking Water, but we can find no trace of them; they have failed from some cause to us unknown. Granville Stuart explains the absence of Simmons thus: This party consisted of Louis Simmons, William Fairweather, George Orr, Thomas Cover, Barney Hughes and Henry Edgar. They were detained by not being able to find their horses, which had wintered in Deer Lodge. They arrived at the appointed place of rendezvous some three or four days after the main party had passed, and taking their trail followed on, expecting to soon overtake them; but before they did so they were met on the upper Yellowstone by a large party of Crow Indians, who at once proceeded to plunder them, taking nearly all they had, and, giving them miserable, sore-backed ponies in exchange for their horses, ordered them to return on pain of death. Situated as they were, they could only comply, and started on their way back with many misgivings as to the fate of the main party, and curses both loud and deep against the Crows. And yet this vexatious outrage was the most fortunate thing that could have occurred for their own interest and that of the Territory, for on their way back to Bannack City they went one day's travel up

Life Insurance Company of New York. The first year he was here the business was managed by Burt & Hunter, but after that Mr. Hunter became sole manager of the company's affairs in Montana. He resigned from the Equitable in September, 1893.

Mr. Hunter is also interested in mining and in Helena real estate and farm lands. In politics he is Republican; is a member of the Montana Club and of the Masonic fraternity, including the blue lodge, chapter, commandry and council, and he is also a Shriner.

January 24, 1893, he was married to Miss Abby Lippitt, the daughter of the late Governor Lippitt, of Providence, Rhode Island.

Myron Lockwood, a successful farmer of the Bitter Root valley, was born in St. Lawrence county, New York, January 8, 1841. His grandfather, William Lockwood, was a native of England, and after emigrating to America settled on Long Island. He married Miss Percy Powers. Mr. Lockwood was a soldier in the war of 1812. His son, Ai P. Lockwood, was born in St. Lawrence county, New York, was there married to Miss Sophia Wright, also a native of that county, and they had ten children. The three surviving children reside in Montana. The parents spent their entire lives in St. Lawrence county, and were active members of the Methodist Church.

Myron Lockwood, the fifth child in order of birth, was reared to manhood at his native place and attended the winter schools. When the great civil war burst upon the country, and President Lincoln made his call for volunteers, he tendered his services, and in September, 1861, was enrolled in Company F, Fifth Vermont Volunteer Infantry. He served under Generals McClellan, Burnside, Hooker, Meade and Grant. At the expiration of his term of enlistment, Mr. Lockwood re-enlisted as a veteran, served until the close of the struggle, and participated in twenty-eight of the hard-fought battles of the war, in many of which the army covered itself with glory and rendered the country an inestimable service.

At the battle of the Wilderness Mr. Lockwood received a shot in his right thigh, which disabled him for five months, and he was afterward wounded in the left thigh. He entered the service as a private and was promoted to the position of First Sergeant. After the surrender of General Lee's army he went to Washington and participated in the grand review of the victorious army.

After his re-enlistment in 1864, Mr. Lockwood was given a furlough and returned home, and January 6 of that year was united in marriage with Miss Amanda P. Gordon, a native of Russell, New York, and a daughter of William R. Gordon, of Scotch ancestry. In 1867 our subject and wife left Marshalltown, Iowa, for Council Bluffs, and in the following spring came up the Missouri river to Montana. They spent two months in making the journey to Fort Benton, and came with ox teams from that place to Helena. They passed large herds of buffalo on the road and were much annoyed with the Sioux Indians.

After his arrival in Helena Mr. Lockwood secured work at $125 per month, and during the winters followed mining at Iowa Gulch with good success. Next, with a partner, he was engaged in making cheese and butter at American Bar. During one season they made as high as $1,700, but the entire amount was gambled away in a single day by his partner. He afterward mined across the Missouri river. While there the Indians drove his wife from home and he returned to find the house empty, the red skins having robbed them of nearly everything they possessed. Mr. Lockwood next went to the Cedar creek stampede, passing over the mountains on what is now the Mullen road, and they paid as high as $20 apiece for their passage, but, on account of the deep snow, were obliged to walk the entire distance. They spent six weeks on the road and suffered many hardships.

After returning from this expedition Mr. Lockwood rented land at Frenchtown, where he engaged in farming, butter and cheese making, and freighting. In 1874 the Madison river, above where they had struck it as they went out, and crossing through a low gap to the southwest, 'they camped at noon on a small creek. While his comrades were cooking a scanty meal, Fairweather, on going out to look after the few broken-down ponies the Indians had given in compulsory exchange for their good horses, observed a point of bare bedrock projecting from the side of the gulch, and determined to try a pan of dirt. He was astonished by obtaining 30 cents in beautiful coarse gold, and in a few more trials he got $1.75 to the pan. This was at the point afterward famous as Fairweather's discovery claim in Alder Gulch. Believing the locality would prove rich, they proceeded to stake off claims, and Hughes was sent to Bannack for provisions and friends; and on his arrival there, in spite of his efforts to keep the matter a secret, it became known that rich diggings had been struck somewhere, and a close watch was kept on Hughes, and when he started he was followed by some 200 men. About the present site of Daley's ranch, on the Stinking Water, Hughes refused to go farther until morning, and the party encamped; but during the night he appointed a rendezvous for his particular friends, whom he escorted into the mines in the night. In the morning the remainder of the party followed his trail into camp, and Fairweather district, with Dr. Steele as president, and James Fergus as recorder, was organized on the 6th of June, 1863. Further prospecting of the gulch developed an alluvial deposit of gold exceeding in richness and extent the most sanguine hopes of the discoverers, and perhaps combining these two qualities in a greater degree than any other discovery ever made.' (Thus it will be seen that James Stuart's expedition was the direct cause of the discovery of Alder Gulch, and the consequent rapid development of the Territory.)

"13th.—As one of our party was returning from hunting about 9 o'clock last night, he stampeded all the horses, and four or five broke their picket ropes, but were finally overtaken and secured. It had one good effect—it showed the party the necessity of keeping strict guard over the animals. It snowed a little on us during the night. To-day we crossed two small creeks and camped on the third one, near the divide between Stinking Water and Madison river. Road not very good. Saw three elk to-day. Blake saw elk and sheep last evening, but could not get a shot. Camped at 1 P. M.

they came to the Bitter Root valley, farmed on rented land during the first three years and then purchased a ranch on Rye creek. In 1877 the Indians made another of their murderous raids and they were obliged to flee for their lives. At that time Mr. Lockwood was asked to guide General Gibbon's volunteer militia over the mountains and soon afterward, on August 9, the Big Hole battle was fought. They approached the Indians, skirmishes were deployed, and every fourth man was ordered back to take care of the horses. In the first volley Mr. Lockwood's brother, Almond J., was killed. At the close of the day the troops fell back to a pine grove. Our subject was wounded in the right hip and left thigh, and was taken to Deer Lodge hospital, where he remained disabled eight months. Those wounds caused him to be a cripple for life.

After his recovery Mr. Lockwood resumed farming, but, learning that the Indians intended making another raid, the settlers escaped the day before they arrived and their savings were again wiped out. Soon afterward he sold his land and purchased property at Corvallis, where he received the appointment of guard at the penitentiary, under Hon. A. C. Botkin, and served in that capacity four years. During that time Mr. Lockwood purchased 320 acres of land on which he now resides, located one and a half miles north of Corvallis, but has since given 110 acres of that tract to his son.

Mr. and Mrs. Lockwood have had the following children: Frank M., born at Helena, October 27, 1867; Walter A., born March 25, 1869, died March 31, 1869; Dexter G., born March 19, 1871; William R., born August 20, 1872; Mable Alice, born August 14, 1874; Lucy C., born June 27, 1877, died December 4 of the same year; and Maud S., born January 22, 1873.

Mr. Lockwood is a Republican in political matters, and socially is a member of the A. O. U. W. and the G. A. R.

to-day, and after dinner I went to the top of the divide, about five miles from camp. There is a beautiful valley on the Madison, about twenty-five miles long and ten wide. From the divide it looks very much like Indian valley, near the Big Meadows, on the north fork of Feather river in California. The chain of mountains on the east side of the valley has two high peaks; the southern one is like a tall dome of a church, with regular terraces or steps from the base to the top. The river cañons are at the lower end of the valley. While on the divide I saw a band of either horses, elk or buffalo in the valley. The country from the Stinking Water to the divide is very broken, with deep ravines, with plenty of lodes of white quartz from one to ten feet wide. In this camp Geery and McCafferty got a splendid prospect on a high bar, but we did not tell the rest of the party for fear of breaking up the expedition. 'This prospect,' says Granville Stuart, 'was on a fork of Alder Gulch, called Granite creek; and if Fairweather and his party had not discovered the mines in Alder Gulch, it is certain that they would have been discovered by Stuart's party when they returned, for it was their intention

AARON H. NELSON, senior member of the law firm of Nelson & Settles, Helena, Montana, was born in Richmond, Virginia, August 4, 1838. Of his ancestry and life the following is the record:

Aaron H. Nelson traces his paternal ancestry back to William Nelson, of Plymouth, England, who, with his wife Martha, nee Foard, came to this country in 1621 in the ship Fortune. His great-great-grandson, Thomas Nelson, of Middleborough, Massachusetts, had three sons,—Job, Thomas and Stephen,—the first a lawyer, the second a doctor, and the third a Baptist minister. Stephen was the father of William F. Nelson, who was the father of the subject of this sketch. William F. Nelson, after being graduated at Brown University and Newton Theological Seminary, was ordained a Baptist minister and became one of the professors in the Baptist college at Richmond, Virginia. In 1835 he married Susannah Hayden, a native of Eastport, Maine, and a direct descendant of that John Alden who has been so beautifully immortalized by Longfellow in his "Courtship of Miles Standish."

William F. Nelson and Susannah Hayden had two children, a son and a daughter, the former, Aaron H., being the only survivor of the family, the father having died in 1875, at the age of sixty-nine years, the mother in 1877 at the age of sixty-four years, and the sister, Emma G., in 1888, at the age of forty-eight years.

Aaron H. Nelson prepared for college at the academy in Deerfield, Massachusetts, and in 1854 entered Amherst College, but in his sophomore year he removed to Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, where he was graduated with the degree of M. A. in the class of 1858.

In 1860 he was admitted to the bar at Hastings, Minnesota, but in 1863 entered the United States navy as Paymaster, serving continuously in that capacity through the war of the Rebellion and until January 1, 1872, when he resigned his commission. From that time until 1880 he was engaged in business in New Orleans. In 1881 he entered the General Land Office at Washington, District of Columbia, and there remained for eight years. In 1889 he was admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States, and in June of that year resigned his position in the Land Office and removed to Montana, where he has since been engaged in the practice of his profession, making land and mining law a specialty.

October 24, 1872, Mr. Nelson married Miss Anna L. Berry, a native of Massachusetts and a daughter of Seth and Mary (Simpson) Berry, of Bangor, Maine. Mr. and Mrs. Nelson had four children, two of whom are living, Jessie Louisa and Harold Hayden. Mrs. Nelson died at Helena, Montana, November 21, 1891.

Of a continuous line of Baptist ancestry, Mr. Nelson has been from his twentieth year an active member of that church. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and continuously, since his removal to Montana, has been the secretary of the Montana Bar Association. Politically he is a Democrat of the Grover Cleveland stripe, having ever since his residence in Montana been zealous, both on the stump and through the press, in his advocacy of the distinctive principles of that party as expounded by that standard-bearer.

ROBERT STAVELY HAMILTON, a respected Montana pioneer of 1864, was born in county Antrim, Ireland, in 1839, a descendant of Scotch ancestry.

Mr. Hamilton came to America in 1852 to make his own way in the world, at that time being a boy of thirteen years. He first located at East Cambridge, Massachusetts, where he served an apprenticeship to the hardware business and where he resided until 1856. In the spring of that year he came west as far as Minnesota, first stopping at Minneapolis and soon afterward going to Little Falls. At the latter place he engaged in the hardware business on his own account. He was also Postmaster there during President Lincoln's administration. He had made some investments in real estate, but as property declined in value, and the town seemed dead, he closed out his business. He, however, retained his real estate there. From Little Falls he went to Henry county, Illinois, and March 23, 1864, was married to Miss Mary Agnes Fergus, daughter of James Fergus. Her father to thoroughly prospect that vicinity when they came back, and it was only a few miles from where Fairweather struck gold. As it was, when they got back Alder Gulch was full of miners, and all the interest centered there; but McCafferty and one or two others of the party went to the place, and tried it, but they said they could only get a prospect on the river rock, and abandoned it as worthless.'

"14th.—Followed up the creek we had been camped on, and when near the divide we met two Bannack Indians, the advance guard of the main camp, who were returning from their winter's buffalo hunt on the Yellowstone. They told us the camp was coming, and in a few minutes we met 'Arro-ka-kee,' alias 'Le Grand Coquin,' or 'The Big Rogue' (eminently appropriate, that name). This gentle savage only stood six and a half feet high in his moccasins, and weighed 275 pounds. He was accompanied by 'Saw-a-bee Win-an,' or the 'Standing Cottonwood,' who was a good Indian, although not dead, which I note as an exception to the general rule. They told us that if we would camp with them they would send back and get the 'Big Medicine' chief, Winnemucca, to camp on a little creek that they were following up to the divide. We agreed to it, and one went back to had come to Montana in 1862, with the Fisk expedition, and settled at Bannack. The rest of the family, mother, three daughters and a son, and Mr. Hamilton followed him soon afterward. Mr. Hamilton brought with him a set of tinner's tools and a small stock of hardware. He had two wagons and eight yoke of oxen and his mother-in-law also had a number of ox teams and wagons. That year the overland emigration was large. Mr. Hamilton and his party chose the route up the Platte by Bridger's cut-off to Virginia City. After leaving the Platte they lost a number of their oxen, their cattle dying from the effects of poison weed they had eaten along the way. As the emigrants were in such large numbers the Indians made no attempt to molest them.

After his arrival in Virginia City, Mr. Hamilton at once opened up his stock of goods and engaged in business. Prices were high and he made money on his hardware. From the first he became identified with the early history of the country, taking a hand with the law and order men of the State and doing his part to rid the country of the road agents and murderers who infested it at that time. He remained at Virginia City until 1870, when he sold out and came to Helena. Here for a time he was engaged in loaning money. In 1875 he returned to Little Falls, being accompanied on this trip by his family, and while there traded his Little Falls property for 225 head of cattle that were on the Madison. This was the commencement of his large cattle business, in which he has since continued. Although his operations have at times been attended with losses, his business has proved a success and has resulted in an ample fortune to him. To-day he is ranked with the wealthy men of Montana. His sons are with him in the business, and so large are the herds that roam over their broad acres that they scarcely know how many cattle they have. Mr. Hamilton has also bred a large number of horses, and is now giving special attention to the breeding of Norman-Percheron stock. For fifteen years Mr. Hamilton has been one of the directors of the First National Bank of Helena. While he has a nice home in the city of Helena, his lands and stock are in Fergus county, where he also has another fine home.

Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton have the following children, all born in Montana: Mary A., now the wife of Frank E. Hawksworth, resides in Helena; and Robert Emmet, Thomas Moore, and Robert S., Jr.

During his early history in this country, Mr. Hamilton was a strong Union man and a stanch Republican, but later in life he has been more independent in his political views, voting more for men than for party. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity.

FREDERICK HERMSMEYER, one of Sheridan's leading citizens, is a native of Prussia, Germany, born April 13, 1832, his parents being natives of that country.

The Hermsmeyers were a family of farmers and mechanics,—industrious and respected people. Frederick Hermsmeyer's father served in the German army during the war against Napoleon, and his sufferings in that campaign were such that the result was his death.

At the time of his father's death our subject was seven years old. He received his education in his native land and remained there until he was twenty years of age, at which time he emigrated to the United States, landing in New York and going from there to Cincinnati, where he had relatives. For a year and a half he worked at the carpenter's trade in Cincinnati. In 1854 he went to California, making the journey by way of the isthmus of Panama and landing at San Francisco sick with the Panama fever. After he recovered he began work at his trade there, and continued thus occupied for five years and a half. Then for some time he was engaged in mining at Goddy's bar in Sierra county. While he was successful in the mines and took out considerable gold, he had the misfortune to lose it in an enterprise that proved a failure. In 1860 he went to the State of Nevada and turned his attention to farming, making hay and meet the camp, while we moved slowly on, and I had the pleasure of riding about two miles with my 'waw-haw,' the Big Rogue. (Waw-haw, in the Snake tongue, means 'enemy,' and Stuart calls him this because of an old grudge we had against this huge rascal for instigating his followers to kill some of our cattle when we attempted to winter at the mouth of the Stinking Water, in 1860.) About half a mile from where they were pitching their camp, we met about forty warriors on horseback coming to meet and escort us into camp. On our arrival Winnemucca, the 'Big Medicine,' requested us to pitch our tents near his lodge. To humor him we did so. After we had unpacked he presented my mess with some elk meat, and in return asked for some tobacco to make a medicine smoke. I gave him a small piece, for I could not very well refuse after his present of meat, although our supply of the weed was very limited, and it was worth $15 per pound in Bannack City when we left. He then assembled his braves in two half circles parallel to each other and both facing the same way, and pasturing stock. After a residence of four years and a half in Nevada, he came to Montana, arriving in Alder Gulch on the 2d of July, 1866.

At Alder Gulch Mr. Hermsmeyer purchased a mining claim and for eight years he was successfully engaged in mining, during that time taking out about $80,000 in gold. His mining operations, however, were expensive. The next enterprise in which he embarked was sawmilling. Purchasing the third mill that was built in Montana, he remodeled it and ran it for ten years. This mill was located on Mill creek, six miles from Sheridan, and supplied the whole valley with lumber during the time he ran it. In 1890 he sold his mill, retired from the business, and came to Sheridan, where he invested in town property and began to aid in the upbuilding of the place. He purchased and improved a pleasant residence and also built the Ruby hotel, and in addition to dealing in real estate he is loaning money.

Mr. Hermsmeyer was married, in the spring of 1870, to Miss Minnie Willmire, a native of Germany and since 1866 a resident of Montana. They have two interesting daughters, Rosie and Annie. He and his wife are members of the Lutheran Church, and in politics he is a Democrat.

WILLIAM M. MCKENDRICK, the pioneer dry-goods merchant of Marysville, was born in New Brunswick, Canada, July 25, 1850. His father came to America from Aberdeen, Scotland, when a young man, locating in New Brunswick. He married Miss Elizabeth Collins, a native of that place, and both still reside in that country.

William McKendrick, the fourth in a family of ten children, was early inured to mercantile life in his father's store. In 1885 he came to Marysville, and immediately opened a store in a building 20 x 30 feet, with a stock of goods amounting to $1,500. His business proved a success from the beginning, and he now occupies a double brick store, with a $25,000 stock of dry goods, notions, clothing and boots and shoes. His store is located on the corner of First and Main streets. The dry-goods department is 36 x 50 feet, and the boot and shoe department 18 x 50 feet. The stock is large and well kept, and by honorable and liberal dealings Mr. McKendrick has secured a large trade and the reputation of being the leading merchant of the town. He is also interested in mining claims on Cruse Hill, near the great Drum Lumon mine, which has yielded $16,000,000 to the wealth of the world. As his claims are a continuation of this great mine it is reasonable to expect large returns when they are developed.

Mr. McKendrick was married August 24, 1886, to Miss J. F. Rawson, a native of Homersville, New York. Our subject has built a good residence in Marysville, also owns his store building, and takes a deep interest in the welfare of the town. In his social relations, he is a member of the A. O. U. W.

JOHN S. M. NEILL, real-estate dealer, Helena, Montana, and Surveyor General of Montana, was born at St. Paul, Minnesota, March 25, 1860, and removed with his parents to Philadelphia when two years of age, and during the war removed to Washington, District of Columbia. In 1869 he accompanied his parents to Dublin, Ireland, his father, Edward D. Neill, being appointed Consul at that point by President Grant. During his residence of three years on the Emerald Isle he attended the grammar schools of Dublin, and on returning to America entered the schools of Minneapolis, graduating at the high school in 1877, and afterward attending Delaware College at Newark, Delaware, where, in 1881, he graduated with the degree of B. A. He then went to Washington, District of Columbia, and entered the Columbia Law University, remaining there until the spring of 1883, when he came to Montana, locating in Helena, where he become bookkeeper for his brother, who was engaged in the lumber business. He afterward acted as business manager of the Helena Independent. Next, he engaged in the real-estate business with A. J. Steele for two years, but later conducted business for himself. Mr. Neill is a Democrat in politics, and was appointed by President Cleveland Surveyor General for the District of Montana May 28, 1894.

Mr. Neill was married in 1883 to Miss Margaret G. Evans, daughter of George G. Evans of Newark, Delaware. They have one son, George G. E. Neill.

they then proceeded to do some tall smoking and heavy sitting around, while we exchanged the latest news about war, horse-stealing, etc. They spun long yarns about what they had done during their buffalo hunt, and on my part I built some marvelous castles in the air about what we were going to do, how we would build towns, kill Indians, buffalo, etc., etc. When we separated for the night, I cautioned them about coming around where our horses were, after dark, explaining to them that we tied and guarded our horses to keep them from being stolen, and that in the night we did not know good Indians from bad ones, etc.; consequently, after dark they all stayed around their own lodges. They were all anxious to trade for tobacco and ammunition, but we had none to spare. Winnemucca and the Bannacks do not agree very well. He calls them thieves and liars, and they are afraid to retaliate for fear he will cast an evil spell on them, for these fool Bannacks tell and believe that he can do all sorts of impossible things, such as making the game plenty or scarce, being invulnerable to fire-arms, catching rifle-balls in his hands, etc., etc.; but if it should ever become necessary, I think he would have warm work stopping a ball from my trusty Sharpe's rifle. This is the first ADELPHUS BARTLETT KEITH, Private Secretary to the Governor of Montana, was born in Appleton, Maine, April 24, 1855. His early life was spent on a farm with his parents, where he was able to acquire the rudiments of an education in the country schoolhouse of the period.

At the age of sixteen, with parental consent, he left home and began for himself the struggle of life. Devoting his nights and Sundays to close, systematic study, he added to a knowledge of the practical details of the printing trade and newspaper work a mastery of short-hand writing and a course of reading in law. Becoming the proprietor of a newspaper, journalism seemed to offer better advantages than the practice of law, and he devoted himself energetically to that work. His experience in journalism covers a wide field, and he has successfully filled the various positions from that of reporter to that of managing editor and proprietor. He supplemented his journalistic experience with metaphysical studies, and while in New York city graduated at the American Institute of Phrenology, taking a course in mental philosophy and in anatomy and physiology.

Some of the more eventful years of his life were spent in Iowa, where he acquired a wide reputation as a newspaper man and politician, as well as a lecturer before popular audiences and educational bodies. He had early identified himself with the Democratic party, and his prominence as a writer and speaker led to his unanimous nomination for the office of Secretary of State by the Democratic State convention of Iowa, in 1880. Mr. Keith was then twenty-five years of age, but as the head of the State ticket he made a vigorous campaign, running ahead of his ticket in the State, and taking his place as one of the prominent leaders of the party in Iowa. He subsequently served on important committees, and in 1884 was an alternate to the national convention in Chicago, and in 1888 represented Iowa as a delegate to the national convention in St. Louis.

He gave to the Denison (Iowa) Bulletin more than a State-wide reputation, established Der Demokrat, a German paper, and other newspaper enterprises in that State. At a later date he was associated with Judge Kinne, now of the Supreme Court, in the publication of the Des Moines Daily Leader.

Having retired from practical politics, in deference to sentiments long cherished, Mr. Keith, in April, 1889, located in Helena, Montana, taking the editorship of the Montana Farming and Stock Journal. At the close of the State campaign that year he yielded to the earnest solicitation of Hon. Russell B. Harrison and accepted the managing editorship of the Helena Daily Journal, which he conducted with success through the memorable Precinct 34 contest and the legislative muddle that followed. After a year's absence, recuperating health and energy, he resumed work on the Journal, remaining until Mr. Harrison's unfortunate business complications in the East led to the closing down of the big printing house immediately after the defeat of his father, President Harrison, in 1892. Shortly after this Mr. Keith accepted the position of private secretary to the Governor, tendered by Governor J. E. Rickards, of Montana.

Outside of office hours Mr. Keith's taste for journalism finds expression in the managing editorship of the Montana Mining Area, a semi-monthly non-partisan magazine devoted to the mining interests of the State and recognized as the organ of that industry. He is prominent in the advocacy of silver, with both pen and voice, and proves his faith by liberal investments in mining enterprises.

Interested in mining matters, Mr. Keith lectures occasionally under the auspices of the Northwestern Lecture Bureau. Referring to one of his humorous productions, the New York Mail and Express said: "A new humorist has dawned in the West." The New York Journalist spoke of him as another Bill Nye, while the Helena Daily Herald commented upon a humorous lecture as follows: "Brains: How to Make a Few go a Long Way Without time he has accompanied the Bannacks to hunt the buffalo, his headquarters being among the Pahute tribes along the eastern base of the Sierra Nevada from Boisé to the great Colorado desert, all of which tribes speak a common language and seem to acknowledge his authority, although they have special chiefs for each tribe. ('Winnemucca,' says Granville Stuart, 'was the father of the somewhat talented Sarah Winnemucca, who married a lieutenant, and occasionally comes to the surface in communications to the Nevada newspapers.')

"During the night they had some singing and dancing over some Flathead scalps. They state that about a week ago a party of Bannacks found two lodges of Flatheads who were encamped, hunting somewhere below the Vermilion butte, on the Missouri, between Beaver creek and Spokan bar. They killed seven of them and captured thirty-five head of horses. Such is war among Indians—a massacre of the weak and defenseless by the strong whenever occasion offers. Only traveled six miles to-day. One of our horses broke loose last night, and it was 1 P. M. to-day before we found him. It had gone with the Indian horses; and in the morning some of the herders tied it up, and the old chief, after haranguing the camp as usual, Using Any,' was the subject of a most interesting lecture at the Y. M. C. A. rooms last evening. Colonel A. B. Keith has had much experience as a lecturer, and as a humorist of originality ranks among the best in the country." However, Mr. Keith has no ambitions in the line of humor, and his sketches and lectures of that character are merely for diversion.

July 3, 1875, Mr. Keith was married to Miss Carrie Bieber, a native of Columbus, Ohio, and they have had seven children, of whom five are living. He is domestic in his tastes, and attributes much of his success in life to his estimable wife. He holds a membership in several secret societies, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Royal Arcanum, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, Iowa Legion of Honor, and Woodmen of the World being among the number. In the last named order he is a head officer and a member of the executive council.

CHARLES E. BECKWITH, who is engaged in the insurance business at Missoula, Montana, is ranked with the enterprising men of the place and is eminently deserving of some personal mention in this work.

Mr. Beckwith was born in Fredericton, New Brunswick, June 30, 1836. His ancestors were English people who emigrated to New York during the early history of this country. When the Revolution was inaugurated they remained loyal to the king, and this resulted in their removal to New Burnswick, where three generations of the family have since resided. Frances E. Beckwith, our subject's father, was born there. He was a merchant, a prominent citizen, and was High Sheriff of Victoria county for a number of years. He married Miss Harriet Greenwood, a native of Halifax. Both were worthy members of the Episcopal Church. She died at the age of forty-two, and he lived to be sixty-seven years of age.

Charles E. Beckwith is the youngest in a family of eight children. He was reared in his native town and was educated in her public schools. From Fredericton he removed to Grand Falls, New Brunswick, where for twenty-eight years he was engaged in land surveying. In 1886 he came with his family to Montana, purchased a commodious and attractive residence on Pine street in Missoula, and has since continued to reside here. Since taking up his abode in Missoula he has given his attention to the insurance business. He now has a large and lucrative business, representing some fifteen or twenty of the most solid and reliable insurance companies in the world, among which we note the following: Commercial Union, Phœnix, Lion, Imperial, Liverpool & London & Globe, Scottish Union, London & Lancashire, National of Hartford, Providence, Washington, American of Newark, Home Mutual, Western and others. He also has the Equitable Life, Pacific Mutual Accident and the Metropolitan Plate Glass. His nicely furnished office is in the First National Bank building.

Mr. Beckwith was married August 19, 1859, to Miss Sarah Hammond, a native of Victoria county, New Brunswick, and a daughter of A. B. Hammond, of that county. A record of their eight children is as follows: Clara, the oldest, is now the wife of C. H. McCloud, who is vice president and manager of the Missoula Mercantile Company; Harriet is the wife of J. M. Keath, cashier of the First National Bank of Missoula; and the other children, Charles, Annie, George, Andrew, Emma and Sadie, are at home. The family are Episcopalians, and Mr. Beckwith is treasurer of the church committee. He is a strong temperance man, and his political views are in harmony with the principles advocated by the Republican party.

JESSE J. BIRD, one of Montana's worthy pioneers, is engaged in ranching eight miles northwest of Virginia City. Of his life and ancestry we make record as follows:

Mr. Bird was born in Patrick county, Virginia, June 2, 1831, son of Benjamin and Lucy (Gradey) Bird, both natives of the Old Dominion. Benjamin Bird was a soldier in the war of 1812. He died many years ago, leaving a widow and five children. All the latter are still living.

mounted his horse and brought ours to us, for which he charged the moderate sum of $5. I do not know how brave he may be in battle, but he evidently knows how to make a good charge. They have lost most of their horses during the winter, and about half of them are on foot. Early in the morning the women and children started out walking and leading their pack-horses; it pleased me to see fancy dressed young bucks having to foot it. It snowed about three inches last night, and to-day we followed down the creek we had camped on until near the river; we then turned to the left through the low hills, when a few minutes brought us to the Madison river. The bottom land for three miles wide is a swamp impassible to animals, and I suppose from one end of the valley to the other in length. On the east side of the valley there are a number of small creeks coming out of a snowy mountain. We camped for the night on the only creek coming from the west; we called it 'Swamp creek,' because several of our horses mired down in crossing it. It was very windy and disagreeable to-day. Saw a few antelope and some geese. Traveled eight miles.

"16th.—Cold and windy. I killed an antelope and two black-tailed deer. Saw plenty of

The mother reached the advanced age of ninety-five years, and passed away in 1893. Jesse J. is their oldest child. He remained in his native State until his nineteenth year. Then he went to Illinois and worked for wages, and remained there until 1864, when he crossed the plains to Montana, coming direct to Virginia City. Gold had been discovered there a year before and it was then a busy mining camp. He at once secured employment, helped to put in the water works, and for this received $100 per month. After that he engaged in mining and spent five years there. Then he prospected a year. Next, we find him settled on a ranch a half mile below his present farm. In 1873, after having worked this place three years, he sold out and took up his abode where he now resides. Here he owns 130 acres of fine land.

In 1878 Mr. Bird married Mrs. Elizabeth Morgan, a native of Canada. Their only child died in infancy, and in 1885 Mrs. Bird was called to her last home. Mr. Bird's aged mother lived with him up to the time of her death, since which his sister Ann has been his housekeeper.

In his early life Mr. Bird was a Whig. Later, he became a Democrat, and recently he has joined the ranks of the Populist party. During his long residence in Madison county Mr. Bird has maintained a good and worthy character, and by those who know him best he is most highly respected.

LAPEYRE BROTHERS, the pioneer and leading druggists of Great Falls, Montana, established their business here in 1886. They began in a small way, gave close attention to their business, met with marked success and in 1890 they built their brick block on the corner of Centre and Third avenues, one of the best business corners in the city. This building is 25 x 100 feet: two of its floors are occupied by their stock of drugs and its upper rooms are utilized for offices. They keep an elegant stock of all kinds of goods in their line. By their straightforward business methods and their courteous treatment of customers, they have won their way to the front and are justly deserving of the position they occupy as the leading druggists of the city.

These gentlemen, A. R. and B. E. Lapeyre, are of French ancestry. Their parents, Alexander and Emilie (Viguer) Lapeyre, were born in France. They emigrated to St. Louis, Missouri, in 1832, and there the father was engaged in business up to the time of his death, which occurred in the sixtieth year of his age. The mother died at the age of forty-eight. The brothers, A. R. and B. E., were born in St. Louis in the years 1857 and 1861 respectively. They grew up in their native city, received their education there, and there learned the drug business. In 1874 they came to Montana and located at Helena, where for a number of years they were in the employ of Henry M. Parchen, druggist, and in 1886, as above stated, took up their abode in Great Falls. Previous to his coming here B. E. was for a time at Butte City with the Parchen firm and later with M. A. Flanagan at Fort Benton.

Both are members of the Masonic fraternity and in their political views are Republicans.

GEORGE W. DART, one of Dillon's most highly esteemed business men, is ranked with the Montana pioneers of 1863. A resume of his life is as follows:

George W. Dart was born at Mount Clemens, Michigan, December 2, 1837. His ancestors emigrated from England to Connecticut in the early settlement of that State, where his father, Thomas Dart, was born in 1794. Thomas Dart was a soldier during the war of 1812. He married Miss Alice Rowe, a native of Michigan, born in 1827. They became the parents of six children, four sons and two daughters, of whom four are still living. The parents were pioneer farmers at Mount Clemens, where they spent most of their lives and died, the father in his sixty-second year and the mother in her fiftieth.

George W. is the youngest of the family. He was educated in the public schools of his native place and in the city of Detroit, where, later, he learned the hardware deer and antelope. We traveled through low hills all day, up one ravine and down another, but could not raise the color in prospecting for gold. Camped on a small branch that sinks about a mile before it reaches the river. Traveled twelve miles to-day.

"17th.—Followed creek down to river and then down the river three or four miles; then crossed it. At this point it was over 100 yards wide. Saw about twenty elk at the crossing, and occasionally an antelope in the course of the day's travel; also saw a black bear, and some buffalo tracks about a week old. Found plenty of burnt quartz and could raise the color, but that would not pay to stop and prospect. The mountain on the west side of the Madison looks favorable for gold; low, red hills along the base of the mountain. Timber is very scarce; there are a few firs high up on the mountains, and a few cottonwoods along the streams, but not enough to support a small farming community. At our camp to-night there are the largest willows I ever saw; they are from six to twelve inches in diameter, and from twelve to forty feet high, and straight enough for house logs. The country passed over to-day showed some good indications of gold; low, rolling hills, no timber, and not very well watered. Some two or three horses in the party are getting very weak. I am afraid some of us will have to walk before we get back. Traveled fifteen miles.

"18th.—Several snow squalls last evening. Crossed two main branches of the Gallatin river to-day, and camped on a small creek near its mouth; it comes from the northeast and runs about ten sluice-heads of water. The branches of the Gallatin are each about twenty-five yards wide, and there is a belt of good cottonwood timber on the south fork, about three-quarters of a mile wide and twenty miles long. The valley embracing the two forks of the Gallatin business with Edwards & McGibbon. With this firm he remained five years. Then he removed to St. Paul. That was in 1855, and there he remained eight years, working at the tinner's business, a part of the time on his own account. In 1863 he came to Montana, making the journey across North Dakota to Fort Benton, in company with a train composed of thirty wagons and seventy men, being five months en route landing at his destination in safety.

Upon his arrival in Montana, he first engaged in mining at Confederate Gulch, which he continued for two years, meeting with fair success. He then engaged in freighting from Fort Benton to Salt Lake and to Bannack and other mining camps During those times he camped in his wagon most of the time. He was at Bannack when Plumbet and some of his men were hung in 1864. Appreciating the situation and the necessity of immediate action, Mr. Dart joined the Vigilant Committee and aided in sustaining law and order. As a result of the prompt action of those committees the country was freed of its lawless element and plundering and killing ceased.

In 1869 Mr. Dart began his hardware business in Bannack, and carried it on successfully there, having all the business in his line in the town. In 1882 when Dillon was started, seeing the advantage to accrue from being in a railroad town, he came hither and opened his business, which he conducted alone most successfully until 1887. That year he took in as partners Mr. Wing and Mr. Knapp, and the three continued together until 1893, when Mr. Dart retired.

During the whole of his long business career in Beaver Head county, he has taken a deep and prominent interest in the improvement and development of the county, and by a most upright and honorable course has won hosts of friends. He was elected and served two years as Treasurer of the county; has served a number of terms on the City Council, and in 1890 was elected and served as Mayor of the city. He has done his full share in all the public enterprises of the city; has built several good buildings, including the large brick business house he occupied, and all movements intended to advance the welfare of Dillon ever find in him a hearty supporter. In addition to his property in the city he owns a section of land eight miles from Dillon, which is devoted to the production of hay, oats and other farm products.

Mr. Dart was married, August 28, 1877, to Miss Harriet A. Fox, a native of the State of Wisconsin. They have two sons, both born in Dillon: George F. and Fred. W.

Mr. Dart was made a Mason in 1870. He is a Past Master and Past Junior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Montana. He is a member of the Pioneer Society of Beaver Head county, and has served as its treasurer for a number of years. His pleasant residence he built soon after coming to Dillon, in 1882. Truly may it be said of him that no man in the county is more widely known or more highly appreciated and esteemed.

is apparently very near circular and about twenty miles in diameter. It is the best valley for agricultural and grazing purposes that I have yet seen in the mountains. Since we crossed the Madison we have passed through a better grass country than either Deer Lodge or Bitter Root valleys, and they are hard to beat The valley is well watered by numerous small creeks from the mountains. The fork on the north side of the valley is bordered by a swamp, and is difficult to cross. Saw plenty of black and white-tailed deer and antelope, also one band of about twenty elk. Fine weather, clear, calm and warm. There is a low gap in the mountains about twenty miles southeast of our camp, and east from last night's camp. It is the way the Snakes and the Bannacks go to hunt buffalo on the Yellowstone, but we are following Lewis and Clarke's trail. We are about thirty miles from the three forks of the Missouri, and were about the same distance at last camp. We have seen plenty of geese, ducks and prairie chickens ever since we struck the Madison, and from there to this camp there are but few prickly pears, and the little valleys are composed of soil instead of rock and gravel. A great many of our horses' backs are becoming sore. Traveled twenty miles.

CLARENCE B. GARRETT, Treasurer of the city of Helena, dates his birth in Virginia, January 29, 1859. His forefathers came to this country from Scotland. One of the three Garrett brothers settled in Canada, one in Maryland and the other in Virginia. This was previous to the Revolutionary war; the exact date is not known. From Mr. Garrett who settled in Virginia sprang that branch of the family to which Clarence B. belongs. Ira Alexander Garrett, the great-grandfather of our subject, fought in the Colonial army, and his son, also named Ira Alexander Garrett, was a Captain during the Mexican war. The son of Captain Garrett, John A. Garrett, was born in Virginia in 1823, and became the father of the subject of this sketch. He married Miss Mary Duke, also a native of the Old Dominion, and a descendant of one of the first families of Virginia. They are the parents of seven children, of whom six are living, Clarence B., being the eldest. A Southern gentlemen, John A. Garrett, was in the Confederate army, and at the battle of Bull Run received wounds which incapacitated him for further service. By the devastations of war their great wealth was swept away. He practiced law for a number of years, and for some time served as County Clerk of Albemarle county. He and his good wife still reside near Charlottesville, honored and respected by all who know them. He is a Presbyterian, and she a Baptist.

Owing to reverses which overtook his family during the war, Clarence B. Garrett was thrown upon his own resources at the early age of twelve years. His first employment was that of cash boy in the store of Levi Brothers, in Richmond. After a year spent with them he became a newsboy on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad running between Richmond and White Sulphur Springs, and continued thus occupied for three years. Then he went to Washington, District of Columbia, and secured a position in the Ebbitt House, where he remained until he became of age. After that he went to St. Paul, Minnesota, where he was chief clerk in the Sherman House.

In 1881 Mr. Garrett came from St. Paul to Montana, and at Miles City formed a partnership with a Mr. Hill the firm name being Garrett & Hill, and for two years they did an extensive produce business. Mr. Garrett then returned East, but in 1886 came back to Montana, this time to Helena. For four years he was clerk in the Cosmopolitan hotel. In the meantime he was elected a member of the City Council, and served two terms, and in 1892 his party nominated and ran him for County Treasurer, but he missed the election by forty votes. In the spring of 1893 he was nominated for City Treasurer, was re-elected in the spring of '94, and is now rendering efficient service in that position.

Mr. Garrett is a member of the Masonic fraternity, has taken all the degrees in the Yorke Rite, and is also a member of the Knights of Pythias and Elks. He has all his life affiliated with the Democratic party, and has rendered it valuable service. He was secretary of the City Democratic Central Committee. He is an obliging and capable business man, and during his residence in Montana he has become widely and favorably known and enjoys the confidence and good will of his fellow citizens. He was married April 18, 1893, to Miss Mable A. Davis, a native of Illinois and a daughter of Major A. Davis, a prominent stock man of that State.

WHEELER O. DEXTER, of Fort Benton, came to the Territory of Montana in 1866, and has since been one of her active and reliable citizens. He was born in Steuben county, New York, on the last day of July, 1843.

His father, Bela Dexter, once a Colonel of the New York militia, married Miss Annie Snyder, of Thompson county, that State. He was a lumberman, and later in life was the proprietor of the Canostia Hotel. He had two daughters and a son, and died in his fiftieth year; his wife afterward married again, and died at the age of sixty years. One of the daughters is now deceased.

Mr. Dexter, of this sketch, was only seven years of age when he lost his father, and was left to his own resources.

O. B. Garrett

"Sunday 19th.—I was serenaded by a full band of wolves while on guard last night. We saw four or five black bear and plenty of deer and antelope to-day. Traveled up the small creek that we camped on last night, for about ten miles, to its head; then crossed over a small divide, and camped on a stream about twenty-five feet wide coming from the northeast and running west. I killed a black-tailed deer and an antelope, and Bostwick also killed a black-tailed deer. Plenty of red hills and burnt granite; a high mountain covered with snow a little east of south, about three miles from camp; broken hills to north and east. Our general direction of travel since we crossed Stinking Water divide has been northeast. Traveled eighteen miles to-day.

"20th.—Followed up the stream we camped on about four miles to its forks: crossed south fork and went up the ridge between the two for about seven or eight miles; thence a little east of north to camp on a branch of same stream. Had to travel out of our course to-day to get around snow drifts. Saw plenty of elk and few antelope. I killed one of each. Saw where an old buffalo bull had been killed about a year ago. Country very broken, with red hills, but not any washed gravel, and no quartz

He was employed at whatever manual labor he could do in the summer and attended school in the winter, ending his schooling at Ithaca Academy. About this time Fort Sumter was fired upon and Mr. Lincoln issued his call for volunteers. Mr. Dexter, then in his seventeenth year, at once enrolled himself as a soldier for the Union, enlisting in April, 1861, under Captain Brown, whose company was to be connected with Colonel Baker's regiment; but young Dexter had an uncle who claimed to have control of him and took him away. January 4, 1864, Mr. Dexter enlisted in Company F, Sixteenth New York Heavy Artillery, and served in the Army of the James to the close of the war, participating in the brilliant struggle of the closing year. He was mustered out June 24, 1865.

He then went to the oil regions of Pennsylvania, where he was for a short time engaged in the sinking of oil wells. Next he came westward to St. Paul, Minnesota, and joined the Fisk expedition, and with it crossed the plains to Montana. The train consisted of 140 wagons and 400 men, women and children. Leaving St. Cloud June 6, Mr. Dexter arrived in Helena September 2. Here his first position was that of night clerk in the Tremont House. Next he was engineer in a sawmill at Dry Gulch; later he became the engineer of a quartz mill at Unionville for Major Hodge and his son; and on the very day that Mr. Dexter commenced working here the Major had a shooting scrape with a man, in which the latter was killed and the Major wounded. Such melees were common in pioneer times throughout the great West.

Mr. Dexter continued there till October, 1867, when he came to Fort Benton and went on a prospecting tour for coal; and he discovered a vein five feet and eight inches thick, below Cow Island; but it was not within reach of the market, and Mr. Dexter turned his attention to another enterprise, namely, furnishing steamboats on the Missouri river with wood, and continued in this until 1874, meantime locating a ranch in Gallatin valley, which he improved and afterward sold. While in the wood business, in 1873, he went out shooting one day below Fort Benton, and killed two antelope and three buffalo; and while bringing them in on a sleigh the next day, and when going down a steep place, the sleigh was overturned and Mr. Dexter was so severely crushed that the bones of his neck were broken. He was paralyzed and suffered a great deal for several weeks; but, as if by miracle, he recovered, and he is still a well preserved man. After this he was engaged in freighting between Cow Island and Helena, and handled large quantities of vegetables. In 1875–76 he had a contract to cut hay at Fort Walsh, Canada, for the Government.

He piloted General Terry down the Missouri from Fort Benton to Cow Island: and he was also the bearer of the dispatches concerning the surrender of the Nez Perces Indians from Fort Benton to Fort Shaw, making a journey of sixty-four miles in eight hours. At Fort Benton he had the honor of being a member of the first grand jury; and he also brought into the country the first steam thresher. He established a steam sawmill at Highwood, and furnished a large portion of the lumber used at Fort Benton. In 1876 he furnished the teams to convey General Gibbon to the Yellowstone to meet General Custer, who was soon afterward massacred on the Little Big Horn river, Montana, by Sitting Bull Sioux Indians, while Mr. Dexter was returning from this trip.

In 1889 Mr. Dexter took up a ranch on the bench above Fort Benton, and three miles distant from this city he is raising wheat. He keeps a large number of horses, and is now running two threshers and a sawmill, beside his farm.

He is a member of G. H. Warren Post, No. 20, G. A. R., being now its Junior Vice Commander. He is also Junior Deacon of the Masonic Lodge here.

Mr. Dexter has had a remarkable life: has had many narrow escapes, and was of great value in the early days in carrying dispatches and in doing many things requiring great courage. He is a splendid rifle shot, a good of any kind. Warm, with light wind. Traveled fifteen miles.

"21st.—This morning, for five miles, we traveled east, afterward east 20 degrees south, to camp on a branch of same stream. After camping, I went about four miles ahead, and found a good road for to-morrow's travel. We are about three miles from the divide between the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers. North and east of last night's camp the country is low; northeast twenty miles is a low mountain, south of east is another, and south and southwest there are high, snowy mountains. Saw about one hundred elk to-day. I have difficulty in keeping the party from bombarding them while we are traveling. Bostwick went hunting after we camped and killed a grizzly bear; it attacked him before he shot it, but he got the best of the fight. About twelve of the party went about three miles up the branch to see it, and nearly all of them got lively, for it was literally covered with vermin. Underwood and Watkins each killed an antelope; had antelope steaks fried in bear's oil for supper. High living! Traveled ten miles.

"22d.—Traveled southwest all day. I left the train in the morning and followed along the base of the mountain to the west. Saw many natural musician and a perfect genius as a mechanic, being able to do anything in the line of machinery. He was the builder of the first steamboat, the Swan, constructed at Great Falls; and in addition to his other good traits of character he is a man of integrity who keeps his obligations to the letter.

FRED C. STODDARD.—Among the active business men of the enterprising and beautiful city of Missoula is the gentleman whose name heads this sketch.

Mr. Stoddard was born in Concord, Jackson county, Michigan, August 18, 1857, and is of English descent, his ancestors having come to America and settled in Massachusetts previous to the Revolutionary war, and subsequently removing from there to New York. In New York his father, Dr. Sampson Stoddard, was born, reared and educated. He removed to Michigan at an early day, being one of the first physicians to locate at Jackson, where he practiced his profession for many years. He was well known throughout central Michigan. Mr. Stoddard was twice married. By his first wife he had eight children, five of whom are still living. She died in 1852, and in 1854 he married Mrs. Emily T. Lathrop, of Concord, Jackson county, Michigan. She, however, was born in New York State, her parents being among the early pioneers of Michigan. This second marriage resulted in the birth of two children, the subject of our sketch and Mrs. William E. Braggs, the latter of Stevensville, Montana. Dr. Stoddard lived to be eighty years of age, and his widow is still living, now in her seventy-sixth year. She is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which her worthy husband was also a member.

Fred C. Stoddard was reared in his native town, his education being received in the public schools and the Albion College, at Albion, Michigan. He began his business career as an office boy in Chicago. In 1880 he came to Missoula, Montana, and invested in land. He purchased 160 acres, and had a half interest in 240 acres with a brother with whom he was engaged in farming operations two years, raising grain and stock. In 1882 he accepted a position as bookkeepr and general manager in the store of Worden & Company, Missoula, and with this firm he was connected until 1886. At that time he was elected bookkeeper and assistant cashier of the Missoula National Bank (now the First National Bank), and this position he filled from July, 1886, until January 1, 1890, when he engaged in the real-estate and insurance business. In company with other gentlemen, he purchased eighty acres of land on the southwestern side of the city, which tract they subdivided and placed upon the market. He is handling his portion of this property and also has charge of other real estate which he is selling on commission. He represents the following insurance companies: Ætna, of Hartford; the Home, of New York; the Phoenix, of Hartford; the Royal, of England; the North British and Mercantile, of England; Firemen's Fund, of California; Hartford of Connecticut; Northern Assurance Company; Norwich Union, of London; St. Paul Fire and Marine, St. Paul, Minnesota; Insurance Company of North America, Philadelphia; Palatin, of Manchester, England; the Alliance Assurance Company, of London; Mutual Life Insurance Company, of New York; the Lloyds Plate Glass Insurance Company, of Philadelphia, and various other companies. He does a large and successful business in the insurance line, and aside from this and his real-estate deals he devotes considerable time to the Missoula Building & Loan Association, of which he is secretary.

Mr. Stoddard was married April 16, 1884, to Miss Minnie A. Freeman, daughter of Avery Freeman, of Ft. Wayne, Indiana. They have two children, both natives of Missoula: Bessie Louise, born on November 8, 1885, and Frederick Thayer, January 28, 1888.

Mr. Stoddard is a member of the A. O. U. W. and of the K. of P. Politically, he is a Republican. Prompt, energetic and honorable and upright in all his dealings, he has acquired the reputation of being one of Missoula's most reliable business men.

elk and antelope. We traveled down an open plain, averaging about eight miles in width. We are supposed to be on Shields river. Lewis and Clarke have played us out; if we had left the notes and map of their route at home and followed the Indian trail, we would have saved four days' travel in coming from Bannack City here. The appearance of the country is about the same as last night, only we are closer to the snowy mountains south of us, and which are evidently on the south of the Yellowstone. Traveled twenty miles.

"23d.—It began raining about four o'clock yesterday evening and continued until 10:30 P M. Cloudy to-day. Saw fresh buffalo signs and many elk, antelope and three white-tailed deer. We traveled along the east bank of Sheilds river, which runs a few degrees east of south. Crossed four tracks coming in from the mountain east of us; there is also a number of creeks coming in on the west side. Beautiful tableland on the east side of the river, and low, broken hills on the west. Prospected, and found a good color of gold on the river, but not enough to justify us to stop and prospect thoroughly. Since leaving Beaver Head we have seen but very few prickly pears until this afternoon, when we found plenty and of the CHARLES WILLIAM BERRY, County Assessor of Missoula county, and one of Montana's noted pioneers, was born in New Hampshire, February 25, 1827. His grandfather, Isaiah Berry, was also born in that State, of English and Irish ancestry. Both he and his son William were soldiers in the war of 1812. The former was a Whig in political matters, and served in the Legislature of his State a number of years. Religiously, he was a member of the Congregational Church. He had seven sons, and lived to the age of eighty-eight years. William Berry, the youngest child in order of birth, and the father of our subject, was born in New Hampshire, in 1797. He married Miss Olive S. Lock, also a native of that State, and they had five children. Mr. Berry lived and died on the farm on which he was born, his death occurring in 1878. His wife, who was born in 1794, lived to the age of eighty years. Three of their children are still living.

Charles W. Berry, the fourth child in order of birth in the above family, was early inured to farm labor on his father's place, having attended school only a short time during the winters. In 1849, at the age of twenty-two years, he went to California, via the isthmus, and arrived in San Francisco December 20 of that year. The gold excitement was then at its height, and Mr. Berry mined on the south fork of the American river, three miles above Coloma, from spring until the following fall, and during that time took out about $2,000 in gold: he then returned to San Francisco.

From April, 1851, until July, 1861, he mined at Scott's Bar, on Scott river, Siskiyou county; also carried freight from Red Bluff and Crescent City into Siskiyou county; afterward went with his train and sixteen passengers east of the Cascade mountains, to Oro Fino; next freighted from Walla Walla to Lewiston and Elk City, and while engaged in that occupation came near losing his life. While guarding his mules at night he was standing near his fire, and an Indian shot at him, the arrow passing through his beard, just under his chin. He dropped down in the deep grass, and crawled away from the fire. He saw nothing more of the murderous Indians, but many were the dangers, seen and unseen, through which the early pioneers passed. While in Idaho, October 24, 1862, Mr. Berry was attacked and robbed of $1,119. After securing help he followed the robbers to Walla Walla, where they were captured, and the sheriff started with them for Florence to be tried; but the people of Lewiston, fearing they would be rescued by others of the party, took them from the sheriff and hung them. Mr. Berry secured all his money, but, fearing the associates of the robbers would kill him, he left that part of the country.

In April, 1864, he came to Alder Gulch, Montana; afterward took a pack train to Cow island, below Fort Benton, and returned; in the following spring he went with the stampede to Cœur d' Alene, where he found as many as 2,000 people; then began mining for $6 a day at Bannack, and six weeks later engaged in hunting and trapping in the Big Hole valley. With two companions he continued that occupation until December, and during that time caught seventy-six beaver, and killed many moose, elk, deer, mountain sheep and bears. Mr. Berry packed the meat to French Gulch, where he sold it to the miners. He spent one winter at Deer Lodge in a tent, and camped at Anaconda, when only one ranch had been located in this part of the country. In the spring of 1866 he went to Bear Gulch, and was engaged in whipsawing lumber, with which they made underground drains to bring water to the gulch in winters. Mr. Berry was offered $2,000 for a half interest in the works, but refused the offer. He afterward left it to bring his wife and child from Walla Walla, and after returning found the entire camp had gone to the headquarters of the Salmon river excitement. At about that time he was given a one-sixth interest in what was called the Fighting Mining claim, in order to help hold the claim. They built a fort of hewed logs around the mine, and in that way succeeded in working it for a year; and the $16,000 taken from the mine was largest size. I killed an antelope about half an hour before we camped. We do not carry any fresh meat with us, every day provides for itself. Camped on Shields river, about four miles above its mouth. Traveled fifteen miles.

"24th.—It began raining about 3 A.M., and kept it up until morning, and was still sprinkling when we packed and started. It rained nearly all day till sundown. It was more like an Oregon mist than a rain storm. We traveled fifteen miles nearly east to camp on a small clay creek. Very bad road; the horses sunk into the mud three or four inches every step and occasionally almost mired down. The character of the country has entirely changed in to-day's travel. Very little gravel or boulders; clay land with bed-rock, very shallow; it is a species of sand-stone, with small veins of clear white quartz running through it in places. The general face of the country resembles the Green river region in eastern Utah, only the mountains are higher, and the plains not so wide, with broken clay hills and occasionally a crown butte. There is a range of snowy mountains south of us, and the craggy outline of the divide west, and a few points east of north is an isolated snowy mountain; in an eastern direction there are no mountains to be seen. I divided among the six owners.

In 1868 Mr. Berry went to Lewiston, where he received from his brother, J. G. Berry, the appointment of Deputy Sheriff. In the following year he took a trip to the States, returned by rail to San Francisco, thence went to Portland and Walla Walla, next to Cedar creek, Missoula county, and while at the latter place again engaged in making lumber with a whipsaw. He sold the lumber for building and mining purposes, receiving from $150 to $200 per 100 feet. After following that occupation three months he took a ranch at the mouth of Cedar creek, in Missoula county, where he raised eleven crops of vegetables and grain, selling the product to the miners on the creek. His potatoes sold as high as 15 cents per pound, and cabbage from 8 to 10 cents a pound. About twenty Indians and squaws were employed on the farm, receiving $1 per day, and the Indian children were also engaged in picking up potatoes, etc. In 1882 Mr. Berry was elected to the office of Sheriff of Missoula county, which position he held two years; then took 160 acres of land on Flathead valley, and engaged in raising hay and stock. In 1887 he came to Missoula, where he was elected to the position of County Assessor, and after the State was admitted to the Union was twice re-elected.

In 1862 our subject was united in marriage with Miss Annie Davis, and they had two children,—C. W. and Annie. The wife and mother died in 1867, when the youngest child was only four months old. The son now owns two ranches near his father, in Flathead valley.

Mr. Berry has been a life-long Democrat. In his social relations he is a member of the Masonic fraternity, having been made a Master Mason on Scott river, in California, in 1857.

He has traversed the entire West many times when it was an unsettled wilderness, inhabited by savages and wild beasts, and the change that has since come to this country is truly marvelous. In 1864 he camped where the city of Missoula now stands, but at that time the nearest inhabitant was four miles distant. In 1882 he was both Sheriff and Assessor of the county, which then contained an area of 200 x 300 miles, and his jurisdiction extended over that great area of thinly settled country.

IULUS GREENLEAF DENNY, Prosecuting Attorney of Missoula county, Montana, was born at Bethel, Polk county, Oregon, February 19, 1859.

His parents, Aaron and Almira (King) Denny, were married, April 10, 1849, and soon after their marriage they made the long and tedious journey across the plains with ox teams, to Oregon. Upon their arrival there, they first took claim to a half section of land in Multnomah county, near where the city of Portland now is, and subsequently they removed to Polk county and settled near Bethel. In 1877 they went to Benton county, that State, where Mr. Denny built a sawmill and several schooners, and where he was largely interested in lumbering. Some time ago he went back to Polk county, and now resides at his old home near Bethel, being ranked with the respected pioneers of Oregon. His wife died July 13, 1892, in the sixty-fourth year of her age. She was a most devoted wife and loving mother, and had stood all the dangers and privations of pioneer life most heroically. While on their way across the plains, she stood guard with a Kentucky rifle to keep off the Indians while her husband took needed sleep. In every sense of the term she was a noble and heroic woman. She was born in Indiana, in 1828, daughter of John King, of Tennessee. One of her brothers, John B. King, was a prominent lawyer, and was the author of several treatises on Federal law. Mr. and Mrs. Denny were the parents of seven sons, six of whom they reared to manhood, and five of this number are still living.

Iulus Greenleaf was the fifth in the family. He was reared on his father's farm, and his early education was received in the schools of Bethel. In 1877 he applied for a cadetship at West Point, and secured the appointment, but circumstances prevented his acceptance, and the killed two buck antelope in the evening, and then went up on a butte and saw the Yellowstone river, distant about three miles. We have been traveling parallel to it all day. We saw a large grizzly bear and chased him into a patch of brush not over one hundred yards in diameter, which we surrounded and tried to drive him out, but could not do it, and none of us were foolhardy enough to go into the brush after him. Traveled fifteen miles.

"25th.—Followed down the creek we camped on five miles to the Yellowstone; then down the north bank of same to camp on a small creek coming from the northwest. Occasional bluffs of sandstone with sharp grit; low, rolling hills on both sides of the river; they are smooth on the south side and rocky on the north. No indications of gold; prospected in several places, but could not raise the color. Saw two bands of elk, some antelope, and I killed a white-tailed deer. Saw many prairie-dog towns to-day for the first time on the trip. Such great big fat 'critters' running all over town barking bloody-murder, and their companions, little diminutive owls, sitting on the largest houses and viewing the hubbub with looks of the greatest gravity and wisdom. It made me feel good to see them enjoying the excitement of strangers going through town. Blake and Bell caught some fine trout in the river this afternoon. I had always heard that there were no trout in the Yellowstone, but it is a mistake, for they are genuine trout. Saw where an old buffalo bull had been last night during the rain. Passed a small creek coming in on the south side from the southwest. While on guard, we often hear the meadow larks singing at all hours of the night. To-day we saw plenty of states crows and prairie chickens. The general course of the river is to the east. There are but few groves of cottonwood along it, as far as we have seen, and usually there are only a few scattering trees along its course. The low hills on the south side extend from ten to thirty miles back to the base of a snowy mountain range, the general direction of which is south of east and north of west. In a northern and eastern direction there is not a snowy mountain in sight. Traveled fourteen miles.

"26th.—Soon left the river to go around a cluster of black, rocky bluffs extending four miles along the river; in six or seven miles crossed Rivers Across, so called by Captain Clarke from two streams which enter the river following year he was sent to the State University, where he remained one year. He then read law for one year in the office of Daily & Brother, after which he entered the law department of the Willamette University, at Salem, Oregon, where he graduated at the head of his class, and with distinguished honor, in 1888. On the 12th of September of that same year he was admitted to practice. He then came to Montana. He first stopped at Grantsvale and from there came to Missoula, arriving at the latter place late in the year 1888. Here he at once entered upon the practice of his profession, and in it he has since met with eminent success. The year following his location here he was the nominee of the Democratic party for Prosecuting Attorney, but was defeated by 200 votes, the successful Republican candidate being F. C. Webster. At the next election, however, being again the nominee for Prosecuting Attorney, he ran far ahead of his ticket and was elected by a majority of 600, and in this office he is now rendering efficient service Soon after coming to Missoula he became a member of the law firm of Stephens, Matts & Denny, his partners being Judge W. J. Stephens and Hon. Elmer Matts. He continued a member of this firm for several years, doing a successful business, being retained on nearly all the criminal cases in the county, mostly on the side of the defense, but now as the public prosecutor. He has acquired a well-earned reputation as a criminal lawyer. Indeed, that is his forte. In 1893 he formed a partnership with Joseph M. Dixon, and the firm is now Denny & Dixon.

Mr. Denny was married, February 12, 1892, to Miss Beatrice T Reynolds, a native of Iowa, and a daughter of John Reynolds. They have one child, Robert M.

Since his location here, Mr. Denny has become thoroughly identified with Missoula and Missoula county. He owns the residence in which he and his family live, and also has mining and other interests here. An effective stump speaker and an enthusiastic campaign worker, Mr. Denny has rendered valued service to his party.

exactly opposite to each other. Thence followed down the north bank to camp at Otter creek, crossing one small creek on the way. Opposite camp Bear river comes in, and two miles above camp, on the south side, comes in a small creek with plenty of cottonwood timber on it. The largest groves of timber are on the small creeks, where they join the river. There is some timber on the high mountains, but from here it seems to be scrubby. We had some rain last night, and several hard squalls of rain and hail while traveling to-day. The character of the soil and rock is the same as yesterday, only there are more prickly pears; very miry, bad traveling. Saw many elk and a few antelope; fresh buffalo signs, but no buffalo. Splendid feed for our horses, and the poor things need it badly enough. Saw plenty of grama grass since yesterday morning. We have seen many large buffalo wolves for the past two days; they serenade us every night. If ever I can get back to where I can get some good water to drink, I will be happy. All the water in this country reminds me of puddles in a brick-yard; it not only looks bad, but also has a nauseating taste; yet it seems to be healthy enough, for all of the party are in excellent health. I suppose a person would soon become accustomed to it,

ROBERT S. HALE.—Among the successful financiers of the State of Montana Mr. R. S. Hale, of Helena, is probably one of the most widely known factors, in and about that city, of all of her promoters. He is all native of Kentucky.

His father, Thomas Hale, a merchant of that State, moved to Liberty, Missouri, while young Hale was an infant. Here Robert grew up, attending the public school, and entered the William Jewell College, of Liberty. After leaving that institution he went to Kansas City, Missouri, where he engaged in the drug business with his brother, Thomas B. Hale, for a number of years, later moving to St. Louis, same State. In that city he joined an expedition to Montana, under the guidance of Captain Joseph Knight, and reached Virginia City in 1864. Here he engaged in the drug business, in a building he purchased. Alder Gulch was at this time in its palmiest days, and its business thrived with the prosperity of the camp.

In 1865 he came to Helena and started a branch drug-store, which he has continued to conduct ever since. In the meantime he became interested in the placer mines in the new camp at Helena. In 1866 he bought out his partner, with whom he had been associated since 1864, and continued the business himself, building up an extensive and lucrative trade at both stores. The one at Helena has been in operation ever since its establishment, and is now one of the leading institutions of the city.

In 1869 the Park Ditch Company was organized by S. T. Hauser, A. M. Holter, Dan Flourree, R. S. Hale, T. H. Ray, A. M. Woolfolk and others. Their ditch is thirty-five miles long, including branches, running from Park lake to Helena. Park lake is a natural body of water, covering sixty acres of ground; is from twenty to forty-five feet deep; located some twenty miles or more west of Helena, and five from the main range of the Rocky mountains; and in the event of the supply now being used for the city of Helena becoming inadequate to the demands of the people, this source will probably furnish an unlimited supply of pure water for them. The various partners in this enterprise were bought out by A. M. Woolfolk and subsequently the interest was acquired by Mr. Hale, who has since used the water for mining purposes. This water supplies all the mining facilities in Grizzly Gulch and Dry Gulch and in the Oro Fino Gulch, lying directly adjacent to the city of Helena.

In addition to his drug business, Mr. Hale has a practical interest in placer-mining. He owns all the ground of any value for placer-mining purposes from the city limits of Helena to the head of Grizzly Gulch, some eight miles; and besides this he has three miles of mining ground in Dry Gulch and one and a half miles of the Oro Fino Gulch. This ground, which was very rich in early days, has been worked in spots in a crude way, but the larger portion of the gold still remains in the ground. Mr. Hale is using California Giant and a large bed-rock flume to work this ground, washing the gulches clean from rimrock to rimrock through this flume, and with his unlimited supply of water can dictate the values of all the placer grounds lying below him.

Besides his placer-mining interests, Mr. Hale is largely interested in various quartz mines throughout the State. He is president and a large stockholder of the Iron Mountain Mining Company, whose interests are in Missoula county; and he has numerous interests in other mines and prospects in various parts of the State. Mr. Hale has been an active operator in this city's realty. He has several brick blocks, including the Capital block on Main street and other valuable Main street properties, besides numerous residences and unimproved properties in different parts of the city. Mr. Hale is one of the most successful business men of the State, and is recognized as one of its solid financiers. He has money invested in many of the leading institutions, and is still actively en-so that good, clear, cold water would not taste right. The ground is almost covered with young grasshoppers. We can neither cook nor eat without having the grub seasoned with them. If they all live to become full-grown, they will devour all the grass, and our horses will have hard times as we return. One kind of the cottonwoods are beginning to leaf out, and so are the cherry and gooseberry bushes. Traveled eighteen miles.

"27th.—We had a hard shower of rain last night, after we had camped, but before we got supper; it then cleared off, and we have had none since, although several storms have passed within a few miles of us while traveling to-day. The surface of the country has entirely changed again in to-day's travel. The clay still remains, but there is a different kind of sandstone, and there is more gravel on the hills. On both sides of the river the low hills are now thinly covered with yellow pine and cedar; there is also more cottonwood along the river and creeks. There are but little bottoms along the river, the low hills generally coming down to it. Two creeks came in on the south side to-day; one of them, I think, is dry; and we also passed two dry ones on the north side. Saw a small band of big-horn or mountain sheep, gaged in his mining operations and in attending to the various enterprises with which he has become associated.

FRANK W. WEBSTER, the pioneer grocery merchant of Great Falls, and one of her representative business men, is a native of White Water, Wisconsin, born October 21, 1850.

The Websters were among the early settlers of the State of New York, and great-grandfather, Samuel H. Webster, served as a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Webster's father, Thomas Webster, was born in Syracuse, New York, in 1824. He removed to Michigan in 1840, and was married there to Miss Anna Mandlin, a native of southern Indiana, by whom he had two children. His wife died in 1885. After her death, he crossed the State line into Indiana, where he has a farm and where he resides with his son, retired from active life.

Mr. Frank W. Webster was educated in the public schools of Indiana, and remained with his parents until he attained his majority. In 1871 he became a clerk in a grocery store, and later was employed as traveling agent for a wholesale grocery house of Akron, Ohio. In 1881 he engaged in the grocery business in Jamestown, Dakota, in partnership with Mr. Orrin Churchill, which business they still continue, Mr. Churchill having it in charge. In 1887 Mr Webster came to Great Falls and opened a grocery establishment here. The firm keep a well-selected stock of goods, do a large and successful business, and have acquired the confidence and good will of the citizens.

Since coming to Great Falls, Mr. Webster has been thoroughly identified with its affairs and history, and has done much to promote its interests. He built the commodious residence which he and his family occupy. He is also interested somewhat in mines at Neihart, this State, and the firm of which he is a member has large tracts of wheat land in Dakota.

Mr. Webster was married, January 1, 1878, to Miss Ella M. Pike, a native of Niles, Michigan, and daughter of Henry Pike of that State. They have one son, Henry, fifteen years of age.

Mr. Webster's political views are in harmony with the principles advocated by the Republican party. He has never aspired to office, and the only official position he has ever held has been that of school trustee. He and his wife are charter members of the Episcopal Church at Great Falls, and are active and efficient in sustaining it. Mr. Webster being one of its Wardens.

BENJAMIN F. STRANGE, a prominent farmer of the Bitter Root valley, was born in Garrard county, Kentucky. His ancesters were among the early settlers of Virginia. The maternal grandfather, Jefferson Roberts, was a Captain in the Colonial army during the Revolutionary war, and rendered his country much valuable service. Jacob Strange, father of our subject, was born in Kentucky. By his first marriage he had four children. He was afterward married in his native State to Miss Catherine Roberts, a native of Kentucky, and they subsequently moved to Kansas. Mr. Strange died in Brown county, that State, in 1856, at the age of sixty years, leaving a wife and five children, three sons and two daughters. During the following year the eldest son broke his back at a barn raising. In 1860 a severe drouth caused the crops to be a complete failure and the settlers became destitute of food. Mr. Strange and his brother William were obliged to go sixty miles with oxen to the supply station, provisions having been donated by the more fortunate settlers of Minnesota and other States. The journey was made through a destitute country and they received only 150 pounds of graham flour. They afterward made a trip to Missouri, receiving 1,000 pounds of middlings. While returning home they became snowbound two weeks, and their oxen not being able to draw the load, they uncoupled the wagon, putting a part of the supplies on the front wheels, and leaving the remainder. After waiting for the thaw they found the rivers very much swollen, for the first time on the trip; also a few antelope, and plenty of wolves, prairie dogs, and prickly pears. After we camped, I went back into the hills, about a mile, to look for a buffalo, but, in place of them, I found fresh tracks of twelve horses going up the river. I suppose it is a war-party of natives, and, if so, I expect they will visit us to-night in search of our horses. There are plenty of geese and ducks along the river. Several of our horses seem about to give out, and, among them, 'Parkie,' Bell's mare. Saw grape-vines here for the first time since I left California. Camped in a small bottom near the river, under a steep bluff. Traveled fifteen miles.

"28th.—Left the river to our right and went through the hills for about four miles to avoid a rocky point. After we came to the river again we had a splendid road down the bottom to camp. The river bottoms along here average about two miles wide. The cottonwood timber not so good as it was yesterday, but there is more scrubby yellow pine and cedar on the hills. I have not seen any fir timber since we left the divide. Along here, the timber only extends from one to ten miles back from the river on both sides. On the south side there is a snowy range parallel with the river, distant from forty to fifty miles, with high table-land, intersected by couleés, between it and the tim-and at one place the stream was surging against the bridge with such force that it seemed as if they must fall at any instant. While crossing, the wagon pole fell from the ring in yoke, ran under the planking and stopped the oxen. The bridge being narrow, they were obliged to unyoke the oxen and carry the yokes and wheels back to extricate the pole. To add to their fright and anxiety the accident occurred at night, and in the morning they learned that the bridge had gone down. The brothers at last reached home in safety.

In 1862 Mr. Strange enlisted for service in the late war, entering Company I, Thirteenth Kansas Volunteer Infantry. He served to the close of the struggle in the Western Division, took part in the battles of Cane Hill, Prairie Grove and Van Buren, was in numerous skirmishes and participated in the running fight from Fort Gibson to a distance of 250 miles, in which there was considerable fighting every day. Mr. Strange received a sunstroke during that forced march, from which he was disabled during the ensuing winter, and has never fully recovered. After receiving his honorable discharge at the close of the war, he returned to his home in Kansas. On New Year's day, 1867, he was married to Miss Amanda Goff, and they continued to reside on a farm in Kansas until May 1, 1874. Four children were born to them in that State, one of whom, Franklin, died at the age of two years. With their three children, James A., Fred and William A., Mr. and Mrs. Strange came direct to the Bitter Root valley, arriving at this place $50 in debt. Mr. Strange first found work for two months at $40 per month, then purchased a team, wagon and harness, and located a ranch six miles north and one mile east of Corvallis. At the close of the first year he owned a good team, three cows and had twenty acres of land fenced. He sold that farm with the intention of leaving this country and loaded his goods on a wagon, but on calmer reflection decided to relocate. Mr. Strange then purchased 160 acres of land six miles from Corvallis, for which he was indebted to the amount of $350. During the first year he raised grain, at 50 cents per bushel, sufficient to pay the entire indebtedness. In 1881 he sold that place and purchased 160 acres of his present farm, to which he has since added until he now owns 640 acres. Three hundred and twenty acres of the place is located three miles from his home. Mr. Strange is engaged in general farming, stock and fruit raising.

Six children have been added to the family in Montana,—Luke, Sarah M., Mary C., John, Anna B. and Luella. John died at the age of ten years, and the two eldest sons are married and reside near their parents. Mr. and Mrs. Strange have two grandchildren. Our subject and wife are members of the Methodist Church. The former has been a life-long Republican, and is a member of the Masonic fraternity. His entire life has been one of unrelenting toil, and he has not only secured a valuable property, but has the respect of the entire community.

Moses Morris, a Montana pioneer of 1864, and one of her most widely and favorably known business men, was born in Prussia, May 5, 1844. His ancestors had long been residents of that country. His father was engaged in mercantile business there up to the time of his death, which occurred when he was forty-four years of age. The Morris family was composed of ten children, six of whom are still living, and three sons and three daughters are residents of the United States.

Up to the time he was fourteen years old Moses Morris remained in his native land, attending school, and at that early age he emigrated to America. In this country he began his business career by peddling dry goods and notions, but as he did not like the business he followed it only a few months. In 1860 he traveled from Leavenworth, Kansas, to Denver, Colorado, making the journey, a distance of 700 miles, on foot. At Denver he engaged in merchandising, and was there and at Pike's Peak until ber near the river. On the north side from where the timber runs out are nearly level plains as far as a person can see, and not a mountain in sight in the north and east. Saw only three antelope and four elk to-day; game is getting very scarce, and I fear we will have to do without fresh meat until we find buffalo. Lent Bell a horse, so his mare Parkie could rest. I am afraid she will go up the spout. I killed a very large eagle where we are camped to-night; therefore we call it 'Eagle Camp.' Underwood, Blake and Bostwick went hunting in the evening. Underwood killed an antelope. Hauser went into the river to swim across, but weakened. Our camp is a little below a creek entering on the south side. During the day, we passed several creeks, on both sides of the river, that are dry at present, but have plenty of water at some time of the year; but whether from rain or snow I am not able to determine. Anybody who will take grasshoppers for bait and go fishing can catch abundance of white fish. We have traveled twenty miles to-day. About an hour before sundown, while lying around camp resting after the fatigues of the day, we were startled by hearing several guns fired in a clump of cottonwoods across the river, and immediately afterward we saw about 1864. His brother was also here in business with him. In 1864, having saved some money, they sent to Europe for their mother, two sisters and the youngest brother, who joined them at Denver. In the meantime the business operations of these enterprising boys had prospered, and in addition to their successful business in Denver, they also had two branch stores in Montana. In 1863 a devastating fire at Denver burned them and others out, and the subject of our sketch injured himself while fighting the fire and trying to save property. His brother came on to Virginia City and opened the store; he followed in 1864 and in 1865 they all located in Helena, where they opened a general merchandise business, which they continued until 1889. In addition to their large wholesale business in Helena, they were also engaged in stock raising and mining, and indeed, were interested in many of the various enterprises which have brought about the development of the country. Their prosperity far exceeded their highest expectations. Their venerable mother lived to be eighty-two years of age. Her death occurred at Denver, November 7, 1882.

Moses Morris was one of the organizers of the Merchants' National Bank of Helena, of which he served as one of its directors, and in which he is still a stockholder. He also helped to organize the Electric Light Company, the Gas Company and the Street Railway Company, and has been an important factor in otherwise improving and advancing the interests of the city. The Morris brothers built the St. Louis block, the first fine building in Helena. The iron cornice and plate glass for this building they shipped from St. Louis at a great expense. Thus they were the pioneers in the fine architecture which followed and which has made Helena the beautiful city it is. There were with them in this enterprise Fred Gamer and Colonel A. M. Woolfolk. In 1867 they built the first plastered residence in the city. In politics Mr. Morris is Republican. He has served as Alderman and as President of the City Council of Helena. To this last place of honor he was elected when the Democrats had a majority. Little of his time and attention, however, has been given to political matters, and he has frequently declined to accept nomination for important State offices.

Mr. Morris was married in 1878 at St. Louis, Missouri, to Miss Ema Anson, a native of Missouri and a daughter of Adolph Anson, a prominent merchant of St. Louis. They have had three sons and two daughters, the sons having died. The daughters are Ester and Erma. He and his family reside at their pleasant home on the corner of Ewing avenue and Eighth street.

Mr. Morris is a member of the Emanuel Congregation and has aided in the building of their temple, which is an ornament to Helena. In the absence of the Rabbi, he has on funeral and other occasions conducted the services. Mr. Morris was made a Mason in 1865 in Helena Lodge, No. 3, A. F. & A. M., and that fall he was made Senior Deacon of the lodge. Since then he has taken great interest in the order and its work. In 1867 King Solomon's Lodge was organized and he was one of its charter members. He received the appointment of Senior Deacon, and in 1870 was elected Senior Warden and was acting Master during the year. In 1871 he was elected its Master, to which office he was re-elected continuously for fifteen years. In 1889 he was elected Junior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of the State at Great Falls; in 1891, at the session held at Butte, was elected Deputy Grand Master of the Grand Lodge; and in 1892, at Deer Lodge, was elected Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Montana, which exalted position he is now filling with great credit to himself and to the highest satisfaction of the order. He also belongs to the Scottish Rite, having received its thirty-second degree; is a noble of the Mystic Shrine; has been Warden and Venerable Master, and served three terms; and is now also High Priest of the Chapter.

James L. Hamilton, a prominent business man of Anaconda and Butte, came to Montana in 1870.

He was born December 16, 1852, in Wisconsin. His thirty Indians fording across. They came on a run, vociferating 'How-dye-do,' and 'Up-sar-o-ka,' which latter means 'Crow Indians,' in their language. By the time they were fairly in camp we had our horses all tied up, and every man prepared for emergencies. They first inquired who was our captain. I told them, and asked which was their captain. They showed me three, one big and two little ones. The large chief told me to have my men put all our things in the tents, and keep a sharp look-out or we would loose them. I then gave him a small piece of tobacco to have a grand smoke, and I also found that one of them, a very large man with a big belly, could talk the Snake language, and he was at once installed as interpreter. They (the interpreter and chiefs) sat down in a circle and requested the pleasure of my company. I complied with the invitation, and our party soon stood guard over our horses and baggage, while I smoked and exchanged lies with them. It would take me a week to write all that was said, so I forbear. Meanwhile the other Indians began disputing with each other about who should have our best horses. I requested the chief to make them come out from among the horses and behave themselves, which he did. At eight P. M. I father, William Hamilton, a native of Scotland, was married in that country to Miss Jean Lindsay and had three children in Scotland. In 1851 he emigrated with his family to America, settling at Milwaukee, where his wife died, in 1856. In 1864 he crossed the plains to Montana, where he engaged in mining and in working at his trade, shoemaking, in Virginia City, until the following spring, when he moved to Helena, where he continued in business until 1869. Then he went to Pipestone Park, where he owned diggings, and followed mining until 1875, at which time he came to Butte and opened a boot and shoe store and met with good success in his trade until he met with an accident, which caused his death. He was crushed by a wagon in a gateway. For his second wife he had married Miss Kate Shadair, who now survives him. By his wife one child was born in this country, the subject of this sketch, and of the four only two are now living. Besides him the other living member of the family is Mrs. Elijah Bakter.

Mr. James L. Hamilton received his education in Stoughton, Wisconsin, and when seventeen years of age came to Montana and began the life of a miner at Pipestone. He was engaged in mining most of the time until 1876, acquiring a thorough practical knowledge of the business. He then turned his attention to merchandising, and in this line his trade has grown to large proportions, and at the same time he is still engaged in mining. In 1875 he purchased in Butte the ground on which the Windsor hotel now stands, and the next year he erected thereon one of the first good buildings in town. In 1890 he built the Hamilton brick block, 30 x 70 feet, four stories and basement; and in 1892, in connection with the Wilson brothers, he built the Butte Hotel, 85 x 100 feet in ground area, with four stories and basement, at a cost of $80,000. It is the best-appointed and most modern appliances, is first-class in every particular and is one of the best hotels in the State, having a large patronage; in fact, it is considered the leading hotel in the city. The buildings referred to are all adjoining on Broadway. Messrs. Largey, Curtis and Hamilton intend to erect another building, to fill the space below the Butte Hotel, on Broadway during the coming season.

In his political principles Mr. Hamilton is a Democrat. For four years he was County Commissioner of Beaver Head county, and he also filled the position the same length of time in Deer Lodge county. He is still largely interested in mines, owning a fourth interest in the Keokuk, the Crystal and the Welcome and various others. From the two first mentioned a considerable amount of ore has been taken out, and the others are considered good prospects.

Mr. Hamilton is a member of the I. O. O. F., is esteemed as a reliable citizen and a man of excellent business judgment.

Hon. William McDermott, of Butte City, Montana, was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, June 24, 1850.

His father, Michael McDermott, was a native of county Galway, Ireland, born September 10, 1810. He was liberally educated in his native land and also in England, and was master of a number of languages. He married Miss Catharine Fitzgerald, a native of county Clare, their marriage occurring in Canada in 1842. Nearly the whole of his life was spent as a civil engineer. He was Civilian Surveyor on the Ordinance Survey of Ireland, Parochial Surveyor of England, Certified Land Surveyor for Great Britain and Ireland, Provincial Land Surveyor for Canada, and was Civil Engineer of Chicago and Milwaukee. He was a member of many scientific societies and was the author of a work entitled the "Surveyor's Manual." Both he and his wife were members of the Catholic Church. She died at the age of forty-five years and he lived to be seventy-seven. Two children were born to them in Canada and three in the United States. All are living. The oldest, Michael, is a prominent contractor in Chicago and is a stockholder in the elevated railroad of that city. Another son, Andrew, is a merchant of Denver, Colorado.

put on double guard, and at ten P. M. all but the guard retired to rest. The Indians wandered around camp all night, like evil spirits; and such an odd night's sleep as we had! Every few minutes somebody would have to rush out of his tent and capture something which the Indians would steal from under the tents, in spite of the guard, and this, too, when it was bright moonlight. * * * At daylight I aroused the party, and we proceeded to ascertain our losses; everybody had lost something. As soon as we began to pack up, they at once proceeded to forcibly trade horses, blankets, etc., and to appropriate everything they wanted. I saw that the time had come to do or die; therefore, I ordered every man to be ready to open fire on them, when I gave the signal. With one hand full of cartridges and my rifle in the other, I told the Indians to mount their horses and go to their camp. The weakened, got on their horses and left. Two of the chiefs, however, very politely requested to accompany us, which we refused, but they came along.

One of them had a letter from Agent Schoonover, of Fort Union, which stated that the bearer was 'Red Bear,' one of the principal chiefs of the Crow nation. We gave them some supper, etc. He then presented me with a black horse; said he was all right; friend of ours, etc. Had a long talk with him, in the course of which he asked about old Jim Bridger, and also Peter Martin, desiring to know where they were and why they never came to see the Crows any more. The other Crows had told me that the Sioux had attacked the Fur Company's express-boat from Fort Benton, near Fort Union, and some said they had taken it, and others said they had cluded to go along. After the Indians fed on the fragments of the breakfast, the chiefs and five others offered their robes, which we refused, I saying to keep them until we meet again. After breakfast they went back and we traveled on down the river. After sundown we saw two

The daughter is now Mrs. Dennis O'Connell of Chicago. William was their third born.

He was educated in Chicago and in early life worked at engineering with his father. Later he became a bridge builder, and had charge of the building of bridges on the Northern Pacific Railroad between the Red river and the Missouri river. He also had charge of the bridge building in Chicago after the great fire there, and did much other work. In 1874 he came to Montana and turned his attention to placer-mining in Jefferson county, where he met with fair success. He was also for some time employed as a millwright. In 1876 he built the Centennial mill in Butte City, and in 1878 he built his own mill, the Clipper, which was built for custom work. Ever since he came to Montana he has been more or less interested in mines. He was a part owner of the Bell mine, the one that gave Butte City its first boom. Mr. McDermott and Jefferson Lavelle paid $2,250 for this mine and subsequently sold it to C. T. Meader for $100,000. It proved to be a rich mine. He next owned the Liquidator at Meaderville, a copper mine, which he sold to the Boston & Montana Company for $65,000. He built in connection with that property the Liquidator Concentrator. Mr. McDermott has also invested in real estate here and elsewhere, and everywhere his investments have proved a success. At Spokane Falls, Washington, he owns both town property and ranches. In 1889 he built the McDermott hotel in Butte City, at a cost of $95,000, not including the furniture. This hotel is 86 x 132 feet, has three stories and a basement, and is fitted and furnished with every modern improvement. It is without exception the best hotel in Montana and is a credit both to the builder and to the city in which it is located. Mr. McDermott is now running it himself.

Politically, he is a Democrat, and has ever taken an active interest in public affairs. He has served for years as an Alderman of Butte City and at one time represented his county in the State Senate. Before the expiration of his term as Senator he received from President Cleveland the appointment of United States Marshal for the State of Montana. In this latter position he is now serving.

Mr. McDermott was married July 18, 1884, to Miss Nora L. Murphy, a native of Illinois and a daughter of Timothy L. Murphy of that State. They have two children, Ora Martena and Morgana Bland, named for the two statesmen who are the champions of silver in the United States Senate. Upon being informed that they had little namesakes in this Western city, each of these distinguished gentlemen wrote to Mr. McDermott a nice [illegible] of the honor.

killed some of the crew, but had not captured the boat. I asked Red Bear if it was so, and he replied that a rumor to that effect was current among the tribes, but he did not know whether it was so or not. I hope it is only a Crow lie, for Worden and Powell were on that boat, and it would grieve me to know the Indians had injured them, or anybody else, for that matter. It rained a little about dark. When we retired to rest I gave orders to the guards not to kill, but take prisoner, any Indians that they might discover prowling around after our horses, and sure enough, about 11 P. M. they discovered one crawling up to two of our best horses that were tied to the same tree. They watched and waited until they got dead-wood on him, and then captured him and called me up. I introduced him to Red Bear as one of his good Indians, who, he had just been telling me, would not annoy us any more, as he had told them not to, etc. He said the man was crazy, had no ears, etc. The old story, anything to excuse him. We had already had a practical illustration that stealing or attempting to steal is far from being considered a crime by even the best of them. We turned

ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS, deceased, was one of Montana's most eminently successful pioneers. He was born in Wilbraham, Massachusetts, April 25, 1819. His father, Asa Davis, emigrated from Wales when a young man and settled at Wilbraham, where he was married and reared a family of thirteen children. He died in the eightieth year of his age.

A. J. Davis at thirteen years of age left home to make his own way in the world. He spent three years in the employ of a Boston dry-goods house. They then, when he was only sixteen, advanced him a small stock of goods and he went to Madison, Indiana. There he sold the goods at a profit and paid for them, and the house became so convinced of his ability and integrity that they ever afterward trusted him for all he wanted. Later he drifted down the Ohio to the Mississippi and traded in towns on the east side of the river. In 1839 he was in Iowa, had several little stores at different places and spent his time in going from one to another and looking after them, making his headquarters at Fairfield.

During all his merchandising he evinced great aptness in making trades for almost any thing and always turning the property to advantage. He was in Iowa during the Black Hawk war; became well acquainted with the chief, and from the Indians made a purchase of 800 acres of land located on the west side of the Des Moines river, a property which still belongs to his estate. This property, notwithstanding it was valuable, was always a bill of expense to him. When asked why he did not dispose of it, he said he would keep it for a "nest egg" to fall back upon if necessary. Some years after he purchased it he had a distillery there.

In 1852 Mr. Davis crossed the plains to California. He met with only fair success, however, and soon afterward returned East. Then he made a second trip to California and on this occasion explored the country along the coast as far as Puget Sound. From there he made his way back and arrived in Montana in 1863. Seeing the great demand for miners' supplies here, he engaged in bringing merchandise from the East with ox teams, and continued this business successfully for several years. At that time whiskey was in Montana a staple article and brought high prices, while at his distillery in Iowa the price was low. In 1866 he brought a whole ox train loaded with the products of the establishment to Montana. He became the owner of two grist mills at Gallatin, and he had traded for a number of old quartz mills which he obtained cheap; so, in 1870, he built a foundry at Helena, in which he could repair and fix up these mills, and in this way he realized large profits. While engaged in this business he became the owner of a number of quartz mines in the vicinity of Butte City, among which was the Lexington. In 1877 this mine, under his development, showed such a wealth of both silver and gold that he built a mill to treat its ore, and he make out of it no less than $300,000. During all this time he had also been extensively engaged in raising cattle. In 1880 he and his partner sold off their cattle, and from this industry realized another $300,000.

In 1881 Mr. Davis sold his Lexington property to English and French capitalists for $1,000,000 cash, they agreeing to incorporate the property and expend not less that $500,000 in additional machinery and appliances and give him fifteen per cent. of the stock of the new company. They incorporated under the title of the Societe Anonyme Des Mines de Lexington, and did all that they promised. The mine was operated at a large profit up to the recent decline in silver, and it is still being operated; not, however, to its full capacity.

During that same year, 1881, Mr. Davis became the organizer of the First National Bank of Butte. He was also a large stockholder in the First National Bank of Helena. In 1882, on account of impaired health, he made a tour of Europe, returning in the spring of the following year, much improved and rested. In 1884 he purchased the rest of the stock of the First National Bank of Butte, assumed control of it and devoted nearly the whole of his time and attention to its affairs, and its business greatly prospered under his management. In the meantime he had been picking up a number of mining claims, and in 30th.—Traveled all day down a valley between terraced table-lands and buttes; valley about eight miles wide; snowy range to the west about eighty miles distant; no other snowy mountains in sight; low, open country around base of mountains. Camped three miles below the mouth of a large stream coming in on the south side; suppose is to be Clarke's Fork; plenty of buffalo grass here; many elk and some antelope in the valley; saw two big-horn rams on high cliff by the river. I accepted Red Bear's black horse last night and presented him my white mare in return. I thought at the time I had a little the best of it, but I found during the day's travel that I was mistaken. No timber, except cottonwood, and that very scrubby, within thirty or forty miles of here. Plenty of geese and ducks along the river. We are so far away from any high mountains that all the party feel discouraged and lonesome. Give me the mountains in preference to plains, where one can see more level ground than he can ride over in a day. The ground is literally covered with young crickets. Between them and the grasshoppers I am

1887 sold them in a bunch to the Butte & Boston Mining Company for about $750,000 in cash, he retaining one-half of the stock of the new company. This transaction practically ended his mining enterprises, as his health continued to fail. He died at his home in Butte City, March 11, 1890, in the seventy-second year of his age, of paralysis of the brain.

Mr. Davis had never married, and at his death the greater part of his estate, comprising several millions of dollars, passed into the hands of his brother, John A. Davis. He was considered the first millionaire of Butte City. He left an estate valued at about $7,000,000. His business career as a whole was indeed a most successful one, and from the foregoing paragraphs it will be seen that he was a man of great versatility. Merchandising, mining and banking, in his hands always proved a success. He was among the first to realize that Butte City had in store for it an era of great prosperity, and he held himself ever ready with his energy and his means to push on such undertakings as would bring about this prosperity—all without asking or wishing the slightest recognition or the least public favor. He was of a genial nature, and was a good converser. He had a great fondness for children, and always found a welcome wherever he went. While he was careful of his own expenses, he was generous to others, without a particle of ostentation, and many a needy family received help from him and never knew its source. In his death Montana, and especially Butte City, sustained a heavy loss; but he had passed his three score years and ten, the time allotted to man, and his death was quiet and peaceful.

James Duncan Leys, the proprietor of the popular Leys' jewelry store, of Butte City, located in the Owsley block, corner of Main and Park streets, is a native of Scotland, born May 22, 1867. Through both lines of ancestry he is of Scottish descent. His parents were David and Margaret (Duncan) Leys, and he is the second born of the children, four in number.

He was educated in the college at Aberdeen and for seven years worked at the jewelry business with his father. In the fall of 1886 he emigrated to America and was employed at Eldorado, Kansas, and in Keokuk, Iowa; was with Ayers & Son, wholesale and retail jewelers, until 1889, at which time he came to Helena and on to Butte City and opened out his business in a small way on Granite street, but within thirty days, as he was moving to upper Main street, the city suffered one of the most disastrous fires in its history. However, courageously persevering, he drove his business along with a steady rein, and prospered. Seeing at length an opportunity of enlarging his business, he bought the jewelry business of D. Goldberg, on lower Main street, and on moving into that large store he opened a drug business on one side of the store, while he filled the other with his jewelry stock, and he prospered in both of these lines. By the year 1893 his trade had grown so large that he had to have more room, and he moved his jewelry stock into his present large and elegant store, where he now keeps the largest stock of jewelry in the city. He manufactures a large amount of his goods from Montana gold and silver, and also souvenir goods for jewelers in Montana, Idaho, etc.

The year after Mr. Leys came to America his father followed, and the next year his mother and brother came. His father is now with him, in charge of the watch-repairing department. His brother-in-law, Alexander Christie, who is his partner in business, has charge of the books and collections.

Mr. Leys is a graduate optician and has built up a very large optical business in connection with his jewelry trade. He employs seven workmen in the jewelry store.

When Mr. Leys first began business in Butte, in 1889, he had only $1,200 capital; his jewelry stock now exceeds $30,000 and his drug stock $22,000. The trade in the latter class of goods is conducted under the name of Gallogly & Company, Mr. Leys being the "Company." They are young business men of talent and experience and afraid the grass will soon be used up. Course of river, six degrees north of east. Traveled fifteen miles.

"Friday, May 1, 1863.—About one o'clock last night Bostwick had his roan horse stolen while he and Geery were on guard. It was done by two Indians, one of whom showed himself, but not plainly enough to shoot at; and while the guards were both watching to get a shot at him, his companion crawled into the other end of camp and cut the horse loose, and got away with him without attracting their attention, and this too when the moon was nearly at the full and without a cloud. Verily, the Crows are world beaters, and words cannot do the subject justice. Fortunately, Bostwick was on guard himself, so he cannot blame anybody else with carelessness. Course of river nearly northeast. About 10 A. M. saw buffalo for the first time on the trip; turned into the river bottom and camped. After dinner, Bostwick, Underwood and I went out into the hills to kill one. When we got on the hills, about three miles from the river, we could see over a large extent of country, and there were buffalo in nearly all directions in bands of from two to nine. I think we saw altogether about 100. We were afraid our horses could not catch them, highly esteemed as citizens. Since his arrival in Butte City Mr. Leys has scored a remarkable success, and he has a bright future before him.

HON. WILLIAM W. DIXON, a resident of Butte City and an ex-member of Congress, is one of the ablest lawyers of the State; he has been a resident of Montana ever since 1866.

Mr. Dixon is a native of New York State, born in Brooklyn June 3, 1838. His father, George C. Dixon, was a native of England who came to America when twelve years of age, settling first in New York, became a lawyer and married Miss Henrietta Gourgas, a native of Massachusetts and of Swiss descent. Later he moved to Illinois and to Iowa, in which latter State he died in the sixtieth year of his age; his wife had died in her forty-eighth year. They had only two children,—a son and a daughter,—and Mr. Dixon is now the only survivor of the family.

The gentleman whose name introduces this sketch was educated in the public schools, and read law under the instructions of his father, being admitted to the bar in Iowa in 1858. After practicing there a short time he went to Tennessee and Arkansas, practicing his profession in the South for a year, and in 1862 crossed the plains to California, but he soon returned as far east as Nevada, where he remained four years and then came to Helena, Montana, where he followed his profession in connection with W. H. Clagett. Later he removed to Deer Lodge and practiced there until 1877. Next, he proceeded to the Black Hills and practiced law there two years, and finally, in 1881, he came to Butte, where he has since resided, acquiring a large and lucrative practice. He has acquired the reputation of being one of the best and most thoroughly read counselors in the State. He is the attorney for the Anaconda Mining Company, the largest in Montana.

All his life Mr. Dixon has been an advocate of the principles of the Democratic party, and for a number of years past he has improved large opportunities for doing his party good service. He is a power in political campaigns. He represented Deer Lodge county in the Territorial Legislature, was a member of both the constitutional conventions, was active in shaping the present constitution of the State and had the honor of being chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in which position he rendered the State great service in the development of Montana's very excellent constitution; and in 1890, by reason of his eminent ability and fitness, he was chosen by the people of the State to represent them in the Fifty-second United States Congress, a position which he filled to the highest satisfaction of his constituents.

On the 5th of August, 1874, Mr. Dixon was married to Miss Ida Wilcox, a native of St. Louis, and they have had but one child, William W., Jr., now sixteen years of age and at school in Georgetown, District of Columbia.

Mrs. Dixon is a member of the Catholic Church. They are both highly esteemed in social circles.

N. P. EVANS, County Commissioner of Deer Lodge county, Montana, first came to the Territory in 1865.

He was born in Pettis county, Missouri, June 27, 1857, son of Philip E. Evans, a Montana pioneer of 1864, whose history appears in this work and to which the reader is referred for the ancestry of the family.

N. P. Evans was eight years of age at the time he came with his mother and the other children up the Missouri river to join the father, and has a vivid recollection of the journey and the pioneer days in Montana. He was educated in the public schools of Deer Lodge and in the University of Missouri, and after completing his college course, taught one term of school in his native State. While in Missouri he was married, June 21, 1882, to Miss Sarah Ann Powell, a native of that State and a daughter of W. L. Powell, now of Deer Lodge, Montana.

After his marriage, Mr. Evans removed to California, where he was for a time foreman for P. D. Jones. He remained in the Golden State sixteen months, and at the

and on foot we could only get within about two hundred and fifty yards of any of them. Finally, I tried a shot at that distance. Shot him too high to kill dead, and away they went. We tried another band, and Bostwick and I both shot at one about two hundred yards. Both hit him, but he ran off with our lead. It was now getting late, so we concluded to run them. We started in about five hundred yards behind one, and in three-quarters of a mile he ran into a band of ten or twelve. I was riding a brown mare, bought from Robert Dempsey, and Bostwick and Underwood both led me for the first mile. After that I had it all my own way. I ran up to them and tried to pick out a fat one, but didn't know how; finally chose the largest; ran alongside, and let him have it behind the shoulder. He and three or four others left the band. I followed, and went to run up again, but he wouldn't stand it and charged me. Turning, I ran round ahead of him and shot him behind the other shoulder and down he went."

A summary of the journal to its close is as follows:

During the day, the party passed through groves of large cottonwood, saw some large rattlesnakes and many bull snakes; elk and end of that time came again to Montana, settling on the Little Blackfoot, near Garrison, where he farmed four years. He then purchased 160 acres of land, six miles south of Deer Lodge, and here he has since resided, devoting his energy to its improvement and cultivation, and also giving much of his time to the raising of fine horses. His father had for a number of years been interested in high-bred trotting horses, and after his death our subject purchased from the estate some of the stock. His horses are of Almont and Wilkes breeds, and among them is the celebrated Nutmeg Maid, dam of Ida D., with a record of 2:17½. Another noted steed, Don L., with a record of 2:28½, they sold for $3,000. From one of his fine mares Mr. Evans sold $7,500 worth of colts. For several years his horses took all the first premiums for speed in Montana.

Like his father before him, Mr. N. P. Evans is a stanch Democrat. In the winter of 1869–70, while his father occupied the position of engrossing clerk in the Territorial Assembly, he served as page. At this writing he is serving efficiently as County Commissioner. He is painstaking and obliging, makes an excellent official and has hosts of friends all over the county.

Mr. Evans' marriage has already been referred to. He and his wife are the parents of the following children: Philip E., Mary P., William Lucas, Edwin Wallace and Ruth Atwell.

HON. JOHN F. FORBIS, senior member of the well-known law firm of Forbis & Forbis, Butte, Montana, may be said to be a "product" of Montana, he having been brought up and educated in this Territory.

He was born in Platte county, Missouri, February 11, 1855, of Scotch and English ancestry, who were early settlers in New England. They removed to North Carolina and thence to Lincoln county, Kentucky, being there among the early settlers. Here the father of the subject of this sketch, Jonathan F. Forbis, was born January 27, 1816. He married America A. Perrin, whose people came originally from England and settled in Virginia and afterward in Kentucky. They had one child in Kentucky. In 1836 they removed to Missouri, where Mr. Forbis purchased land and engaged in agricultural pursuits, and nine other children were born in the family.

In 1864 they crossed the plains with oxen, and settled at Virginia City, where Mr. Forbis engaged in mining until the following year. They were resident there during the most exciting times, and the high prices of provisions, when flour cost $100 a sack and other things in proportion. In 1865 they removed to Helena, where Mr. Forbis had a farm, and was active and prominent in public affairs; was for many terms one of the County Commissioners for Lewis and Clarke counties, and also for a number of terms a Representative in the Territorial Legislature. He was a thoroughly good citizen, a kind husband and father, and an obliging and neighborly man, having the respect of all who knew him. He and his wife were valued members of the Christian Church. He died of apoplexy, January 26, 1877. His good wife is still living, now in the seventy-seventh year of her age, greatly beloved by her children, all of whom are living, and are among the most respected of the citizens of the State in which they have so long resided and led most worthy lives. Their eldest daughter is now Mrs. E. H. Irvine, of Butte; their second daughter is now the wife of Dr. W. L. Steel, of Helena; the third married Prof. J. R. Russell, of Butte, and the youngest of the daughters is the wife of Mr. M. B. Brownlee, a banker of Butte City. The sons are: W. P. Forbis, a mining operator; John F. and James W., lawyers.

John F., the subject of this brief review, was their fifth child, and was in his ninth year when the family arrived in Montana. He received his education in the Helena public schools, read law under the guidance of Judge Knowles, and was appointed Deputy Clerk of the District Court under O. B. O. Bannon. He was admitted to the bar in 1877, and began his practice at Butte, and from 1881 to buffalo plenty; along the river were many houses, some built like lodges, most of them oblong or square. On May 3, the party camped three miles below Bompey's Pillar. On reaching this natural monument they found the names of Captain Clarke and two of his men cut in the rock with the date July 25, 1806. There were also two other names inscribed under date May 23, 1834, viz., Derick and Vancourt, supposed to be attached to the Bridger, Sublette, or Bonneville party. Up to May 4, the expedition struck only one spring between the Yellowstone and Missouri. On May 5, they camped at the mouth of the Big Horn. Geery, while bathing in the river was swept down into the whirlpool, where the two rivers meet. Owing to his strength and swimming powers he escaped drowning. On May 6, 1863, five men were detailed to cross the Big Horn, and survey a town site and ranches; while another party of four was sent forward to prospect. On this day, James Stuart and four others cut their names on sandstones up the river. On May 7, the party started up the west bank of the Horn, traveling eighteen miles that day. On the 8th they traveled fifteen miles through a desolate country; on the 9th the remains of an Indian were found buried up a tree. On the 11th a party of three white men were observed three-fourths of a mile across the river; they neither answered nor halted; so that Underwood and Smith were dispatched to overtake them. A fry pan and a pack of cards were the only relics of this party found, as they fled with all speed.

This party, it afterward appeared, was J. M. Bozeman and John M. Jacobs and his little daughter, seven or eight years old. They were on their way from the Three Forks of the Missouri river to Red Buttes, on the North Platte river, looking out a route for a wagon-road, which they finally found, and which was afterward known as the Jacobs and Bozeman cut-off. They had been chased by a party of Indians a few days before, and when they saw and heard Stuart's party they at once took them for Indians, and did not wait to find out, but at once did their utmost to escape, with the result above stated. But two days later they came suddenly upon a band of seventy-five or eighty mounted Indians. Knowing they would be plundered of everything, if not murdered, and considering resistance hopeless, Jacobs managed to drop his rifle and bullet-pouch into the sage-bush before the Indians got to them. His anticipations were realized, for they were at once stripped of almost everything, and many were for killing them on the spot; but finally, after a stormy discussion, they were given three miserable ponies in exchange for their horses and turned loose, half-naked and without anything to eat. Moving slowly away, they waited until the Indians got out of sight, when they returned and found Jacobs' gun and bullet-pouch; but, unfortunately, the latter only 1889 was associated with Judge Knowles in law practice at Butte. When Judge Knowles became United States District Judge of the State, the present law firm of Forbis & Forbis was established, the gentleman whose name heads this sketch being the senior partner, and the other being his brother, James W. Forbis. This firm has acquired an excellent reputation in Montana, giving strict attention to the interests of their clients, meeting with flattering success, and they are now considered one of the most reliable law firms in the State. They are the attorneys of several large mining companies, as well as for some of the leading business and banking firms of the State. Their office is in their own block on Broadway.

Mr. Forbis, of this sketch, is a member of the Silver Bow Club, and has always been a Democrat. He represented his county in the Territorial Legislature of 1879, 1883 and 1885, and he is at present a member of the Board of Education of the State of Montana.

He was married at Salt Lake City on the 22d of February, 1888, to Miss Mina Daft, a native of that city, and they have two children, viz: Margery, born April 5 1890, and John, August 4, 1893.

contained five balls at the time, and as they made all possible haste to get out of that dangerous neighborhood they did not stop so kill and dry any meat, and before they knew it they had passed out of the buffalo range, and meeting with bad luck in killing small game (which is usually the case when it is absolutely necessary to kill it), their five bullets were exhausted; and after severe hardships they finally got through to North Platte in a famishing condition. It was doubtless the intention of the Indians to have them die of hunger before they could get out of the country. Poor Bozeman, after whom the flourishing county seat of Gallatin county was named, was murdered by the Indians near the mouth of Shields river, on the Yellowstone, April 20, 1867. On May 12, the expedition crossed Box Elder creek, and entered a country of box elder groves and wild plum trees.

"May 13, 1863.—Last night Smith and I had the first watch, and about eleven o'clock the horses at my end were scared at something, but it was very dark and I could not see anything. I though it might be a wolf prowling around the camp. A few minutes before eleven o'clock I sat up and lit a match to see what time it was, and also to light my pipe, but at once lay

Hon. Albert L. Babcock, of Billings, Montana, stands in practical illustration of what pluck, perseverance and business ability can accomplish.

Mr. Babcock was born on a farm near Albany, New York, in 1851, son of William C. and Julia (Lawrence) Babcock. Several generations of his ancestors resided in New York. He grew to manhood in the State of Illinois, where he received a limited education in the common schools. Thrown upon his own resources at the early age of fourteen, he began to do for himself and ere long developed rare business qualities. Believing that opportunities for success were greater in the growing towns on the frontier than in Illinois, in 1882 he came to Billings, Montana, in advance of the railroad, and engaged in the hardware and implement business. Subsequently he became a member of the Babcock-Miles Hardware and Implement Company, which firm continued to do business witth marked success until 1892, when Mr. Babcock purchased the interest of Mr. Miles. The firm is now known as the Babcock Hardware Company, and besides the establishment at Billings branch houses are also maintained at Red Lodge and Castle, Montana.

It was in 1885 that Mr. Babcock entered public life That year he was appointed a member of the Board of County Commissioners of Yellowstone county, was elected to the same office in 1886, and served in that capacity until 1889, being chairman of the board during the latter year. Being elected to the State Senate in 1889, he resigned his position as Commissioner. In 1892 he was elected to the Lower House of the General Assembly of the State. During his service in the Senate in 1890 he was one of the eight formidable Republicans that composed the "dead lock." He is the present Republican nominee for State Senator, having received the unanimous nomination for that position in September, 1894. He served on the staff of Governor White and Governor Toole and is now a member of Governor Rickards' staff, with the rank of Colonel. In Masonic circles Mr. Babcock has gained marked distinction. He is a member of Ashlar Lodge, No. 29, A. F. & A. M., the chapter and commandry of Billings, and Algeria Temple, of Helena. He was elected Eminent Grand Commander of Knights Templar of the State of Montana in October, 1893. In connection with his business life, it should be further stated that he is president of the Yellowstone National Bank of Billings, vice president of the Billings Water & Electric Light Company, and that he is concerned in various other business enterprises. Mr. Babcock was married in 1877 to Miss Nettie Packer, daughter of Rev. Packer, a prominent minister of the Christian Church at Peoria, Illinois. They have one child, Lewis C.

Mr. Babcock is a thorough gentleman, genial and unassuming in manner, always approachable and ready to discuss business matters and public questions with the humblest citizen.

Amos Buck, one of the most prominent merchants of Stevensville, was born in Sandusky, Ohio, February 26, 1844, and is of English and Swiss descent. His ancestors were among the early settlers of Pennsylvania, and were soldiers in both the Revolutionary war and the war of 1812. His father, George Buck, was born in Lebanon county, Pennsylvania, in 1799, and was married in 1818 to Susan Shell, who was born in that county in 1800. They moved to Ohio in 1828, and in 1850 located in Monroe, Michigan, where Mr. Buck died in 1858. His wife survived until 1892, and attained the age of ninety-one years. Her father, who was a soldier in the war of 1812, lived to the age of ninety-eight years. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and Mr. Buck was identified with the Dunkard Church. They had seven sons and six daughters, and five sons and two daughters still survive.

Amos Buck, twelfth child in order of birth, was raised on a farm in Michigan. He attended the public schools during the winter, and afterward entered the State Normal School at Ypsilanti. After spending two years and a half as clerk in a store at Bellevue, Ohio, he drove four down again; we were both lying flat on the ground trying to see what made the horses so uneasy, and to this we owe our lives. Just then I heard Smith whisper that there was something around his part of the horses, and a few seconds later the Crows fired a terrible volley into the camp. I was lying between two of my horses, and both were killed and very nearly fell on me. Four horses were killed and five more wounded, while in the tents two men were mortally, two badly, and three more slightly wounded. Smith shouted, 'Oh, you scoundrels!' and fired both barrels of his shotgun at the flash of theirs, but, so far as we could tell next morning, without effect; he most probably fired too high. I could not fire, for the horses were in the way. I shouted for some one to tear down the tents, to prevent their affording a mark for the murderous Indians a second time. York rushed out and tore them down in an instant. I then ordered all who were able to take their arms and crawl out from the tents a little way, and lie flat on the ground, and thus we lay until morning, expecting another attack each instant, and determined to sell our lives as dearly as possible. When at last day dawned we could see a few Indians among the rocks and pines on a hill some five or six hun-yoke of oxen across the plains, walking the entire distance. His company was composed of twenty-two teams, and there were many emigrants on the road. They spent 117 days in making the journey from St. Joseph to Virginia City, Montana, arriving at that place August 15, 1864. Mr. Buck was engaged in gold-mining during that fall, making as high as eight dollars a day and on one occasion, with three others, took out $1,600. The creek was mined for a distance of sixteen miles in length, and at places one mile in width. He was at that place during the trials and hanging of the "road agents," and was a warm friend of Colonel W. F. Sanders and the great work he did for Montana in ridding the Territory of the lawless element that threatened the life of every successful miner. From Virginia City Mr. Buck went to Last Chance Gulch, having mined on what is now the main street of Helena, and was interested with four others in a claim 100 feet square, from which they took out about $20,000. He next mined at Lincoln Gulch, Deer Lodge county, until 1870, where he lost all his former earnings, and went down the Blackfoot river to Cedar creek.

In 1872, in company with his brothers, Henry and Fred, Mr. Buck purchased a stock ranch seven miles north of Stevensville, where they remained two years; but in the spring of 1874 he abandoned that occupation and purchased the mercantile business of Joseph Lomme in this city. The building was one story high, 20x40 feet, and contained a $2,500 stock of goods. The Buck Brothers purchased the produce of the valley, which they hauled to the mining camps, Amos doing a large amount of the outdoor work. The partnership continued until 1886, when our subject and his brother George organized the firm of Amos Buck & Company, and two years later they incorporated the Amos Buck Mercantile Company, with a paid-up capital of $30,000. George Buck is president of the company, Mr. J. Frank Burrough, vice president; and our subject, secretary and treasurer. They conduct a general mercantile business, occupy three large stores and several warehouses, and also handle large quantities of farm products. In addition to their mercantile business the company own the Whippoorwill and Last Chance silver mines, and a farm of 520 acres, on which they raise large quantities of grain. They are also largely engaged in buying and shipping grain.

Mr. Buck was married September 12, 1883, to Miss Rosa V. Knapp, a native of Albion, Michigan. They have one son, Charles Amos, now seven years of age. In his social relations, Mr. Buck is a member of the Masonic fraternity, of the I. O. O. F., the A. O. U. W. and the Eastern Star. Politically, he votes for the candidates of the Republican party. Mrs. Buck is a worthy member of the Methodist Church.

WILLIAM L. HILL, County Treasurer of Silver Bow county, Montana, was born in Devonshire, England, March 24, 1862, educated in his native country and learned the watchmaker's trade there. In 1883 he came to America, and for the first year was employed in the Waltham watch factory. In 1884 he came to Butte, and after working at his trade for a short time he lost the job. Not being satisfied with idleness for a single day, he went to work with pick and shovel, mining at Walkerville. Soon, however, he obtained a situation as bookkeeper for the Northwestern Forwarding Company. After that he went to the Coeur d'Alenes, but, not liking the situation there, he accepted a position as bookkeeper for the J. W. Lowell Wagon Company at Dillon. Later he returned to Butte and was employed at whatever he could find to do, most of the time unloading cars. As late as 1886 he was engaged at ranch work, when a mule team ran away with him and broke his leg. On recovering from his wound he secured a position as mailing clerk in the post office, which place he continued to occupy for two years. He was next engaged in the railroad mail service, with headquarters at Helena, where he remained till the spring of 1889; then Colonel Kessler made him his deputy County dred yards away watching to see the effect of their bloody work.

"An examination of the wounded presented a dreadful sight. C. D. Watkins was shot in the right temple, and the ball came out at the left cheek bone; the poor fellow was still breathing, but insensible. E. Bostwick was shot in five different places—once in the back part of the shoulder, shattering the shoulder blade, but the ball did not come out in front; three balls passed through the right thigh, all shattering the bone, and one ball passed through the left thigh, which did not break the bone; he was sensible, but suffering dreadful agony. H. A. Bell was shot twice—one ball entered at the lowest rib on the left side and lodged just under the skin on the right side; the other ball entered near the kidneys on the left side and came out near the thigh joint. D. Underwood was shot once, but the ball made six holes; it first passed through the left arm above the elbow, just missing the bone, and then passed through both breasts, which were large and full, and just grazing the breast-bone. H. T. Geery was shot in the left shoulder-blade with an arrow, but not dangerourly hurt. George Ives was shot in the hip with a ball—a flesh wound; S. T. Hauser in the left breast with a ball, which

Treasurer, and this position he held during the Colonel's incumbency of the office, to 1892, when Mr. Hill was chosen by the Republican party as its candidate for the office, for which in the election he ran considerably ahead of his ticket, his majority being about 600. He has now served in this office for five years, and has given the most entire satisfaction, being painstaking and obliging.

October 12, 1892, he married Miss Mamie Palmer, a native of Virginia City, Nevada, and a daughter of Charles M. Palmer, now of Butte City. Mr. Hill is a member of the society of the Sons of St. George, a Master Mason and First Lieutenant of Company F, National Guards of Montana. He stands high in the estimation of the people of Butte City.

DAVID J. BAILEY, Treasurer of Missoula county, was born in Butts county, Georgia, January 16, 1844, and is of English ancestry. His maternal great-grandfather was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and on the paternal side the family were early settlers of the South. His father, James Bailey, was born in South Carolina, in 1804, was a planter by occupation, and spent his entire life in the South, his death occurring in 1848. He married Eliza Higgins, a native also of South Carolina, and they had ten children, six of whom are now living. The mother died in 1848. The parents were members of the Baptist Church.

D. J. Bailey, the sixth child in order of birth in the above family, attended school at Indian Springs, Georgia, at La Fayette, Alabama, and at Princeton, Kentucky. His first business experience was that of a clerk in a store at the latter place; afterward he followed the same occupation at Evansville, Indiana, and came from that place to Montana August 23, 1865. He took a ranch thirteen miles from Virginia City, but after a year and a half there sold his property and moved to that city, where he conducted a boarding-house during the winter. In the following spring, in company with Lott & Jones, he opened a store at Twin Bridges, Madison county, where he remained a year and a half, and then conducted a dairy business at Corinne, Utah, a short time. In 1870 Mr. Bailey brought a band of cattle to Bozeman, Montana; was afterward appointed deputy Treasurer of Gallatin county, under his brother, William H. Bailey, held that position two years; next taught school for about two terms; was also a bookkeeper for a time; in 1874 opened a store at St. Louis, Jefferson county; in the following year engaged in the same occupation at Springville same county; was elected to the office of Justice of the Peace; followed farming three years in Meagher county; purchased and improved a farm of 160 acres in Jefferson county; and in 1884 accepted the position of clerk in the old Rogers House in Missoula, and held that position five years.

October 5, 1889, he was elected Treasurer of Missoula county, and he is now serving his second term in that office. He is now the Democratic nominee for Clerk and Recorder. (The State Constitution does not allow one to be County Treasurer more than two consecutive terms.) He has identified himself with all the interests of this city, has invested in property, and has built a good residence in Missoula.

July 24, 1864, Mr. Bailey was united in marriage with Miss Rosa Pierce, a native of Kentucky. They had one daughter, Bertha, now the wife of E. J. Owenhouse of Bozeman. The wife and mother died in 1871, when the daughter was only nine months old. The loss of his beloved wife proved a sad affliction to Mr. Bailey. June 14, 1876, he married Miss Josie M. Pauley, a native of Wisconsin. To this union have been born four children,—William Warren, James Edwin, David J. and one deceased in infancy. Mr. Bailey has been a life-long Democrat, has given close attention to the duties of the office, and is one of Missoula's most reliable citizens. More than $1,400,000 have passed through his hands during his terms of office, and he has performed the great trust in a most satisfactory manner.

passed through a thick memorandum book in his shirt pocket, and stopped against a rib over his heart, the book saving his life. Several others had one or more ball holes through their clothes. We held a council of war; concluded that it was impossible to return through the Crow country, now that they were openly hostile; therefore, determined to strike for the emigrant road on Sweetwater river, throwing away all of our outfits except enough provisions to do us to the road. Watkins was still breathing, but happily insensible. Poor Bostwick was alive and sensible, but gradually failing and in great agony. With noble generosity he insisted on our leaving him to his fate, as it was impossible to move him, and equally impossible for him to recover if we remained with him, and which, he said, would only result in all of us falling victims to the fiendish savages. He asked us to hand him his trusty revolver, saying he would get even on the red devils when they came into camp. We gave it to him and a few moments later were startled by the report of his pistol, and filled with horror when we saw he had blown out his own brains. Oh, noble soul! May you sit in judgment on your murderers on that great Last Day! Bell, who declined to have his wounds probed, saying he was mortally wounded (as we all thought he must be from where he was struck), now said he would try to ride, and we put him on a horse and started, leaving camp a few minutes before twelve o'clock. We traveled slowly on account of the wounded, and camped to get supper before sundown, having traveled nearly five miles nearly southeast. Started again 4.30 p. m., and went east five miles, thence south ten miles to camp, at 10 P. M., on the Big Horn mountains.

"May 14, 1863.—Traveled twenty miles toward nearly all points of the compass; general course west, 25 degrees south. Very rough mountain all the day; had difficulty in getting through the snow. After going five miles we stopped at a spring for breakfast, and then went twelve miles more and halted for supper. Here poor Geery shot himself accidently. He and another man laid their rifles on the ground, and while unpacking the horses some blankets were JOHN S. MILLER, one of Helena's most prominent young business and professional men, was born near Freeport, Illinois, the son of Eli W. and Catharine (Devore) Miller, who gave him as good common-school education as was in their power. The ambition of the young man demanded something better, and at the age of sixteen he began teaching school, hoping thereby to earn sufficient means to secure for him a collegiate course. He succeeded in entering the University of Missouri, where he attended the academic department and graduated in the medical department. Afterward he took a special course in the American Medical College at St. Louis, Missouri. After receiving his diploma he practiced his profession in Iowa some six years, meanwhile studying law, and was admitted to practice in the same State where he resided until 1889, in which year he moved to Montana. Since coming here he has continued in the practice of law, obtaining recognition not only as a thorough, able and conscientious lawyer, but also as one of the most competent business men of the State, who has by his own endeavors attained success.

In 1892 he organized the Merchants and Miners National Bank of Phillipsburg, in which he is at present a stockholder and director; and he is also the president of the Queen City Mining & Developing Company. He is a half owner in the Merrill-Miller Mining Company, which among other possessions own the Liverpool and Washington mines, valuble properties near Clancy, Montana; and and he is also one of the owners of the Diamond Gold Hill properties.

Mr. Miller was married at Correctionville, Iowa, to Miss Abigail M. Kellogg, a daughter of Morris and Sarah A. Kellogg, a highly esteemed lady, and he has three daughters, namely, Zula E., Stella A., McKinley (Maxie), and a son, Merrill Angus.

In political principles Mr. Miller is a thorough Republican and in hearty sympathy with all the measures of that party, and he has done a great deal of work for the advancement of the cause. While he is constantly attending to his private affairs, laboring for a material income, he is, nevertheless, looked upon as a man capable of attaining success in whatever enterprises he may undertake, or position to which he may aspire. He is a thorough home man, devoted to his wife and children, not being a member of any secret organization or lodge, spending evenings and spare time from business at home with his family.

thrown down upon the guns, and Geery shortly after, going to get his, took it by the muzzle and drew it toward him. The blankets, or something else, drew back the hammer sufficiently to discharge the rifle, and the ball struck him a little above the left nipple, shattering his shoulder and giving him a mortal wound. In spite of our united entreaties, he shortly after blew out his own brains, so that we could bury him and leave the place before dark. This was the most heart-rending scene on the whole trip. We buried him, and went three miles, and camped long after dark, hiding our horses among the pines. The travels of May 15 and 16 were uneventful save the discovery of Indian smoke signals on the 16th and plenty of rattlesnakes. Went out with Blake in search of a place to cross the cañon; but failing to find a crossing, returned to camp. Shortly after starting east, I noticed what I took to be an Indian smoke signal. Seeing it a second time I was satisfied that it was a signal, and called the attention of the party to it, and shortly after we all saw several distinct signals, which I knew were intended to gather the Indians together for an attack on us. Yet there was no other route possible for us but the one right up the ridge and trail along which the signals were made.

MOSES CLEMENS, deceased, was one of the successful farmers of Missoula county. He was born in Canada, November 14, 1833, of French descent. His father, Isaac Clemens, was born in Canada in 1813. He married Miss Harriet Guinie, who was born in that country in 1817, and they had sixteen children, all of whom grew to years of maturity, and thirteen are still living. The mother died at the age of fifty-nine years, and the father departed this life at the age of sixty-four years.

Moses Clemens, the subject of this sketch, was raised to manhood in his native place. May 25, 1855, he went to Wisconsin, where he followed lumbering five months, followed the same occupation at Black River eight years, and in 1864 went to California, via the isthmus. After a few months spent at Sarsville, in the Redwood country, Mr. Clemens followed mining at Centerville, Idaho, for which he received $6 per day. He arrived at Frenchtown, Montana, July 28, 1865, where he was among the pioneer settlers, and purchased a squatter's claim for $800. Mr. Clemens was an industrious, reliable and successful farmer, and added to his original purchase until he finally owned 600 acres of the finest land in the county. He erected a good residence, and finally had a village of farm buildings. He died April 6, 1894.

December 17, 1877, our subject was united in marriage with Miss Susan Miller, a native of Canada, but came to Montana in 1874. She is a daughter of William and Janet Miller. Mr. and Mrs. Clemens had five children: William, Charles M., Annie, John C. and Henry R.

Mr. Clemens was a Democrat in his political views, and held the offices of Justice of the Peace, County Commissioner and County Assessor. The family are members of the Catholic Church. They are people of the highest integrity of character, and are widely and favorably known by all the early settlers of Montana.

JERE SULLIVAN, proprietor of the Choteau House at Fort Benton, came to Montana in 1865, and has since been one of her active and influential citizens.

He was born in the village of Millstreet, county Cork, Ireland, March 4, 1843, of Irish ancestry. His father, Jeremiah Sullivan, was born and brought up in that country, and married Miss Johanna Clifford, a native of his own country. He was a small landholder, and had three sons and three daughters. They were enjoying a competency when the great potato disease and famine occurred, and while they were not starved to death they lost most of their property in that fearful calamity, and in 1850 the family emigrated to America, locating in the southeast corner of Ontario near the New York State line and six miles from the village of Dunnville. The country there was new and unimproved and times were hard, and they found it difficult to sustain themselves. There being no educational advantages there for the children, Mr. Sullivan sold out and moved into the village, where he worked at whatever he could find to do to support his family. They were devout Catholics. Mr. Sullivan was a quiet, modest man, possessing a loving heart and the habit of honesty and industry, living and toiling for his family until 1889, when he died, in his eighty-sixth year. Such had been his life that all who knew him esteemed him highly; indeed, too high a tribute cannot be paid to his memory. His wife still survives, being now seventy-six years of age. They had four children in America, making ten in all, and six of these are still living.

Mr. Jere Sullivan, the fourth child in order of birth and the eldest son, was seven years old when the family landed in America. At the age of sixteen years he became a clerk in a store, at $10 a month. James Buchanan was then President of the United States, and times were fearfully dull, the financial panic of 1857-8 occurring during this period; and the merchant failed, and Mr. Sullivan was thrown out of employment.

He then went to Buffalo, New York, to look for work, but found the task difficult. At length he engaged in steamboating between Buffalo and Chicago, having the position of porter, which he filled for two years. One of Reaching within half a mile of the mountain on the side of which the signals had been seen, saw that the trail ran right along the edge of a chasm, the mountain to the left being quite rocky and steep, and at one place there was a large perpendicular bunch of rock almost hanging over the trail. Back of and near these rocks was where we had seen the smokes. There was a faint trail that ran around behind this point. We all felt certain that we would have to fight our way past this point. So we called a halt for preparation, all dismounting except the badly wounded, who were to bring up the rear. All of the extra ammunition was packed on a mule and placed in the rear in York's charge. He was armed with Bell's shotgun, and instructed to kill the animal as soon as the firing began in front, so that our ammunition could not be lost by a stampede of the animals, and we could fall back to the mule when we needed a fresh supply. I felt that it would be much better to send one or two men on the dim trail around behind the rocks, but did not like to order any one to go, as they would receive the whole fire of the Indians, if they were there, as we supposed. After we had prepared ourselves for battle and advanced a few steps, Hauser came up and said: 'Jim, his sisters having married and settled at St. Louis, he visited her, in the autumn of 1860, and remained there during the winter. Returning to his home he followed the lakes in different capacities until 1864, when he again went to St. Louis. March 1, 1865, he boarded the steamer Benton to make a voyage up the Missouri river, and tried his luck in the gold mines of Montana. He reached Helena August 3, after a voyage of seventy-six days; and there for six long years he dug with pick and shovel for gold in the various gulches and mining camps. It was a hard life, but he made some money.

In 1871 he became interested in the Payne hotel at Helena, and conducted it until 1874. Then he went to Fort Shaw and opened and conducted a restaurant there till 1879, at which time he sold out and came to Fort Benton, purchased the Choteau hotel, and conducted it with success. In 1888 he leased the Grand Union hotel at Fort Benton, refitted it and ran it three years. He has continued his interests in mining to some extent, and has invested in real estate at Fort Benton, Great Falls and Kalispell.

Mr. Sullivan has also taken an active interest in the politics of the country, and has been a zealous and efficient worker for the Republican party. Has been elected Mayor of Fort Benton for two terms in succession. In 1889 President Harrison appointed him Collector of Customs, in which capacity he served four years, and was an efficient and successful officer. He is a member of the A. O. U. W., and at present is the Master Workman of his lodge. In religion he is a Catholic, and he is a kind-hearted and good citizen.

In 1880 he married Mrs. Mary Savage, widow of John Savage. They led a most happy life together; had five sons and two daughters, and at the birth of the last child Mrs. Sullivan died. She was a most faithful and loving wife, an indulgent mother and devout Christian, being a member of the Catholic Church. She was greatly beloved by all who knew her. Her death was a severe affliction to her husband and children. Words cannot give any adequate idea of her loss to the family. The children were all born in Fort Benton, namely: Nora J., Jere J., George H., Early D., John F., Eugene A. and Mary Agnes.

WILLIAM JASPER LINDER, another one of Montana's pioneers, and now one of her successful farmers and stock men, dates his birth in Greene county, Illinois, August 2, 1836. Of his life and ancestry we make record as follows:

Mr. Linder's great-grandfather Linder was born in Germany and his grandfather, Jacob Linder, was born in the State of Tennessee. Jacob Linder removed from Tennessee to Illinois at an early day and settled in Greene county, of which county he subsequently became Sheriff. His religion was that of the Baptist Church. He reared a family of five sons and two daughters, and lived to be eighty years of age. His eldest son, George Washington Linder, the father of our subject, was born in Tennessee, May 14, 1803; married his cousin, Miss Mary Linder, a native of Tennessee, born October 4, 1802. They had a family of six daughters and two sons, of whom five are still living. Early in their married life they removed to Greene county, Illinois; later to Iowa, and in 1864 to Montana. In Beaver Head valley, Montana, August 28, 1881, George W. Linder died. He was a veteran of the Black Hawk war, and in every respect was a man of the highest integrity. His wife survived him until December 24, 1889. She was a Methodist.

Their son, William Jasper Linder, is the third of their seven children. He was reared to manhood in Des Moines county, Iowa, and remained with his parents until after he had attained his majority. April 7, 1859, he was married in Iowa to Miss Catherine A. Bayles, a native of Adams county, Ohio, and they continued to reside in Iowa until 1864, where two children were born to them —Cordelia C. and Hattie N. April 16, 1864, accompanied by his wife and children, he started for Montana, making if we all go under these rocks in this way, they will kill the last one of us the first fire.' To which I replied: 'I know it would be better to send two men above and behind those rocks, but as it would be nearly certain death, I don't feel like sending anybody, although I think it it would enable most of us to get through; but I feel that we might as well all take the chances together.' 'If you think it will increase the chances of more getting through, I'll go,' was Hauser's answer; and, sure enough, he mounted his pony, cocked his rifle, and spurred off. Underwood, seing him start, said: 'If Sam's going, I'm going too;' and as his left arm was useless because of the wound he received in the night attack, he took his bridle in his teeth, and with his cocked revolver in his right hand, spurred after Hauser. When they disappeared behind the rocks, a pang passed through my heart, for I felt that they would probably never reach the other side. We all hurried along, expecting every instant to hear the firing at Hauser and Underwood, and then at ourselves; but we reached the open ground beyond, where they joined us, without a shot being fired. Why they did not attack us here is a mystery, and I can only account for it by supposing that they failed to collect in sufficient force to the journey in a train composed of 154 wagons and 300 men. They reached Powder river on the 7th of July, were there attacked by the Sioux and Cheyenne Indians, and a brisk fight was kept up all day, the result being that ten whites and about seventy Indians were killed. After this the emigrant train proceeded on its way, and without further molestation landed safe at Virginia City, September 15, 1864.

For five years Mr. Linder was engaged in mining at Alder Gulch and during that time took out large quantities of gold, but the expense of operating the mines was great and although he took out a deal of gold he saved but about $1,100. He then moved to Beaver Head valley, just below Point of Rocks, where he pre-empted 160 acres of land, homesteaded 160 acres and took a timber-culture claim of 200 acres. This property he still owns. He lived there, engaged in raising hay, grain and stock, until March, 1887, when he came to his present ranch of 400 acres, located six miles southwest of Twin Bridges. Here they have since resided in a most delightful home. Their children, born in Montana are as follows: Lewella F., wife of C. A. Dillet, of the South Bowlder valley; Anothy Vernon, Idaho; William Wesley, engaged in the stock business on Milk river; and Austin Arthur, with his parents. Their oldest daughter, Cordelia C., became the wife of Leander Goetschins, and had two children, one of whom is deceased. The other, Edna May, resides with her grandparents, Mrs. Goetschins having died May 31, 1883. The other daughter who crossed the plains with them is now the wife of Charles Green and lives in Anaconda.

Until recently Mr. Linder has affiliated with the Democratic party, but on account of its action on the silver question he has severed his connection with it and now gives his support to the Populist party. He is a member of the A. O. U. W. Both he and his wife belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church, are kind-hearted and hospitable, and are as highly esteemed as they are well-known in the valley where they have so long resided.

PRESTON B. MOSS, Cashier of the First National Bank of Billings, Montana, was born in Paris, Missouri, in 1860, a son of David H. and Melville E. (Hollingsworth) Moss. The paternal family were of English ancestry, and emigrated from Virginia as pioneers to Kentucky. They were also among the early settlers of Missouri. David H. Moss practiced law for several years and was elected to the office of Prosecuting Attorney, but, preferring a business and home life, resigned that position. He invested his wealth in the banking business in Paris.

Preston B., our subject, attended the public schools and the Kemper Family School at Boonville, Missouri, and also spent one year at Harvard University, After completing his education he spent a short time with his father in the bank, after which he engaged extensively in the lumber business, owning yards in various towns in southwestern Missouri. Mr. Moss came to Billings in 1892, placed considerable money in the First National Bank of the city, became its vice-president, and in March, 1893, assumed the duties of cashier, succeeding W. A. Evans. The bank was organized in 1884.

In 1889 Mr. Moss was united in marriage with Miss Mattie Woodson, a daughter of George W. and Iantha (Jackson) Woodson, of Paris, Missouri. The father was a merchant by occupation, and was related to ex-Governor Jackson, of Missouri. Mr. and Mrs. Moss have two children—Woodson J. and Cullie. In his social relations, our subject is a member of the Masonic fraterity, Billings Ashlar Lodge, No. 29, Chapter No. 6, and Aldemar Commandery No. 5. Politically, he supports the Democratic party. Mrs. Moss is a member of the Christian Church.

JOSIAH H. RAY, one of the most prominent citizens of Glendive, was born in Portage county, Ohio, in 1826. His parents were Patrick and Margaret (Koonce) Ray: paternal ancestry, Scotch; maternal, German. He was educated at Hiram College, with James A. Garfield. In 1849 he went to Wisconsin, where he engaged in farming and mercantile pursuits, and where he was married in 1852, do so. None of us ever expected for a moment that we would get through without a battle, and at a great disadvantage, too; but they are a superstitious, cowardly set, and I believe they are getting rather afraid of us, thinking that our 'medicine' is very strong; for, in the first place, they were amazed to find that they had not killed us all in the night attack, and then our sallying out and defying them to come and fight us the next morning, astonished them still more, and our calm and deliberate way of getting ready and moving slowly off, convinced them that it would be dangerous to come within our reach, and now, to-day, our two men riding so boldly, almost among them, and cutting them off from the rocks, from the top of which they would have so great an advantage, seems to have demoralized them so that they were afraid to commence an attack, for fear they would get the worst of it. * * *

"May 28.—Traveled thirty miles. Came in sight of the old emigrant road to California, and Oregon road at noon. We made a lucky hit coming across from the Popo Agie river. The way we came is the shortest and best. We struck Sweetwater river, sixteen miles below Rocky Ridge, and camped for dinner. Found plenty of colors in loose gravel on the bars. Started after dinner (3 P. M); crossed the river, and went south two miles, where we came in to Angelia M. Hopkins, daughter of Robert Hopkins, a lineal descendant of Stephen Hopkins, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, from the State of Rhode Island. Her mother was a lineal descendant of General Bartholomew of the Colonial period. Mr. Ray and wife have four children,—three daughters and a son: Emma E., Maggie M., Minnie M. and J. H. Ray, Jr., who is engaged in mercantile business in Glendive.

Mr. Ray located at this place in 1881, and conducted a hotel for one year, when he was elected the first Superintendent of Schools of Dawson county. He found the educational features of the county in their incipent stage and the schools unorganized. He at once proceeded to organize a thorough system of schools. The area of the county at that time was nearly 28,000 square miles. The handsome brick school building at Glendive was erected under his administration. He was County Superintendent of Schools for four years, and he has also filled the office of Justice of the Peace for seven years; and the latter position in this State entails a vast amount of business, as it fills the place of probate court in other States. He has also held the position of United States Court Commissioner for ten years, and he is also in charge of the United States Signal Service of the Weather Bureau at Glendive, and is special correspondent for the Government Agricultural Department. He is a close observer, and finds that the range of temperature is greater in the Yellowstone valley than elsewhere in the United States. February 1, 1893, the temperature was forty-six degrees below zero at Glendive, and in July following the mercury stood at 115 in the shade.

Politically, Mr. Ray is and has been a consistent Republican. He voted for the first Republican President, and for every one since. He is a member of Glendive Lodge, No. 31, A. F. & A. M., a charter member, and has filled all the chairs in that body.

MAJOR JOSEPH L. HORR.—Few men have been more active than Major Horr in preparing Montana for civilization. In his make-up are found the characteristics of the true pioneer,—good judgment, bravery and courage, courage guided by caution in that degree which inspires others with confidence and constitutes the one important quality of a safe leader of men.

Major Horr was born in Dundas, Ontario, Canada, in April, 1838. He was the eldest son of Captain Leonard and Harriett (Latshaw) Horr, who were born in New York and Ohio respectively. They resided in Canada until Joseph L. was fourteen years of age, when they removed to Dubuque, Iowa, where he grew to manhood, receiving a common-school education. He entered the regular army in the summer of 1861, enlisting in the First Battalion of the Thirteenth United States Infantry, of which General William T. Sherman was then Colonel, and in which General Phil. H. Sheridan was Captain. Mr. Horr was made First Sergeant of Company C, commanded by Captain E. C. Washington, and he rose successively to the rank of Second Lieutenant, First Lieutenant and Captain. He was brevetted Captain for bravery at the battle of Arkansas Post, and was likewise brevetted Major for his gallant service at Vicksburg, May 19, 1863. At the latter place he received six gunshot wounds. Two of the balls he carries in his body to-day.

During the early part of the war, while at Alton, Illinois, assisting in the irksome duty of guarding Confederate prisoners, Sergeant Horr was offered and strongly urged to accept the position of Adjutant of the Eighteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. Being anxious to go to the front, he accepted the position, but subsequently learning that his old battalion was in receipt of orders to proceed to the front, he reconsidered his action and returned to Governor Yates the appointment as Adjutant. The wounds received at Vicksburg rendered him for a time sight of telegraph poles. Our feelings at seeing the road and telegraph, after running the gauntlet of about four hundred miles through the Crow nation, can better be imagined than described. In another mile we came in sight of a train of horse teams about three miles ahead of us. The boys couldn't stand it any longer, but gave vent to their feelings in all kinds of motions and noises. We we were equal to a Chinese camp on a drunk, for noise. We followed the train slowly, and about sundown we came to their camp, at at the foot of Rocky Ridge, at the place that, in 1860, was called "Pacific City," although it only consisted of a single trading house When the train saw us coming, they were all in confusion, like a disturbed ant-hill, running in every direction and hallooing to one another. They finally formed in an irregular square in the road, in front of their stock, fully prepared to exterminate us. We rode slowly up to them, and before we came close enough to be killed decently, they discovered we were white men, and great was their rejoicing thereat, for I think the greater part of them had faith in the motto, "He who fights and runs away," etc. With the emigrants were four soldiers from South Pass station. It seems that this year there are unfit for active field service, yet he was anxious to be doing something for the Union cause, and was detailed by the Adjutant General of the United States Army on recruiting service, and in that line rendered valuable service to his country. He enlisted a large number of men at Chicago, Detroit, St. Louis and Keokuk. He was also on mustering duty at Chicago, Dixon and Springfield, Illinois.

Besides engaging in active service during the war, he served in various capacities with his command after the war. He dates his arrival in Montana in December, 1866, at which time his command was sent here and established Camp Cook. In October, 1867, he was promoted to a Captaincy. He was one of the original constructors of Camp Cook, and Forts Shaw and Ellis, performing at the latter place the additional duties of Quartermaster and Commissary.

In 1868 General Sherman, knowing him personally and his fitness for the position, appointed him purchasing and disbursing officer for the Crow Indians. He purchased and distributed Indian supplies to the amount of $50,000, and made three trips during the severe winter across the divide with large supply trains from Fort Ellis to the Crow Indian reservation. While stationed at Fort Ellis he recovered from the Indians several herds of stock which had been stolen from the settlers. His famous ride with his First Lieutenant, M. O. Coddiug, and fifty men from Fort Ellis, to Shields' river, to recover Contractor Hugh Kirkendall's herd of mules that had been stampeded and run off by Indians, was graphically described in the Helena Herald. His pursuing party, on overtaking the Indians at the crossing near the mouth of Shields' river, consisted of only himself and nine men, who were opposed by a war party of some thirty-four Indians. Firing immediately commenced with the result that twenty-seven head of mules were recovered out of the band of thirty-four that were run off, and, besides, nine Indian horses with empty saddles were captured.

He was thus engaged in active service for his country until December, 1870, when his old wounds, combined with continual exposure, so impaired his general health that he was compelled to retire from military life.

His experience and observation while in Montana gave him confidence in its future prosperity, and in 1882 he returned and prospected for coal, which he found near the river below Livingston, but not situated favorably for mining. He then proceeded up the Yellowstone to Cinnabar mountain, where he obtained some 480 acres of claims, containing valuable bituminous coal. In connection with his uncle, Dr. Asa Horr of Dubuque, he opened up these mines at Horr, expending some $30,000 in their development. These mines are now leased to the Park Coal & Coke Company, who have succeeded in establishing a large coking plant at this point. The mines are yielding a large annual output. Besides these mines, Major Horr has real-estate interests in Dubuque, Iowa; Denver, Colorado, and Phœnix, Arizona.

He was married in the spring of 1870, to Elizabeth R. Ogilby, a schoolmate, daughter of the late Joseph and Elizabeth (Read) Ogilby, of Dubuque, Iowa, and a niece of Thomas Buchanan Read, author of "Sheridan's Ride." Of their children we record that the eldest, Read, died at the age of ten years; Elizabeth R., a graduate of Grant Collegiate Institute, Chicago, is now taking a course at Vassar College; Irene is now at Lindon Hall, Poughkeepsie, New York, preparing herself for Vassar; Dora died at the age of three years.

Major Horr is a member of Hyde Clark Post, No. 78, G. A. R., at Dubuque. He also has a membership in the Masonic fraternity, Waubansia Lodge, No. 160, Illinois. Politically, he is a Republican, but is broad and liberal in his views. He is a courteous gentleman, a man of excellent business qualities and his career has been of success. Few men of his age have rendered their country more valuable service. He was engaged in active military duty nearly ten years, and notwithstanding privations, exposure and wounds, he is still well preserved.

soldiers stationed in small squads at intervals of about eighty miles all along the road, to protect the emigrants from the States to California and Oregon. As soon as we had unsaddled, and the soldiers found out where we were from, they gave us enough provisions to do us a week.

"Samuel T. Hauser, in addition to this entry, says: 'The soldiers of this train told us that a party of Indians had, the day before, succeeded in stampeding and running off about forty head of horses and mules from some trains about thirty miles below where we then were, and that they had pursued them for some distance, but could not come up to them. The Indians had gone north toward the Big Horn mountains, and in their flight had thrown away some flour, which the soldiers picked up, and wondered where they could have obtained it. This afforded proof positive that our captain was right, and that the same party who made the night attack on the Big Horn river had dogged us some four hundred miles to the road, for we had left several hundred pounds of flour in that ill-fated camp, which they of course at once appropriated; and, as we drew near the road, they, despairing of getting any advantage of us, had turned off and struck the road lower down, and made the above-mentioned raid upon

FREDERICK J. SCHULZ, proprietor of the Sheridan Hotel and an early settler of Montana, is a native of the province of Pummar, Prussia, born October 13, 1840, of Prussian ancestry. His parents were William and Mary (Koupp) Schulz. Early in life he was deprived of a father's aid and protection and when he was fifteen he accompanied his uncle to the United States, landing in New York city and going thence to Wisconsin. In Wisconsin he worked at farming, his first wages being $3 per month and his board. He continued at farm work in Wisconsin until 1866, at which time he crossed the plains to Montana. He drove a team of oxen for his passage and walked nearly twice the distance. On this journey they saw plenty of game, deer and buffalo, and were at times in danger of being run over by the latter as they came over the plains in great droves. Mr. Schulz shot a buffalo on one of these occasions. The Indians, too, often menaced the party, but, the emigrants being provided with a Government escort, the Indians were kept at bay.

After a journey of over five months, they arrived safe at Bozeman, Montana. Mr. Schulz remained there during the winter, he having secured a contract to dig a mill race. In the spring of 1867 he came to Alder Gulch, and at first worked in the mines for $5 per day. Later he got an interest in a claim and took out considerable gold. In this way he got his start. In 1869 he prospected without success at Gold Creek, worked for wages there for a time, then went to German Gulch in Deer Lodge county and secured a claim. This claim, however, did not prove a very profitable one, and his next move was to Ruby valley, where he purchased a squatter's right to 160 acres of land twenty miles below Sheridan. After working it a year he sold out at a small advance over the price and in 1876 came to Sheridan. Here he formed the acquaintance of Mrs. Julia McCoy, widow of Jesse McCoy, who had built the first hotel in Sheridan.

She was the daughter of Mr. Philpat, a native of Southampton, England, and when a little girl crossed the plains with her parents in the "hand-cart" emigration. This was in 1857. On the journey they got out of provisions and endured untold sufferings. Both her parents died of cold and hunger. Through the kindness of other members of the party she was taken to Utah, where she subsequently became the wife of Oliver Thomas, with whom she came to Montana in 1865. They had five children, namely: William; John; Katie, now Mrs. J. Moore; Ellis, wife of George Copp, County Commissioner of Madison county, Montana; and Rita, wife of Alexander Scott. Soon after the death of Mr. Thomas she became the wife of Mr. McCoy, by whom she had two children, Gilbert and Charles, both at home with her. She and Mr. Schulz were married September 15, 1878, and they have four children,—Harry, Burtie, Minnie and Frankie.

Mr. Schulz has enlarged and improved the hotel and is managing it successfully, sparing no pains to make his guests comfortable and at home. In connection with the hotel, he also owns and runs a livery stable.

Politically, Mr. Schulz is a Republican. He was elected one of the first Aldermen of the city and is also a school trustee. He is a Past Master of the A. O. U. W. and has been the Financier of his lodge during the past six years.

CORTEZ GOFF, a prominent and successful farmer of the Bitter Root valley, was born in Howard county, Missouri, July 31, 1838, of Scotch and German ancestors. They were among the early settlers of Virginia. The maternal grandfather of our subject, James Turpin, was a soldier in the war of 1812. Our subject's father, Moses Goff, was born in Virginia and brought up in Kentucky, where he was married to Miss Polly Turpin. They had three daughters and one son, the latter being the subject of this sketch. The father died in Andrew county, Missouri, at the age of eighty-seven years. He had been four times married, and was the father of nine children. Religiously, he was a member of the Christian Church. The mother of our subject died at the age of thirty-five years.

the emigrants, and returned to their country rejoicing.' At noon on May 30, the party camped on Rock creek, the same place where James Stuart found good prospects in 1860. That night they made the last crossing of the Sweetwater, where they found a post of twenty soldiers, in charge of a second-lieutenant, and an operator in charge of a telegraph station, on the north side of the river, the post being moved since 1860 from the south side. Here they met Louis Silvers, on his way to his old ranch at Rocky Ridge. The pioneer of Montana failed not to inquire after Reece and Granville Stuart, and all the pioneers he used to know in Missoula county.

"May 31, the party came up with Hardesty & Alexander's freight train, and camped with the freighters on Sweetwater, five miles from Pacific Springs. York found several acquaintances in the train. William McAdow, a brother of Rudd McAdow, was with the party. On June 2d this McAdow volunteered to accompany the expedition back to Bannack, while York agreed to go with the freighters to Salt Lake. On June 4, the expedition arrived at Fort Bridger. Here the party met a number of old mountaineers and acquaintances, a few of whom sent newspapers to Robert Hereford, Dick Hamilton and John Sharpe, then residing at Bannack. Here Jim Roup joined the expedition. [From Cortez Goff received only limited educational advantages during his youth. In 1855, when only seventeen years of age, he went to Kansas, where he began life on his own account, and was there married. In 1860 he went to Colorado, where he engaged in mining. In 1864 he moved to Polk county, Oregon, locating near the town of Bethel, but eighteen months afterward came to Montana. After following mining and dairying a number of years, Mr. Goff purchased a squatter's right to 160 acres of land in the spring of 1874, to which he has since added 160 acres more, and now has one of the best farms in the entire valley. In 1876 a good frame residence took the place of the log cabin, and the farm contains many other improvements.

Mr. Goff was married, in Kansas, to Miss Sarah Jane Strange, a native of Kentucky, and a daughter of Jacob Strange. Their eldest son, William, who was born in Kansas, accompanied them to this State, and now resides on an adjoining farm. Clarence, born in Montana, is still at home. Mr. and Mrs. Goff are worthy members of the Methodist Church, and the former supports the Republican party. He gives close attention to his farm interests, has acquired a competency, and is known as a man of the highest integrity and honesty.

Fred Buck, deceased, was for many years one of Stevensville's most enterprising and respected merchants. He had been, upon his first arrival in Stevensville, in 1868, and for five years afterward, the partner of his brothers, Amos and Henry Buck, and up to the time of his death, which occurred January 31, 1890, a partner of his brother Henry.

Fred Buck was born in Monroe county, Michigan, in the year 1840, and his history is almost identical with that of his brothers, a sketch of whom appears elsewhere in this work, with, however, a few exceptions. When the rupture between the North and South occurred, he was among the first to enlist in the service of his country, the date of his enlistment being in May, 1861. Immediately upon his entering service he was elected Corporal, and from time to time was promoted for his gallantry until he became Captain of his company. A truer, braver soldier than Fred Buck, never faced the enemy's fire.

Mr. Buck was married, in 1889, to Miss Dell Sybrant, a native of Pennsylvania. Their only child, Fred S., is now four years old, and is residing with his widowed mother.

In his business Mr. Buck was equally as successful as his brothers, and left to his widow and son a most delightful home and a snug fortune. He was a devoted and loving husband, and was ranked with Montana's best citizens, and his death was a sad bereavement, not only to his family, but also to a large circle of appreciative friends.

The Security Bank of Great Falls, Montana, was founded in 1890, with the following gentlemen as owners and officers: C. M. Webster, president; Robert Blankenbaker, vice-president, and W. A. Webster, cashier. Up to the present time the officers have continued the same. They do a general banking business, and thus far have met with most satisfactory success.

Hon. C. M. Webster, president of the Security Bank of Great Falls, is a native of Minnesota, the date of his birth being April 12, 1858.

Mr. Webster's ancestry is traced back to Suffolk county, England. Representatives of the Webster family settled in Massachusetts as early as 1632. They were pioneers of Ipswich, that State, and their descendants resided there for many years and were prominently identified with the early history of that portion of New England. The first of the family born on American soil was Nathan Webster, and a record of the family in a direct line on down to the subject of our sketch, is as follows: Nathan, born in 1646; Nathan (2), March 7, 1678; Abel, January 3, 1726; Nathan (3), November 25, 1753; Alpha, Novem-this date to the 18th, when the expedition came up with a party of immigrants for Beaverhead and Deer Lodge valleys, there is no record of matters relating to Montana].

"On June 19, the expedition reached Camas Creek. Mr. Stuart says under this date: 'Camped for dinner above crossing of Camas creek; found poor grass, but plenty of trout. About two miles from camp we overtook George Hillerman (alias 'Pie-biter'), who had a doleful tale to tell. He says he left Bannack shortly after we did last spring, to prospect on the head of Snake river. They could not agree about the route to travel when they were on Lewis Fork, and he and a man named L. F. Richie separated from the rest, who all went south toward Lander's road. They two went on up Lewis fork, and he says they found good prospects; cached their tools and grub, and started for Bannack City, and when near the valley on the river, Ritchie accidently shot himself, breaking his arm near the shoulder. Hillerman brought him to where the Salt Lake road leaves Snake river, where he died from mortification. Hillerman having no tools to bury him with, wrapped him in a blanket and two buffalo robes, and sent word by the expressman to get the first train to bury him as they came along by ber 14, 1799; and Charles C., May 1, 1824. Charles C. Webster was the father of Hon. C. M. Webster. He was born in Cabot, Vermont, and was married to Elizabeth Drew, daughter of Theophilus Drew, a native of Danville, Vermont, and a prominent citizen of that place. They became the parents of five children, four of whom are living, Charles M., being the eldest son and the third of the family. Charles C. Webster was a distinguished lawyer. For many years he was engaged in the practice of his profession in Minneapolis, Minnesota, and while a resident of that State served in both branches of its Legislature. Politically, he was a Republican; religiously, a Congregationalist. He died in 1893 at the age of sixty-nine years. His good wife survives him.

C. M. Webster was educated in the Minnesota University, where he graduated in 1882. Then he took up the study of law; was admitted to the bar in Minneapolis, and practiced his profession in that city for three years. In April, 1886, he came to Great Falls, Montana, and since that date has been identified with this prosperous Western town. Upon his arrival here, he accepted the position of editor of the Great Falls Tribune, he being its first editor. In this position he continued one year. At the end of that time he was tendered the secretaryship of the Great Falls Water Power & Town Site Company. He accepted the place and filled it most efficiently until the fall of 1890, at which time he resigned in order to give his time and attention to the Security Bank, of which he has since been president.

During his residence at Great Falls, Mr. Webster has been identified with all her interests, and has been an active factor in improving the Falls and in the upbuilding of the city, and while thus actively engaged has secured the good will and fullest confidence of her best citizens. Like his father before him, he affiliates with the Republican party. In 1889 he was chosen a member of the Constitutional Convention which formulated the present State Constitution. He served two terms on the City Council of Great Falls, all of that time as Chairman of the Council, and in 1892 was elected Mayor of the city, which office he filled in an able manner, showing himself to be the right man in the right place. He is one of the founders of the public library and a member of Great Falls School Board and of the State Educational Board.

Mr. Webster was married in 1884, to Miss Addie Pillsbury, the daughter of Governor Pillsbury of Minnesota. She was a most amiable young woman, and her untimely death, at the end of six months of happy married life, was a source of great bereavement to her husband and many friends. Eight years later, in 1892, Mr. Webster married Miss Helen Eloise Pettitt of Minnesota, daughter of S. I. Pettitt of Faribault, that State.

Socially, Mr. Webster is a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Elks.

HON. LEE W. FOSTER, a Montana pioneer of 1864, and for many years one of Butte City's most respected and successful business men, is a native of the State of Pennsylvania, born in Venango county, October 20, 1836.

Grandfather John Foster came to this country from the north of Ireland, and Grandfather Selders from Scotland, and both became early settlers of Venango county, Pennsylvania. The former reared a family of eleven children, and died in the ninetieth year of his age, while the latter lived to the advanced age of 104 years. John Foster's son, John, the father of Lee W., was the fourth born in his father's family, his birth occurring in Venango county in 1807. He was educated in Franklin, that county, and was there married to Miss Marcia Selders of that place. He was a tanner in early life, but later turned his attention to farming. He and his wife were members of the Presbyterian Church, and were honest and industrious people, respected by all who knew them. They reared a family of seven children. He died in 1860, and she survived him until 1865.

Lee Washington Foster was the third born in this family of seven. He was reared on his father's farm, there. Some circumstances afterward led to the belief that Hillerman had murdered him.

"20th.—Traveled twenty-eight miles. We were up by daylight; had breakfast, and started by five A. M. Where the road crosses Dry creek we found six mules and a horse. Four of the mules were tied together, two and two, and fastened to sage bushes. We untied and drove them along, thinking the owners must be ahead somewhere, and about two miles from the first water in Dry creek, now Hole in the Rock, we met two men on foot looking for them. They stated that at twelve last night all their animals, six horses and six mules, were stampeded. We found seven for them, so they only lost five horses. We stopped and had dinner with them, and let them have two horses to work, so they could make the trip to Bannack by traveling slowly. In the afternoon we traveled eight or nine miles, and halted for supper. After supper, we had intended to go about eight miles, but after going three miles we overtook our unfortunate wagons again, and they bribed us to stay all night with them on Lodge Pole creek (Pleasant valley), by telling us they would give us all the butter and eggs we could eat if we only would stay all night with them. That proposition struck us right where we lived, and we incontinently camped, and they were as good as their word.

"21st.—Traveled twenty-eight miles. Started at seven A. M., and traveled until half past eleven A. M., making sixteen miles, and then stopped for dinner on the first creek after crossing the divide (Junction Station). Plenty of gnats and horse flies. Saw a few antelope; very wild. Our horses were too poor to do any hunting, although we are starving for fresh meat. Jake Meeks passed while we were camped. He has been to Bannack City with four loads of flour, which was dull sale; had to store it until times are better. He told us there had been a big stampede from Bannack to some new diggings that have been struck on Stinking Water river. I am afraid it is our place that we found as we went out in April. After dinner we traveled ten miles, and camped for the night on Sheep Horn Cañon creek, near its mouth. Sorry working on the farm in summer and attending public school in winter. In 1859 he crossed the plains to Pike's Peak. For five years he mined there with fair success, but in a quartz-mining venture he had the misfortune to lose all he had made. From there he came to Virginia City, Montana, in 1864, and until 1871 was engaged in placer mining in German Gulch. In 1871 he opened his first store, a miners' supply store, and in 1874 he removed to Butte City, which at that time contained only about forty residences. His business increased greatly, keeping pace with the rapid growth and development of the town and surrounding country. Indeed, he sold goods all over Montana. For the accommodation of his business he built on Main street the first brick block in Butte City, it being 140 feet long, with a basement, and with a storehouse in the rear, fifty feet square. He did an immense wholesale business. Later, he built the Foster Block on East Park street, and a large warehouse at the Northern Pacific depot, and, in connection with others, platted a portion of the city and built a number of dwellings.

In 1881 Mr. Foster invested in property in Riverside, California, where he now has a valuable bearing orange grove. He also owns fruit land near Hanford, that State, having 300 acres in bearing peaches, prunes, apricots and grapes. In 1893 he raised 300 tons of raisins on this place. He also owns another 300-acre tract, which he has recently planted to fruit trees.

During all these years Mr. Foster has been more or less engaged in mining, and still has large mining interests. He retired from mercantile business in 1893, and since then divides his time between his handsome home in Oakland, California, and his residence in Butte City.

Mr. Foster was married in 1874, to Miss Jane R. Reznor, a native of Pennsylvania. They have one son, now seventeen years of age, and at school in Lawrenceville, New Jersey.

While he gave his strict attention to his business and was prominent in the business circles of Butte City for a number of years, Mr. Foster also took a commendable interest in the public affairs of the town, and did all in his power to promote its welfare. He helped to incorporate the town; was elected one of its first Aldermen and served two terms in that capacity, and was also elected and served for a number of terms as County Commissioner. In politics he votes for the candidates of the Democratic party.

I have not time to go and look for my big Powhatan pipe, that I lost about five miles above here in April, 1858. The road to Bannack City passes down through the Red Rock valley and Horse Prairie. The old road by Blacktail Deer creek is played out.

"Monday, June 22, 1863.—Traveled forty miles. Some of the party thought they heard somebody driving horses last night, and consequently we were all up early this morning. It proved to be a false alarm, as we found our horses all right. Started at five o'lock, and traveled until half-past ten A. M., when we halted for dinner above a point of rocks on Horse Prairie creek. Passed a lot of gamblers camped on Red Rock creek. They are en route for Denver, via Salt Lake and Fort Bridger. After dinner, packed up and pushed on to Bannack City, which we reached late in the evening. Everybody was glad to see us and we were glad to see everybody, altough our hair and beards had grown so, and we were so dilapidated generally, that scarcely any one knew us at first; and no wonder, for we had ridden sixteen hundred miles, and for the last twelve hundred without tents, or even a change of clothes."

Resuming our description of miners' customs, we will say that, passing over many new THEODORE H. KLEINSCHMIDT, one of Helena's most active and successful men, is well known as the cashier of the First National Bank of Helena.

He was born in Prussia, August 2, 1839, son of Louisa and Frederick Kleinschmidt, Lutherans in religion, who had five children. His father, a tanner, came to America in 1840, and in 1843 the rest of the family set sail for this country, expecting to join him here and make this their permanent home. They were doomed to disappointment, however, for on the very day they sailed the father died, and when they landed in New Orleans the mother learned that she was a widow and that her children were fatherless. She reared her family in St. Louis, where she still resides, being now past her eighty-third year. One by one her children died until now all have passed away except the subject of our sketch.

Mr. Kleinschmidt was reared and educated in St. Louis, where for some time he was employed as clerk in his stepfather's store, thus becoming thoroughly acquainted with mercantile business. May 2, 1860, he left his father's store to accept a position as bookkeeper in a savings bank in St. Louis, with which he was connected until 1862. That year he came out West to Colorado to represent his uncle's interest in a general mercantile business, the firm being Hananer, Erfort & Company, and in 1864 he came from Colorado to Montana with a stock of merchandise, making the journey to Virginia City with mule teams, and there opening his stock. He continued in the merchandise business there, however, only six months. He then disposed of his interests there and turned his attention to placer mining, which he continued until the spring of 1865. During the following summer he ran a store at German Gulch, in Deer Lodge county, and in the fall he sold out and returned to St. Louis. On this return trip he made the journey from Helena to Atchison,—a distance of 2,400 miles,—on horseback, riding the whole distance on the same horse. His arrival in St. Louis was early in December. In the spring of the following year he came back to Montana, making the journey from Atchison this time by stage, reaching his destination after twenty-four days and nights of uninterrupted travel.

Upon his return to Montana, he became interested with Governor Hauser and others in the organization of the First National Bank of Helena, with which he has ever since been connected.

Since coming to Helena, Mr. Kleinschmidt has been one of her most active and enterprising citizens, taking hold with a will, and giving his support to every measure that would conduce to her growth. He became one of the founders of the Helena Electric Light Company, of which he was treasurer; was one of the organizers of the Artesian Well Company; helped to organize the Northwest Cattle Company, and has long been largely interested in cattle, horses and sheep, and has been interested in mines and mining all over Montana. Besides this he has been treasurer of the Helena Building Association, the Helena Water Company, and the Spokane Ranch Company; is one of the directors of the Montana State Fair Association; is a member of the firm of Hill, Logan & Company, dealers in general merchandise; is president of the Micado Mining Company, and is president of the Bank of Townsend. At three different times since its incorporation he has had the honor of being elected Mayor of the city of Helena, in which important position he rendered faithful and efficient service.

For many years Mr. Kleinschmidt has been an active member of the Masonic fraternity, blue lodge, chapter, council and commandery; has taken the thirty-second degree, Scottish Rite; is Treasurer of the Scottish Rite Lodge; and has been Treasurer of the Morning Star Lodge for more than twenty years. He is also Past Grand Chancellor of the Knights of Pythias; was one of the organizers of the Presbyterian Church in Helena, in which he has served for years as Trustee; and is president of the Helena Board of Trade, having served as treasurer of the same. During his long business career in Helena, Mr.

discoveries of more or less importance when life went busily on day after day as described, we come to the quest for, and the finding of what might without irreverrance be pronounced, the Holy Grail. For many a good knight and true has drunk from that matchless mountain cup of gold and been made happy and blest.

The string of men roosting on the counter and kegs and sugar barrel down at the store had been busy planning or projecting a trip to the other side of the great divide, the Yellowstone country.

The Indians continued to give trouble in spite of the daily increasing number of newcomers, and it was agreed that the party must be a large one. Large bodies move slowly and this was not an exception.

One word about the Indians. Sentimentalists, honestly, too, had repeatedly told the world that the battlements of Montana were his last retreat, and all that sort of deviation from the exact facts. The truth is, he came here to steal and to fight; to kill and be killed. Lewis and Clarke tell us in their journal that they found the Shoshonees less than 100 strong. They found very few Indians from the lower Yellowstone to the upper Columbia; and these were all on the war-path, fighting one another.

Kleinschmidt has invested largely in both city and country real-estate. Among the numerous buildings he owns is his comfortable and attractive residence of brick and stone, in Lennox Addition.

Mr. Kleinschmidt was married in June, 1867, to Miss Mary M. Blattner, a native of St. Louis and a daughter of Jacob Blattner. They became the parents of six children, five of whom are living: Theodore E., Arthur B., Marie L., Eugene F. and Erwin H.

The history of this remarkably versatile man should not be brought to a close without some mention of his connection with the vigilance committee, and his record during the late Civil war. As president of the vigilance committee at German Gulch he aided in sustaining law and order and in ridding the country of the band of lawless marauders with which it was infested. Previous to this, in 1861, when the great Civil war came on, he enlisted in the Third Missouri Volunteers; was at Camp Jackson; served his time; was mustered out with his regiment; re-enlisted and was commissioned as First Lieutenant in Berger's Sharpshooters, but resigned his commission, and came to Colorado as above stated. He is of course a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and at present is Post Commander.

HENRY W. ROWLEY, secretary and manager of the Billings Water Power & Electric Light Company and one of the prominent young business men of this city, was born in Oneida county, New York, in 1858, a son of Nelson B. and Abigail (Coffin) Rowley. The father was a farmer and lumberman. When Henry was nine years of age his parents moved to Minnesota, where he grew to manhood, and received a good education in the common schools and the University of Minnesota. In the spring of 1880, when about twenty-one years of age, he was employed as civil engineer in constructing the Union Pacific Railroad, remaining with the company two years. Mr. Rowley was next engaged with the Minnesota & Montana Land Improvement Company, which purchased 30,000 acres of land from the railroad company, including the present site of Billings. They constructed the irrigating canal, thirty-nine miles in length, of which Mr. Rowley had charge of the survey and construction of the water way, and also continued in charge for one year after it was completed. After the organization of the Water Power Company, he was placed in charge of the construction and business management of the water works and electric plant. He owns valuable real estate around Billings, and has always taken an active part in the improvement of his city and county.

In 1883 our subject was united in marriage with Miss Harriet Meeker, daughter of Lewis Meeker, who was largely interested in flour mills in Minnesota. To this union has been born four children, viz.: Farr, Hugh, Helen and Harriet. Mr. Rowley is Senior Warden in Ashlar Lodge, No. 29, is High Priest of Billings Chapter, No. 6, Captain General of Aldemar Commandery, No. 5, of Billings, and is a member of Algeria Temple at Helena. He is independent in his political views.

ARTHUR G. HATCH, attorney at law, Big Timber, Montana, has been a resident of this place for three years. He is a brother of Hon. George M. Hatch and Morton W. Hatch, editors of Big Timber Pioneer.

Mr. Hatch is not only a thorough law student and skillful practitioner, but is also well posted on general subjects. He is a courteous and obliging gentleman, is a member of the Knights of Pythias, and is a stanch Republican.

THOMAS J. MCNAMARA is one of Montana's respected pioneers, who came to the Territory in 1862. He is also one of the many good citizens that Ireland has furnished to the United States.

Thomas J. McNamara was born near the city of Limerick, Ireland, in 1828. His parents were respected and well-to-do farmers. They reared a family of nine children, three sons and six daughters. Only five of this number are now living, three in Ireland, one in Australia, and the subject of this sketch in Montana. Both

I passed through here to what is now called Yellowstone Park, as set down previously, and returned in 1861, and saw no Indians except a few loafers about camp along the road and a few "sheep-eaters" in the park; black little-stub-and-twist fellows, friendly enough. They still used obsidian knives: at least their women skinned a mountain sheep, which one of the party had shot, with that. But the real Indian was not yet on the white man's path, in what is now Montana, above the buffalo line. He came after the white man came, came after him, after the sheep and horses. He had passed up and over and down the Rocky mountains, as his deeply-worn trails, of which Lewis and Clarke speak, still testify; but he did not prowl or hover about as he did sixty years after when the white man came. He was hunting for buffalo and his hereditary enemy,—that is, any other Indian he could find off his guard and on the minority side, and so despoil him of his horses, squaws and scalp. And yet, after all this complaining about Indians you might almost say they found,—they certainly led to the finding of Alder creek, the placer gold mine of the globe.

James Stuart, a born leader, had set out with a party to explore the Yellowstone from Bannack. The place of rendezvous, for such spirits as we have seen at the store, gathered from several such centers, was the mouth of Stinking Water. But some half dozen were tardy in coming, and the intrepid leader set out without them, leaving directions that they should follow his trail. They did so, but in a few days were met and plundered by Crow Indians, with a threat of death if they did not return to Bannack. This they promised and attempted, but making a short diversion, they camped on a little stream fringed with pretty alder trees and with water-like pearls. One of the party washed a pan of dirt in this pearly water, as he squatted under the shade of an alder tree, while the others prepared their meager supper, and his fortune was made! His name was Fairweather. He had found a gulch that held nearly one hundred million dollars!

parents have passed away, the mother in her sixtieth year, and the father at the age of eighty-five.

Thomas J., the fourth child in his father's family, was educated in his native land, and remained there until he was twenty-three years of age. In 1851 he emigrated to America, making a voyage in a sailing vessel, and landing at New York city. For six months he was employed in the glass works there. In the spring of 1862 he went to Detroit, Michigan; six months later to La Fayette, Indiana, thence to Crawfordsville, same State, where he was in railroad employ until 1854. That year he went to New Orleans and from there to San Francisco, California. He spent seven years in mines and mountains of California, either camping out or living in cabins, his fare being of the plainest. In 1862 he left California for the Florence excitement, but on his way to the mines there he learned that every square foot of claim had been taken, so he stopped at Elk City and prospected for about five months. From there he directed his course toward the Big Hole country, where he remained during the winter, and from whence, in the spring, he came to Alder Gulch. The first pan of dirt he washed at Alder Gulch yielded thirty cents worth of gold. He remained and continued mining for several years, meeting with fairly good success. He and three others took out of their claim in a single day $700, and he estimates that the whole amount taken from that claim was $50,000. Much of this amount, however, was spent in making ditches and in other development works. He was there during all the time of the trials and executions of the murderers and road agents; but while he saw what was being done he took no part in the troubles, quietly attending to his own affairs and being undisturbed by either the ruffians or the vigilants. In 1870, thinking his claim was about worked out, he left it and went to Cedar Creek, where he mined a year with moderate success. In 1871 he came to Missoula and turned his attention to the mercantile business, entering into a partnership with Thomas Williams. He continued as an active member of the firm for three years, and for three years longer was a silent partner. At the end of that time he lost all he had put into the business. Following this experience he was for a number of years in the liquor business, but at present is living retired. He has accumulated considerable property at Missoula, among which is a business house and several residences.

Mr. McNamara was married in 1867, to Miss Annie Cunningham, a native of county Limerick, Ireland. She came to the United States in 1856. Both he and his wife are devout Catholics. They aided materially in the building of the first Catholic Church in Missoula, and

CHAPTER XV.

FAIRWEATHER—ALDER—THE BIRTHDAY OF MONTANA—CITY LIVING—THE "TENDERFOOT"—INCIDENT AND ANECDOTE.

IT is told of Fairweather that, after the first few pans of dirt, yielding from twenty-five cents up to several dollars to the pan, he straightened up as tall as a dwarf pine tree after a snow storm and casting his practical miner's glance up the gulch and down the gulch and across its deep, wide bed, with his two hands thrust down in his empty pockets, he said laconically and as if to himself, "She'll last till the cows come home."

Thus far the placer gold mines in the great new Northwest had been of brief duration. The very richest placers up to date, Salmon or Florence, had perished under the persistent miner's hands almost like a fall of snow in springtime. They were already partially abandoned. But this deep, wide, long gulch would last, "last till the cows come home."

This, the 1st day of June, 1863, may be set down as the birth-day of Montana. Up to this date, if we except those who herded about the posts, missions and such like places,—and they were largely half-castes and Canadinns,—the people of Montana were mainly in transit. It is not easy to give even an estimate of the population at this date, much less can a list of names be set down with any accuracy.

The truth is, hundreds of people, forming trains of immigrants for Washington, Oregon, Idaho mines and elsewhere, suddenly, and in a also contributed largely toward the erection of their fine church edifice, which has recently been built here.

HON. SIMON R. BUFORD came to Virginia City, Montana, in 1865, and is now one of the leading business men of the place.

He is a native of the State of Missouri, and was born in Canton, Lewis county, March 2, 1846. He is a descendant of one of the old Virginia families. His father, Wellington Buford, was born in Richmond, Virginia, in 1818, and when he reached manhood married Miss Amanda Staples, also a native of Richmond. They removed to Missouri in 1840, and there he became the owner of a farm. By trade he was a mechanic. He continued to reside in Missouri until the time of his death, which occurred in 1888, in his sixty-eighth year. He and his wife reared fifteen children, and with one exception all are still living.

Simon R. was the third born in the above family. He spent the first nineteen years of his life in his native State, and then in 1865 crossed the plains with oxen, to Montana, being five months en route, and walking and driving stock most of the way. Virginia City was his objective point, and upon his arrival here he engaged in freighting between this place and Fort Benton. This business he followed for seven years. During all that time it was seldom that he ever slept in a house, his wagon being his home both night and day. Freighting in those days was a profitable business and he made money at it. His next occupation was that of clerk in the store of Raymond Brothers. With that firm he continued seven years, or up to 1878, at which time he opened his own store, under the firm name of Buford & Company, Mr. Henry Elling representing the company. For some years they did a large jobbing business, but since the building of the Utah and Northern Pacific Railroads their business has been of a retail nature. They still occupy the store in which they began business. Their career has indeed been one of marked success. From time to time they have invested their surplus funds in realty, and at this writing are the owners of several business buildings in the best part of the city, and also have ranch property to the amount of 3,000 acres on which they raise large crops of hay and grain, and where they are also largely engaged in the stock business, raising horses, cattle and sheep.

Mr. Buford was married January 4, 1877, to Miss Katie A. Cooley, a native of Canada, their marriage occurring in Virginia City. Eight children have been born to them, four of whom are now living, namely: Henry W., Effie, Simon R., Jr., and Ruth.

Fraternally, Mr. Buford is identified with the I. O. O. F. and the A. O. U. W., and is Past Master of the latter. In day after the discovery of Fairweather or Alder Gulch was known, became permanent citizens. Mullen tells us that more than a thousand immigrants passed over the Mullen road previous to this discovery. How many were on the road and suddenly arrested their course when Alder creek was found no one can say,—several hundreds, even thousands, perhaps. Immigrant trains, great and small, were also nearing Montana from Salt Lake, bound for Salmon river and elsewhere in the farther West at this date. What need of going further? Here was the one thing for which the whole commercial world was in quest—gold!

It is is still more difficult to give a true estimate of the number of Indians at that time on what is now Montana soil; for as spring opened into summer the Ishmaelites were constantly roaming about, here to-day, there to-morrow, as inclination, superstition, fear of enemies, or favorable opportunity to plunder dictated. But this shall be attempted. It is a good time to "take stock," as a storekeeper would say when a big spring trade was expected. The Government reports give Montana soil for 1863—in round numbers; Blackfeet, 19,000; Flatheads, 15,000; Crows, 5,000: Sioux, 5,000 other roving Indians, 5,000. Thus you see politics he has always been a reliable Democrat. He has served both as Alderman and Mayor of Virginia City. As a member of the Montana constitutional convention he rendered most efficient service, and at this writing, 1893, he is State Senator from Madison county.

Mr. Buford's is a well-rounded character—a worthy citizen, a prosperous business man of more than ordinary ability, and an official in whom his constituents take a just pride

DANIEL WEBSTER TILTON is a Montana pioneer of 1863 and the oldest book and stationery dealer in Montana.

He was born at Silver Creek, Chautauqua county, New York, July 3, 1839, and is of English descent on his father's side and French on his mother's. John Tilton, his father, was born in the State of Maine, December 11, 1811. Some years later he removed to New York, where, in 1838, he was married to Miss Angaline Taylor. He was a mechanic and for many years was engaged in house building. Later he turned his attention to the manufacture of oars. He was a Republican and a stanch old Presbyterian, and he lived to an advanced age, dying an hour and fifteen minutes after he had passed his eighty-second birthday. His good wife is still living at the old home place in Silver Creek, she having attained her seventy-ninth year. Their only child is Daniel Webster Tilton, the subject of our sketch.

Mr. Tilton attended the public schools of his native town until he was sixteen. Then he entered the employ of Henry Lockwood, dealer in books and stationery, and remained with him two years and a half. In 1859 he went to Buffalo and took a course in the Bryant & Stratton Business College of that place. After his graduation he returned to Silver Creek. His father then gave him $100, and he started out to make his own way in the world. At St. Joseph, Missouri, he secured a position as clerk in the office of the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad, at a salary of $40 per month, and while he was thus employed the Pike's Peak excitement came on, and he among others started Westward. The incidents of this trip are still fresh in his memory. Indeed, the long and tedious journey overland in those days made a lasting impression on all who crossed the plains.

Mr. M. C. Keath was sending out teams to the West, and it was as driver of one of these teams–a mule team–that Mr. Tilton secured passage, and paid $35 for the privilege of going. He was not accustomed to handling mules and his experience in driving them can be better imagined than described. Suffice it to say that he performed his part of the contract to the best of his ability and landed safe in Denver, having $15 left when he reached that place. The first brick building in Denver was then being erected, and he secured a job carrying brick at $2 per day. After he had worked half a day and received a dollar, he went to the Platt House for dinner, and was there employed as clerk and bookkeeper, entering at once upon his duties. There he found that in connection with his other duties he would also have to act as bar-tender, and as he did not like that part of the work he resigned his position in the evening. Then he hired out as express messenger on an overland coach, and was thus employed for a year. At the end of that time he was taken with mountain fever, was very sick for a long time, and, although the express boys offered to make up a purse and send him home, he declined their offer, saying he intended to remain in the West. After his recovery he was successively at Georgia Gulch, California Gulch and Central City, at the last named place running a soda fountain and later, also, a book and stationery business. He continued at Central City until 1863. That year he came to Virginia City. He loaded a team with dime novels and stationery, sent a man with it, and he himself traveled by coach. At Red Rock the stage broke down and the passengers camped while the driver went on to Bannack for repairs. The passengers beside Mr. Tilton were two notorious women and a Spaniard. The Spaniard afterward became a road agent and was shot the Indians had about 50,000 souls on the ground at a very rough estimate. But there were the Missouri Sioux set down at 20,000 and close at hand, to say nothing of Indians to the north and to the south and to the east and to the west.

As an example of the audacity and treachery of these bloody people who outnumbered the white men at least fifty to one,—for there were as many on the four sides of Montana at this time probably,—I shall here introduce Mr. Hauser's account of the night attack by the Crows in the Stuart Yellowstone expedition of 1863, which, as before noted, resulted in the discovery of Alder creek. S. T. Hauser, like the Stuart brothers and William F. Wheeler, the first United States Marshal of Montana, was not only a great soul and a greatly conspicuous figure in the history of Montana from the first, but, as will be seen by this sketch, a man of remarkable literary precision. Nothing ever thrilled me more than has this:

"On that dreadful night our lives were saved only by an accidental circumstance in the first place, and afterward by his wisdom and heroic bearing. As an illustration of his sagacity and mountaineer knowledge, I would state before going into the details of that dreadful night, at Bannack. While they were camped, as above stated, some Colorado boys came along and Mr. Tilton joined them and continued his way to Virginia City, landing there October 8, 1863. He bought a piece of land, put up a log building and hung out the sign, "City Book Store." This store had a board floor in it, the lumber being whipsawed and procured at a cost of twenty-five cents per square foot. He and John Ming claim to have started in the book business there about the same time, and they were the pioneer book men of Montana. At first they sold newspapers at fifty cents apiece and other things proportionately high. He continued in business there until 1884, when he removed his stock to Butte City and here he has since remained.

When he came to Montana Mr. Tilton brought with him a little army hand press, and from time to time he did a little job work with it. He recalls the fact that he printed twenty-five ball tickets for J. B. Chapin, at $1 each; and that the charges for attending the ball were $25. He was there. The second printing press that was brought to Montana arrived here August, 1864. It was John Buchanan who brought it and along with it a little blank paper, and with this outfit Mr. Buchanan issued, August 27, 1864, the first number of the Montana Post, a Democratic paper. After he had issued the second number he sold it to Mr. Tilton, for $3,000, the latter continuing it as an independent paper, issuing its next number on the 10th of September. From $5 a year he raised the price to $7.50. Among distinguished persons who wrote for it we mention Colonel W. F. Sanders, Judge H. N. Blake, Judge Chumesero and Captain James H. Mills. Benjamin Dittes purchased a third interest in this paper. In 1868 Mr. Tilton sold his interest to Mr. Dittes; the paper was then removed to Helena, and later was discontinued.

Mr. Tilton was in Virginia City during all the exciting times with the road agents, and saw five of them hung at once. In 1866 he published 5,000 copies of a little book entitled "The Vigilants," giving an account of the detection, capture and punishment of the robbers and murderers that infested Montana in its early history. This little book sold at first for $2 in gold dust or $2.25 in currency. He has since published a second edition of 5,000 copies, which now sell at fifty cents apiece.

Before leaving Virginia City Mr. Tilton was engaged in the grocery business with his father-in-law. His marriage occurred May 2, 1868, to Miss Helen Elvira Barber, a native of Pennsylvania and daughter of Hon. O. B. Barber of that State and a pioneer of Montana in 1866. Six children came to bless their home, of whom five were born in Virginia City and one in Butte City. Their names are Webster Barber, John, Orlando B., Charles L., Helen and Howard. John died in 1885, at the age of fourteen years. Four of the children are now attending school in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and their mother is with them, while the oldest son is with his father, running the job printing office, which they run in part to do their own advertising in connection with the book store.

When Mr. Tilton came to Butte City he purchased the ground on West Park street, where he erected the building he has since occupied. He has also invested in other city property, and he has expended about $20,000 in developing mines in the State, for which he has not yet realized a dollar. This illustrates the uncertainty of mining.

Mr. Tilton was made a Mason in 1863, and he is now a Knight Templar. He also belongs to the A. O. U. W. and is a Select Knight of the latter order. In Masonry he was a charter member of Montana Lodge No. 2, and was for four years its Master; and he was Eminent Commander of Virginia City Commandery No. 1. He and his wife are efficient members of the Episcopal Church, of which he is now Junior Warden. In politics, his principles are in harmony with those of the Republican party.

The above sketch, although brief and imperfect, will serve to show something of the life of this worthy and respected pioneer.

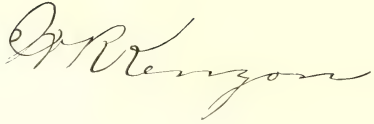
that as we were riding along the day before, he remarked that we were being dogged by a war party. As I saw no Indians, nor any signs of any, I asked him how he knew. He replied: 'Do you see those buffalo running at full speed off there next to the mountains?' Looking in that direction, some six or eight miles, I saw what he described, and answered that I did. 'Well,' said he, 'you will shortly see those others a couple of miles or so ahead of them start also.' Sure enough, in the course of about half an hour they too stampeded, thus showing clearly that they were frightened by something traveling in the same direction that we were, and it was also evident that was something beyond them, for they all ran toward us. This convinced me that he was correct, and after he had explained and drawn my attention to the circumstance it was easy enough to comprehend.

"Reaching the spot selected for camp, we busied ourselves with our various duties—some preparing supper, others starting off with pick, pan, and shovel to prospect, etc.; but I noticed that the captain quietly took his rifle and started off alone for the rolling hills next to the mountains. In about an hour he returned, and throwing down some pemmican, remarked: 'Those thieving scoundrels are close around here; so

HON. WILLIAM THOMPSON.—One of the quiet, unassuming citizens of Montana is Hon. William Thompson of Butte, who is not in the least given to boasting about his frontier record, and yet it covers a period of nearly forty years.

Mr. Thompson first saw the light at Coburg, Ontario, Canada, March 1, 1838. Here he lived until he was fifteen years old, receiving his education in the public schools. The father having died, Mrs. Thompson removed with her children to the United States, locating in Detroit, Michigan, in 1853, where William learned the cabinet and carpenter trades, and has been from that time to this a worker in wood, either as journeyman, manufacturer, or employer of the craft.

At the age of eighteen, William set out to carve his own fortune and proceeded first to LaCrosse, Wisconsin, going from there to High Forest, Minnesota. This was in 1856, and High Forest was then a frontier settlement. He saved a little money by working at his trade, and in 1859 pushed farther West, in company with Hon. Moses Armstrong, afterward delegate to Congress from Dakota. They crossed the Dakota plains by way of New Ulm, Lake Benton, Pipestone Quarry and Sioux Falls, to Yankton, on the Missouri river, then the extreme frontier in the Northwest, arriving in the fall of 1859. In August of 1862 the Sioux took the war path, and the massacre at New Ulm and the outrages committed elsewhere by them, created considerable alarm at Yankton. The settlers gathered at the latter place and prepared for war. A militia company was organized, of which young Thompson was a member, for home protection, but fortunately active service was not required. Thompson had at that time the contract for the erection of the capitol building, or the one that was to serve as such for the Territory of Dakota, of which Yankton was then the capital. His material was all on the ground, and in the "war" emergency it was appropriated and used to build barracks for protection against the expected hostiles.



In the fall of 1861, a party came down the Missouri river in mackinaws from Fort Benton, then the headquarters of the American Fur Company in the Northwest. They stopped at Yankton and exhibited a considerable quantity of gold, which they said came from the mountains south of Fort Benton. The next spring, 1862, a small party from St. Louis and other cities went up the river on a steamboat to Fort Benton in search of treasure, and from that point penetrated the mountains. Among them were two brothers named Hulbert. They got as far as Prickly Pear valley, near where Helena now stands, and found some gold at or near Montana City, being undoubtedly the first discoverers of these diggings, which afterward proved rich and extensive; but some of the party, becoming discouraged, returned the same fall to Yankton, making the journey from Fort Benton in mackinaws. The Hulberts worked that winter for Mr. Thompson and gave him such an account of the mountain country and its probable treasure that he lost no time in the spring in starting for that region. As there was no certainty of a steamer, he started from Yankton with a wagon and two yoke of oxen, accompanied by one of the Hulbert brothers. At Omaha they joined a wagon train and crossed the plains. They went direct to Bannack and then to Alder Gulch, arriving at Virginia City, September 16, 1863.

During all these years on the frontier, Mr. Thompson stuck tenaciously to his trade and did not vary the rule even in Alder Gulch, where nearly every one else was expecting to dig a fortune out of the ground in a short time. He took his kit of tools along with him and found them of great service. The first winter, when most of the people of the camp were idle waiting for the mining season to open, Thompson was diligently at work making doors, frames, sash, etc., the material for which he hewed out of pine trees, and earned easily from $10 to $15 a day. He soon formed a partnership in the building business with a Mr. Griffith, the style of the firm being Griffith & Thompson. They built many of the first houses in Virclose that, in their haste to keep me from seeing them, they dropped that, and if we don't look sharp, we will get set afoot tonight.'

"As night approached, it clouded up and threatened rain; so we carried in all our flour and most of our other baggage, saddles, etc., and placed them around next to the walls of the tent, making our beds inside of this circle, which proved to be a providential act.

"Night coming on, the captain remarked that there would have to be a sharp watch kept, as he felt confident the Indians would make an attempt to get our horses, and said he would go on guard himself. As it grew dark we all retired to rest except the two guards, without any misgivings; for during the last three weeks the Indians had been around our tents nearly every night, trying to steal our horses, and as they had never attempted to fire into or molest us, since our first meeting, when we stood them off, we had ceased to have any apprehension that they would attack us. The only precaution we took (that of taking our rifles and revolvers to bed with us) was to be ready, in case they attempted to stampede our horses by dashing in among them.

ginia City, and amongst them the one which, in an unfinished condition, was used by the vigilantes as a convenient gallows on which hung, at one time, Boone Helm, Jack Gallagher, Frank Parish, Haze Lyon and "Club Foot George." This occurred in the month of January, 1864. The following spring, Thompson and his partner purchased claim No. 2 above "Fairweather" discovery, from James Fergus, and worked it that season. In the fall of the same year he organized a party of 168 men who wanted to return to the "States" and piloted them down the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers on mackinaws, charging each man $25 for the trip. He had the mackinaws built at a point on the Yellowstone about where Livingstone now stands, where the party embarked on the 10th of October. There were thirteen boats in the fleet, and for the first few days the swift current took them along rapidly; but, reaching the lower Yellowstone, it was found necessary to ply the oar and also to hoist blankets for sails so as to make better time, as the danger of being frozen in was imminent and every effort had to be made to hasten the journey. After reaching the Missouri they made better progress, but here had to run the gauntlet of the "cut-throat" Sioux, who were ready and anxious to lift a scalp whenever the opportunity offered. They reached Yankton in safety, however, after several narrow escapes both by land and water, on November 21st, where the party disbanded.

Mr. Thompson returned to Montana the following spring, 1865, by steamboat up the Missouri river to Fort Benton, from there going direct to Virginia City by way of Helena. He engaged with his partner, Griffith, in the general building and merchandise business, and, besides other work, erected four or five of the first quartz-mills constructed in the Territory. In 1866 the firm commenced operations in Helena, erecting the King & Gillett, Taylor & Thompson and several other blocks, executing contracts to the amount of $78,000.

As early as 1868, Mr. Thompson purchased and operated a steam sawmill near Virginia City, and has been in the sawmill business ever since, operating in Madison, Beaverhead, Deer Lodge, Missoula and Silver Bow counties. He is now vice president and general manager of the Montana Lumber & Manufacturing Company of Butte and Helena, one of the most extensive and successful institutions of its kind in the State.

While always an active mechanic or business man Mr. Thompson has ever been willing to give a share of his time and talents to promote the public welfare. He did his part willingly in the first years of the Territory to bring law and order out of chaos. He served in the City Council of Virginia City in 1873–4, and after removing to Butte, represented the people of Silver Bow county three different sessions in the Legislature—in the House of Representatives of the fifteenth session, in the Council of the sixteenth session and again in the House of Representatives of the first session under the new State Government. In his capacity as a lawmaker, Mr. Thompson served his State ably and conscientiously.

Mr. Thompson was married at Virginia City in 1867, to Annie M. Boyce, daughter of Major Boyce. They have five children,—three grown sons and two daughters. The eldest, William B. Thompson, is in charge of the business of the Montana Lumber & Manufacturing Company in Helena, and James R. and Edwin are faithful lieutenants of their father at home. The daughters, Mable and Flora, are seven and twelve years of age, respectively.

WILLIAM R. KENYON, now standing at the front in the hardware business in Butte City, is a native of the State of New York, and was born December 2, 1839.

His ancestors came from old England in the early settlement of America, and both his grandfathers fought in the Continental army during the Revolution. His father, Samuel Kenyon, was born in Albany, New York, and married Miss Freedora Gillman, a native of Connecticut; they were early settlers of Oswego. He owned a farm and spent the whole of his life there, living to the ad who several times during the day had called my attention to the mournful cooing of a dove, saying that it made him sad, and caused him to thing of his boyhood days and of his mother's home, and that he couldn't get over it, etc. It was strange to hear him talk in that strain, for he was one of the most reckless of the party, and usually did not seem to think of home, death, or anything else. Drew Underwood and I slept under the same blankets; and in the same tent were also York and McCafferty. Gerry, Bostwick, Ives and Watkins occupied a tent, as did also Bell, Vanderbilt and Blake another; while Hauxhurst and Roach did not put any tent, but simply spread it over their bed.

"We all fell asleep without fear, having become accustomed to having Indians around camp trying only to steal our horses, as we had learned to suppose, when I was startled by the captain shouting, 'Keep close to the ground!' Instantly following his voice came the most unearthly yelling and firing that I ever heard, and that so very close that the crash seemed to be directly against my head and inside the tent. I was fairly lifted to a sitting position, and my first realization of what was the matter, was hearing Underwood say, 'I'm shot through and through.' 'My God, this is awful,' was my vanced age of eighty- nine years, his death occurring in 1878. His wife had died in her seventy-sixth year. They had ten children, of whom only three now survive.

William R., the youngest, was reared to manhood and received his education in the public schools in his native town. He first embarked in the hardware business in Independence, Iowa, in 1867, and continued there for sixteen years, then sold out and came to Butte and opened his business here in 1883. The firm of which he is a member handle general hardware, but they make a specialty of handling machinery and supplies. They sell their goods throughout the whole of Montana and Idaho, and it is believed that they have the largest retail hardware trade in the United States. Mr. Kenyon is thoroughly informed in all the details of the business, and is a man of large business capacity, genial, pleasing, kind-hearted, and of course everybody esteems him highly. These traits of his character are doubtless the secret of his success.

The name of the firm is now the Kenyon-Connell Commercial Company, and, having unlimited capital, they are able to buy their supplies at the very lowest figures and on the very best terms. Of course they carry a very large and complete stock. Mr. Kenyon also has several pieces of mining property, and he was one of the builders of the opera house in Butte.

In his political views, Mr. Kenyon is a Democrat. He has been twice elected Mayor of the city of Butte, and now has the honor of being chairman of the State Central Committee of his party. He stands high in the estimation of the business men of Montana.

JULIAN M. KNIGHT, a representative business man of Virginia City, came to Montana in 1866, and is therefore ranked with the pioneers of the State.

Julian M. Knight was born in Erie county, Pennsylvania, November 12, 1838, of English descent. His ancestors were among the early settlers of Vermont, and both of his grandfathers fought in the Colonial army during the Revolution. Mr. Knight's father was born in the Green Mountain State in 1800, and his mother, nee Susan Millard, also a native of that State, was born in Arlington, in 1807. Her forefathers were also of English descent and were early settlers of Vermont. Soon after their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Knight removed to Erie county, Pennsylvania, where they were respected farmers, and where they passed the rest of their lives and died, his death occurring in 1852 and hers in 1857. Their family was composed of three children, Julian M. being the youngest and one of the two who are still living.

The subject of our sketch spent his boyhood days on his father's farm, working hard in summer and attending school about three months during the winter. When he was sixteen years of age he began to do for himself. Going to the then new State of Iowa, he found employment in a general store at Decorah, where he remained three years. From there he went to Leavenworth, Kansas, and took part in the expedition against the Mormons. He was at Fort Laramie and Fort Union, employed by Russell, Mojors & Waddell, freighting supplies for the soldiers, being in the Indian country all the time and meeting with many thrilling experiences. He continued on the plains until 1866, a portion of the time freighting to Colorado and to Utah.

In 1866 Mr. Knight brought a stock of goods from Kansas to Virginia City, Montana, making the trip with mule teams. Upon his arrival here he opened a store near where the courthouse now stands. After selling out his goods he became interested in the mines, and in 1868 was one of a company that flumed the gulch. He still has an interest in this enterprise. In 1882 he opened his present hardware store, with Mr. H. Elling as partner, and theirs is now the only hardware store in the city. They carry a large stock and do an extensive and successful business. Mr. Buford has been taken into the firm, the name now being Elling, Knight & Buford, but from the inception of the business Mr. Knight has been its manager. Their storeroom, 25 x 75 feet, is in the reply, adding instantly, 'So am I;' for feeling the shock and sting of the ball and blood trickling down my side, I thought it was all over with me. Hurriedly thrusting my hand under my shirt, I drew a sigh of relief, for I found that the ball had not gone through me, it having struck a thick memorandum book that was in my left shirt pocket, which it passed through, and flattened and stopped against a rib near my heart.

"Instantly seizing our rifles we crawled out of the tent, but before we got out the yelling and firing had ceased. It was pitch dark, dark as Egypt, and what followed was even more trying to our nerves than what had passed. We could distinctly hear the demon-like whisperings of the murderous fiends in the ravine that we knew was not over ten paces from us—yet so perfectly dark was it that we could not even see the outlines of the bushes that bordered the ravine; in fact, we could not see our hands before us. Add to this, that we did not know how many of our little band were left alive. Some we knew were dying, from the moans we heard, yet we could not see them or offer a word of consolation, for one audible word would have brought a shower of arrows. As it was, they were flying in all directions, and it seemed im-

Masonic building, and they also have a large warehouse. Tinning and plumbing form an important feature of their establishment.

January 5, 1865, Mr. Knight was married to Miss Agnes C. Lobb, a native of Independence, Missouri, and a daughter of J. A. Lobb of Missouri. They have one son, born in Virginia City, Montana, in 1869, who is now a lawyer in his native town. Mrs. Knight is a member of the Episcopal Church.

Mr. Knight is identified with the A. O. U. W. and also with the Masonic Order, having taken the blue lodge, Royal Arch and Commandery degrees, in all of which branches he has served as presiding officer. He has been a Democrat since he has been a voter, but is not now in accord with his party on the silver question.

RICHARD DEACON, of Dillon, Montana, has the honor of being the pioneer owner of the land on which the city of Dillon was built.

He is a native of Ireland, born in Monaghan county, February 15, 1832. His father, William Deacon, was born in Scotland, removed to Ireland, and was there married to Miss Mary Frasier. Five children were born to them in Ireland. Then the father emigrated to America, and after working some time at West Hebron, New York, in 1848 he sent for his wife and children, who joined him at West Hebron, where he was prospered and became the owner of a farm. In 1854 his wife died, in the forty-fifth year of her age. He and the children continued to reside on the farm until his death, which occurred in his seventy-third year.

Richard was their eldest son. He was sixteen years of age when he came with his mother and the other children to America. For four years he worked at farming for wages. In 1852 he went to Illinois and worked at sawmilling and with the surveyors in the survey of the line of the Chicago, St. Charles & Mississippi air-line railroad. In 1854 he crossed the plains to California. He drove an ox team for J. L. Davidson, for which service he received his board and the privilege of being one of the party. He was then twenty-two years of age, full of life and a desire for adventure, and, notwithstanding that he walked most of the way, he thoroughly enjoyed the trip. They arrived at Yreka on the 14th of September, 1854, after being five months en route. He was engaged in mining for seven years. Then he went to Portland, Oregon, and from there up the Columbia river by steamboat to Lewiston and thence to Oro Fino with a pack train. He then mined in different places, including the Bitter Root Basin, and was at Florence in 1861, and during the whole of his mining experience he always got gold in paying quantities. After this he and fourteen others crossed the Rocky mountains on a prospecting tour. They returned to Elk City and in the fall of 1862 went to Boise Basin and mined there until the fall of 1864, when they went to British Columbia and spent the winter selling miners' supplies. In the spring of 1865 he came to Ophir Gulch, in the Blackfoot country, spent the following winter in Virginia City, and in the spring of 1866 came to Argenta. A little later he mined at Bannack, and in the spring of 1871 came to the Beaver Head valley and located upon the land on which the town of Dillon now stands. He first took a homestead, on which he resided until the spring of 1878, and then took seven forties of land under the desert act, making 440 acres in all, which he farmed a little, stock-raising, however, being his chief business. In the spring of 1880 his cattle numbered about 300 head. He then sold his cattle, and sold his land to the Town Company for $12,500. He continues to reside at Dillon, has done some building, owns two brick blocks, has several dwellings, and loans his money in a private way. And since, in a manner, he has been retired from business he has traveled considerably and has seen a most wonderful transformation in Montana. On the desert which he took from the Government now stands the beautiful city of Dillon, the county seat of Beaver Head county—a fine railroad town, with its large possible to escape being pierced by them. We could hear them whizzing through the air every second, and so near that we often felt the wind; and so close were the Indians that we could hear the twang of their bow strings. Too shrewdly the cowardly murderers had resorted to their bows and arrows, after they had emptied their doule-barrelled guns, knowing well that if they used their guns after we were aroused, the flash would afford a mark for us to return their fire; but arrows gave no gnide, and they were safe in the ravine and darkness.

"Crawling to our captain as best we could, constantly admonished by the flying arrows to crawl low, we found him lying between and among five dead horses, all shot by the Indians in their efforts to kill him, guided by his voice when he had shouted to us to 'Keep close to the ground'—an order given upon his hearing them cocking their guns just before they fired; which order was given at the imminent risk of his own life, but it saved ours, which was always the aim of his big heart at any risk, and as fortune sometimes favors the brave, so in this instance she did him, for the dead horses furnished him a complete barricade, from which he whispered his directions to us. On reaching him, I asked, in a suppressed whisper, how courthouse, many handsome dwellings, and 1,500 inhabitants of the most intelligent and enterprising type.

Mr. Deacon is well-informed, hale and hearty, and bids fair to live to see still greater growth and development in the town in which so much has already been accomplished. He has been a Republican since the organization of the party; is a Royal Arch Mason, and is a man of the highest integrity. He has a wide acquaintance with many of the pioneers of Montana.

JOSIAH SHAW HAMMOND, M. D., of Butte City, Montana, a leading member of the medical profession of this place, was born in North Abington, Massachusetts, on the 10th of September, 1844, a descendant of William Hammond, of London, England, and Elizabeth, nee Penn, an aunt of the most celebrated Quaker, William Penn. Her husband died in London, and she came to Sandwich, Massachusetts, in 1634, bringing with her a son, Benjamin, and three daughters. They came in the "good" ship Griffin and landed at Boston September 18, 1634, settling at Sandwich.

Benjamin Hammond married Mary Vincent, and Dr. Hammond is of the eighth generation from William Hammond of London. The heads of the family in line from Benjamin are John, Rowland, Captain George, Benjamin and George,—the last mentioned being the father of the subject of this sketch. All were born in the Bay State, and identified with the affairs of that State from its early settlement, and generally Congregationalists. The Doctor's father was born in Carver, June 21, 1815, married Miss Susanna Shaw, a native of Abington, and had eight children, of whom seven are still living. Mrs. Hammond died at Lockeford, California, November 29, 1878, and Mr. Hammond now resides there, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.

Their fourth child, the subject of this sketch, was reared and educated in Massachusetts until his seventeenth year, removing with the family to California in [illegible] and afterward engaged in teaching. In 1868 he graduated at the California State Normal School, and thereafter became first assistant at the high school at Stockton, where he remained until 1870, when he began the study of medicine, under the direction of Dr. Asa Clarke, of Stockton. His first school course of medicine he took at the Bellevue Hospital Medical College at New York city, and completed his medical collegiate course at the Cooper Medical College in San Francisco, graduating there in November, 1873. Since then he has been uninterruptedly following his chosen profession, having now had twenty-one years' experience. For a short time he practiced at Lockeford, already mentioned, then was ten years in Nevada, and finally, in 1885, he established himself here in Butte City, where he has been signally successful.

He is a member of the Silver Bow Medical Society and of the State Medical Association, of which he has had the honor of being president, and before which body he read the first paper; and ever since then he has been especially active in that society. Fraternally, he is at present Past Grand Master Workman of the A. O. U. W. of Montana. He has visited a large number of the lodges of the State, and intends to meet them all before the year closes. He has a high opinion of the order as a benevolent institution. He is also Grand Vice-Chancellor of the K. of P. of Montana.

Politically, he has all his life been a Republican, but he is now inclined to act with the Populist party.

September 25, 1867, he married Miss Ann Eliza Simpson, a native of Missouri, but brought up in California. Six children have been born in the family of Dr. Hammond, namely: Louise, Kate, Hattie; Delia, who died of inflammation of the heart following la grippe; she was very affectionate and amiable in her character; and two sons, named Nelson and Benjamin.

Dr. Hammond is a genial and talented gentleman, devoted to his profession, in which he enjoys an enviable position, both theoretically and practically.

Geo Hahn

many men were killed. 'Don't know; you are the third man that has reported,' he said. To which I replied, 'Great God, Jim, this is awful.' He answered: 'Never mind; it's rough, but we will give them a game yet. You and Underwood crawl toward the river about fifty yards; don't fire until you can punch your guns against them. Wait; there will be a general rush on us before morning. Remember, don't shoot until the rush is made, and you can touch them with your guns. If you fire sooner, the flash of your guns will direct a hundred shots to you. Keep cool, and we can stand them off.' So Underwood and I dragged ourselves over the horses and for the distance indicated, requiring no further orders to keep close to the ground. And here we lay, face downward, for three long hours, with cocked rifle in one hand and revolver in the other, in the most fearful suspense, expecting every moment that they would renew their yells and rush upon us. With every nerve strained, we watched and waited, with nothing to relieve our suspense, except the gratitude we felt at being still alive, and the hope of succoring our wounded comrades, whose dying groans were perfectly heartrending. Add to this the audible whisperings of what we supposed to be directions and preparations for the final charge,

GEORGE GOHN, a resident of Virginia City, Montana, since 1863, has all these years been conducting a meat market, and few there are in the city who are better known than he. Of his life we make record as follows:

George Gohn was born near the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, March 28, 1834, a descendant of German ancestors, who were among the early settlers of the Keystone State, his great-grandfather having been born there. Grandfather George Gohn was born in Virginia. He married a Miss Deitz and had a family of nine children. Both he and his wife attained the age of eighty-three years. Their oldest child, George Gohn, was our subject's father. He was born in York county, Pennsylvania, April 11, 1808, and when he grew up married Miss Margaret N. Ruby, a native of the Old Dominion. They became the parents of five children, among them being two pairs of twins. George was a twin, and he and a sister are the only ones of the family who are now living. His father died April 16, 1835, and his mother survived her husband only a few years, her death occurring when she was forty-eight years of age.

Thus, left an orphan when young, George Gohn was reared by his Grandfather Gohn, his summers being spent at farm work and his winters in attendance at school. When he was seventeen he began to learn the butcher's business. In 1856 he came out West to what is now Kansas City, where he remained until April, 1859, at which time he crossed the plains on the Santa Fe route. He remained in Colorado until March, 1863, when he directed his course toward Montana, going first to Bannack and coming from there to Alder Gulch. That was immediately after the discovery of gold was made here, he being among the first to enter the camp after the discovery was made. He took a claim, but it proved to be on the wrong side of the river, and after mining without success all summer he turned his attention to the business in which he has since been engaged. His first three beeves he killed in June, 1863. He had no building, and the dust was bad, so he did not kill any more until April of the following year, at which time he opened his shop and since then he has supplied the whole country with meat. Prices ranged from twenty to thirty cents per pound up to 1865, after which they decreased, as the stock from that time on has been raised here. During his long business career he has by honorable and upright methods and close attention to the wants of his customers, won the confidence and respect of all with whom he has had dealings. Indeed, few men in the city or surrounding country are better known or more highly respected than he.

Mr. Gohn was married November 10, 1861, to Miss Anna Zweifel, a native of Switzerland and a daughter of John Jacob Zweifel. They have had five children, three sons and two daughters. The oldest son, George Edward, was born in Virginia City, January 23, 1865, and is now in business with his father; Phillip Henry, born May 14, 1872, is a clerk in Mr. Elling's bank; Anna May, born May 23, 1875; and George Grant, who died at the age of fourteen months.

Not only in the business circles of Virginia City has Mr. Gohn taken an active part, but also in its political and social circles has he been a prominent factor. He has been a stanch Republican since the party was organized, and in an official capacity has done much to promote the interests of his city and county. He served as County Assessor, was County Treasurer two terms and County Commissioner four years, served as Alderman of Virginia City, and for a number of years has been a School Trustee. In Masonic affairs he has for years taken an active part. He is Past Master of the lodge, Past High Priest of the chapter, and has held a number of offices in the commandery, and he and his wife are members of the Eastern Star.

HON. JOHN NOYES, one of Butte City's prominent and early settlers and highly respected citizens, landed in Montana July 20, 1865. He was born in Chatham, Canada and the peculiar, never-to-be-forgotten sound of the arrows which we heard, but could not see; each so close that we felt the next one must strike. Yet we dare not fire in return—only wait for what seemed inevitable death. In this way hours passed—hours that seemed weeks—when, to my utter surprise, our captain came, walking erect, and almost stumbling over me. In a whisper I said: 'What are you walking for? Why don't you get down and crawl? You will be killed.' To which, in the same whispered tone, he replied: 'Oh, I'm going around to see how the boys are, and get some water for Bell and Bostwick. There's enough of us left to give them a lively rattle in the morning.' At that moment an arrow came so close we could actually feel the wind of it. I again appealed to him to crawl. His answer was, 'I was not born to be killed by these red devils,' and he calmly walked down to the river and got a cup of water and took it to the wounded men, and to this day God only knows why he was not pierced by a dozen arrows, and is seems almost a miracle that he was not.

"Underwood was not more than four feet from me, and yet we never dared speak; only watched and tried to see through the darkness, and prayed for morning or light enough to East, March 21, 1829, son of John and Lydia (Dexter) Noyes, the former a native of New Hampshire and of Irish descent, and the latter born in Vermont, of Scotch-Irish descent. They were married in Canada, settled on a farm there, and at that place reared their family. The mother died in her forty-fifth year and the father lived to be sixty-nine years old. Both were Presbyterians. Of their family of six sons and two daughters only four are now living. John was their third child. He was reared on the farm, and for a time worked with his father at brickmaking.

In 1852, at the age of twenty-three years, the subject of our sketch, imbued with a spirit of adventure and a thirst for gold, made the journey around by the Isthmus to California, landing at San Francisco. He at once sought the mines and for ten years was engaged in mining in Nevada, being successful and accumulating a large sum of money; but in later enterprises and speculations lost the most of it. In 1862 he went by water from San Francisco to Portland, Oregon, and from there into Washington Territory, where he continued mining until 1865. That year he came overland on the back of a cayuse to Montana, his first location here being in McClellan Gulch, where he cleared $8,000 in two months. At the end of that time he returned to Canada on a short visit, after which he went around by New York to St. Louis, spent the winter in that city and in the spring purchased merchandise and sent it up the Missouri river bound for Montana. About the time the steamer reached the mouth of the Platte river it sank, and all his goods were lost. They were insured, however, and he returned to St. Louis and replaced them, and this time made the journey in safety, and at Elk Creek disposed of his stock at a handsome profit. From Elk Creek he came to Butte City in 1866. At that time there were only about twenty men in the camp here, and of that number only three are left [illegible] William Omsley, Levi Prentis and Joseph [illegible]. The second day Mr. Noyes was in camp he purchased a claim and commenced mining. From time to time he located other claims, and continued successfully in the business for twenty years. He and Mr. Upton dug the Noyes & Upton ditch and brought water to their claims. During his early mining experience Mr. Noyes lived in a little cabin for six years, up to the time he married.

As Butte City began to grow he became interested in its development and did much to advance its prosperity. Indeed, he has been one of the important factors in building up the town. Much of it is situated on land once owned by him and which he platted and sold. He still owns a large amount of real-estate here. He has built no less than nine brick buildings in the city, five of them business blocks and the others residences. The elegant home in which he and his family reside is situated on East Granite street. For several years he was president of the first water company that was organized here; he helped to build the city gas works, and in every way possible he has contributed toward Butte City's prosperity. To some extent he is still interested in mining claims.

In 1872 Mr. Noyes was married, in Butte City, to Miss Myra Meekejohn, a native of Scotland. They have four children, their two sons, John and Thomas C., now being students in the State University of Michigan; one daughter, Alice, the wife of Mr. W. McWhite; and the other daughter, Ruth, attending school in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Noyes was one of the organizers of the first Masonic lodge in Butte City, and he is now a Knight Templar. Politically, he has always been a Democrat. In 1880 he had the honor of being elected to represent his county in the Territorial Legislature, and as a member of that body served most efficiently. During the three decades he has resided in Montana he has made the acquaintance of many of her pioneers and prominent men, and by all who know him is held in the highest esteem. Mrs. Noyes and her children are all members of the Episcopal Church.

shoot. Yet, what were to hope for with the coming of daylight? We knew tnat they were ten to one against us. Still, it would be better than the great disadvantage at which they had us. And the uncertainty! Anything was better than that.

"Morning came at last, and what a sight it revealed! There was poor Watkins, shot through the temple and unconscious, but crawling around on his elbows and knees; Bostwick shot all to pieces, but still alive, and five others wounded; we scattered all about the camp-ground, face downward, with cocked rifles and revolvers in hand, eagerly watching the bushes and ravine from which the fatal fire had come. Five horses were dead, and six or seven others had arrows sticking into them. On the side of the mountain, in plain sight, were the Indians moving around among the trees and rocks. With the approach of day, the cowardly wretches had quietly retreated up the ravine to the side of the mountain out of danger, yet keeping in sight so as to watch our every movement. We were in a most trying and desperate situation, surrounded by merciless Indians, hundreds of miles from the nearest white men, with the whole tribe between us and our homes, and with seven of our little band wounded—two fatally,

Dr. Charles Pinckney Hough, a representative citizen of Montana and a prominent physician of Butte City, is a native of the State of Missouri, born in Jefferson City on the 14th day of April, 1845. He traces his ancestry to Bishop Hough, of the Church of England. The branch of the family from which he descends settled in the State of Virginia more than 200 years ago, where they were prominent in the early history of the country, and have always been eminent for ability, both in the professions and in business.

The Doctor's father, George W. Hough, was born in Londoun county, Virginia, in 1808; married Miss Mary Catherine Shawen, a native of his own county, and in 1837 moved to Jefferson City, Missouri, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was an active participant in public affairs, well grounded in political economy; was for many years a leader in the Democratic party of his State and very highly esteemed for his learning and character; was a member of the State Legislature in 1842, and was afterward nominated for Congress, but was defeated; was one of the founders of the State Historical Society, served twelve years as President of the State Board of Public Works, and in 1860 declined the nomination for Governor of the State. His wife died in 1876 and in 1878 he, too, passed away. Six of the children survive, among them Judge Warwick Hough, of St. Louis, Missouri, who was for ten years a member of the Supreme Court of the State, and Colonel Arthur M. Hough, attorney-at-law in Jefferson City.

Dr. Hough, the third son and fifth child, attended public school for several years, and for two years had the advantage of private instruction; but he is principally indebted to the personal care and instruction of his father for his education and general direction of thought. He left Jefferson City in 1864 and accepted the position of purser on a Missouri river steamboat, filling that position for three years. He was then transferred to the "Anchor Line," on the Mississippi river, and served as purser on several steamers plying between St. Louis and Vicksburg for about two years longer, when he engaged in the commission business in St. Louis under the firm name of Butterfield & Hough. They did a large and lucrative business, through the acquaintance formed while he was engaged as purser on the Missouri and Mississippi rivers. Not being adapted to a mercantile life, and soon tiring of it, he withdrew from the firm and returned to his native town to engage in the study of his profession with his brother-in-law, Dr. George Bickerton Winston, one of the most eminent medical men in the State. Dr. Hough graduated at the Missouri Medical College, in St. Louis, Missouri, with high honors, in 1873. He began practice in St. Louis; was appointed assistant to the chair of surgery in the Missouri Medical College, and also lectured in the college on minor surgery. He was surgeon to the college hospital for three years. In 1878 he came to Butte, where he has since practiced his profession, with marked success, acquiring the reputation of being one of the most skillful physicians and surgeons in the State. Since coming to Butte he has held the offices of County Physician, County Health Officer, City Health Officer, surgeon to the Montana Central and Union Pacific Railways, and for fifteen years has been surgeon to the Sisters' Hospital. He received the appointment of Surgeon-General of the State under three successive administrations, and is a member of the State Medical Society and of the Association of Military Surgeons of the United States, with the rank of Brigadier General.

While he was Health Officer of the City of Butte he brought the attention of the City Council to the condition of the water supply. This matter occasioned a very bitter and prolonged controversy, and through the influence of the Water Company Dr. Hough was deposed from office, the company hoping thereby to stop the agitation of the question; but the citizens of Butte had become so fully imbued with the correctness of the Doctor's ideas and recommendations that the changes demanded by him were brought about two years later.

and three others severely. We gathered into a little knot to talk over the events of the night, and to ascertain the extent of our wounds. This done, I asked Jim (as our captain was familiarly called among us) what we had better do. He answered: 'Have a hot cup of coffee first; we will all feel better, and will then decide.'

"I forgot to mention that just at break of day, and as we were about rising to our feet, an Indian sent a last arrow right into our midst, but from a greater distance up the ravine. Jim instantly seized his rifle, and started to cut him off from the mountain, by getting between him and those above, but he proved to quick, and escaped. According to instructions, we proceeded to make a fire and prepare some coffee, although none of felt like either drinking or eating. Within a radius of thirty or forty feet of where Underwood and I had been lying, I picked up forty-eight arrows, and the tents were completely riddled. Probably three hundred balls and arrows had passed through them.

"Having drank our coffee, we held a council of war or rather got together to hear what Jim suggested, which was that it would be hopeless to try to return to Bannack the way we had come, as we would not only have the blood-hounds up on the side of the mountain after us, but the

Dr. Hough was married September 22, 1891, to Miss Elizabeth Trigge Thornton, eldest daughter of the late Colonel J. C. C. Thornton, who was an officer of prominence in the Confederate army and figured conspicuously in the early history and development of Montana. Mrs. Hough is a niece of the late General A. W. Doniphan, of Missouri, of Mexican war fame. They have a son, whom they have named Charles Cotesworth Pinckney.

The Doctor belongs to the Masonic fraternity and to the order of Elks. Politically, he is a Democrat, well informed in political economy and finance. In July, 1893, he was elected president of the Montana Free Coinage Association, and is now doing excellent work for the advancement of the cause on which the welfare of the State and nation so much depends.

Personally the Doctor is a prepossessing gentleman of high character, dignified bearing, but cordial in manner and warm in his friendship. While he is deeply interested in all public questions and prominent in the counsels of the State, he has always declined political honors, and regards his profession as his legitimate field. He is enthusiastic in all that pertains to the science of medicine and surgery, having devoted several winters to investigation in the hospitals of New York, Philadelphia and Europe.

JOHN MURPHY, as his name indicates, is a son of Irish parents, and he dates his birth in county Limerick, Ireland, December 25, 1835. He has been a resident of Montana since 1866, coming hither from California.

Mr. Murphy's early life was spent on the Emerald Isle, where he attended the public schools until he was thirteen years of age. He then accompanied an uncle to America, his parents being both deceased. His passage from the Queen's dominion to the United States was made in an American sailing-vessel known as the Constellation, the cost of the young lad's passage being $2.50. Upon his arrival in this country he went to Moravia, Cayuga county, New York, where he became a member of the family of Joseph Lee. Until 1858 he remained there working on a farm and attending the public schools. That year, at the age of twenty-four, he went to California. The first year of his residence in the Golden State he was engaged in ranching in Santa Clara county, and he subsequently mined in Siskiyou county for some four years. In 1865 the Indians became troublesome in the Northwest, and in Oregon their depredations and bloodshed called forth a proclamation asking for volunteers to render sate the homes of the whites. Mr. Murphy enlisted in the Veteran Corps, Fourth California Volunteers, and was mustered in at Fort Yam Hill, Oregon, under Captain Lyman Scott. The command was sent to eastern Oregon to repulse the Snake Indians who were very troublesome. This insurrection ended, Mr. Murphy was mustered out at San Francisco, December 19, 1865, when he returned to Santa Clara county and remained there until the following spring. He then started for Montana, arriving at McClellan Gulch, Deer Lake county, in May, 1866. He engaged in placer mining there that season and was the original discoverer of quartz on that (McClellan) creek.

In the fall of 1866 Mr. Murphy visited his former home in New York, returning to Montana in the spring of 1867, via the Missouri river, the trip from St. Louis to Fort Benton, Montana, consuming sixty-two days. This was the first of fourteen visits Mr. Murphy has made to New York since his arrival in Montana.

When the placer season opened in the spring of 1867, he resumed operations in McClellan Gulch, and worked in that vicinity until the summer of 1881, when he disposed of his mining properties to a Michigan company. He then engaged in ranching immediately below Helena, where he remained until 1889, at which time he disposed of his property to a St. Louis man, and returned to Deer Lodge county. In Deer Lodge county he has large landed interests, and is engaged in stock raising in the Nevada creek valley. He is also largely interested in mining in various localities.

whole Crow nation that we had passed three weeks before. Therefore, we would have to return by the way of the South Pass and Fort Bridger, although it was some ten or twelve hundred miles, and part of it over a totally unexplored county, inhabited by the hostile Sioux, which fact Jim said 'would prevent the red devils up there,' pointing to them, 'from following us more than seventy-five or a hundred miles and we might by a scratch, miss the others.'

"The route being decided upon, we determined to wait till noon or later to see the last of poor Watkins, Bostwick, and Bell, by which time we thought they would breathe their last. The other wounded, we thought, could all ride. We also decided that we would throw away all of our outfit but five or six days' rations, to lighten up the packs, for the purpose of riding our horses seventy-five miles the first twenty-four hours, the object being to get the Indians following us too far from their main camp to return for reinforcements, should they succeed in surrounding us and compelling us to entrench ourselves. Jim then said it was important to show the Indians that we had 'good medicine,' and that 'our hearts were not on the ground,' by challenging them then and there for a fight, stating that he didn't know whether they would fight or not; 'but that if it was Bannacks or Snakes, they would give us a brush;' but that 'he was not familiar enough with the Crows to know whether they would or not; but if they did, we had as well fight them there as anywhere, and it would have a good effect on them in their future attacks.' We then proceeded to throw away all but six days' rations and a few other necessary articles; and being all ready to start, we prepared for a fight, But before going out, Gerry, Underwood, and myself, who belonged to the 'fraternity,' had a little side

Mr. Murphy was married in 1869, to Miss Ellen Smith, of Moravia, New York. Their only child, Smith Murphy, is now engaged in business in San Diego, California.

He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, being a Knight Templar and member of the Mystic Shrine. He belongs to the Wadsworth Post, G. A. R., of Helena. In politics, he has always been a Republican, and while in California, in 1860, was one of three men out of 300 who cast a ballot for Abraham Lincoln for President.

HENRY MCCAULY, a farmer of Boulder valley, was born in McHenry county, Illinois, in March, 1835, a son of Thomas and Mary (Knowlan) McCauly, who were born and married in county Fermanagh, Ireland. One child was born to them in that country, which afterward died. In 1834 the parents emigrated to America; resided first in Canada, and then removed to McHenry county, Illinois, which was then a comparatively new country. The father purchased and improved Government land, and became one of the prominent and respected farmers of that county, where he continued to reside until his death. Ten children were born to Mr. and Mrs. McCauly in Illinois, eight of whom are now living.

Henry, their eldest living child, was raised on the farm on which he was born, and received his education in the little log schoolhouse of that early day. In 1852, via the Nicaragua route, he went to California; followed mining successfully in Trinity and Nevada counties for a time, and then returned to the place of his birth, in Illinois. Mr. McCauly next followed freighting two years at Lawrence, Kansas. During the gold excitement at Pike's Peak, in 1859, he crossed the plains to Colorado, and mined at Russell's Gulch, Cash creek, etc., from that time until 1863. He left Denver in the latter year, and arrived in Montana in March, 1864, after which he followed mining at Virginia City and Last Chance Gulch. In that year Mr. McCauly located land in Boulder valley, ten miles below the city of Boulder, where he was among the first settlers. The Indians were numerous and troublesome at that time. He built a log cabin on his land; engaged in stock-raising, and from time to time added to his original purchase, until he now owns 600 acres. His horses are of the Norman Percheron breed, and his cattle are Durhams.

Mr. McCauly was married, May 4, 1865, to Miss Bridget Clark, a native of New York city and a daughter of Cornelius Clark, a Montana pioneer of 1863. After coming to this State he located a short distance from Mr. McCauly's home, where he resided until his death, in 1893, at the age of seventy years. His wife still resides at the old homestead. Our subject and wife have six children,—Thomas H., Mary Jane (now Mrs. Robert Twigs), Annie, John, William and Cornelius. Mr. McCauly has been a life-long Democrat; has served his county as Assessor, and for eight years held the office of School Trustee. The family are devout members of the Catholic Church. In an early day Mr. McCauly assisted in building the Catholic church at Helena, and afterward built a church in his own valley. The family have many friends in Jefferson county, where they have resided for so many years.

talk, which resulted in each one delaring that if he got mortally wounded, he would reserve one shot that should prevent unnecessary sacrifice of the party by remaining to defend a man that must soon die any way, and also to prevent torture, if captured. In order to ascertain when we were mortally wounded, we agreed to have Jim examine and decide. On the other hand, we agreed to remain by and defend each other as long as there was hope of the wounded man living. This understood, we talked it over with Jim, and finally with all the rest, who all came to the same agreement.

"This fearful determination was prompted by our desperate situation, as it then seemed impossible for any of us to escape; but we all had a great desire for some of the party to do so, and report where, when, and how we had died. We felt absolutely desperate and reckless, yet determined that some of us should live to report our fate, if a brave resistance could do it.

"I doubt if there was a single one who thought he would be the fortunate one to escape; but there was no desponding or lamenting—all were resolved to die fighting. Our captain said he thought about half of us might live to tell the tale by keeping cool, sticking close together, and every man doing his duty. All being ready, we started in a single file for an elevated plateau about 300 yards off, and diagonally toward the Indians. A forlorn hope, indeed! but resolute and determined. Arriving

JOHN REED has been a continuous resident of Virginia City, Montana, since June 20, 1863, and is one of the representative placer-mining men of Alder Gulch. Without more than a passing notice of him, this work would be incomplete. A review of his life is as follows:

John Reed was born in Columbia county, Pennsylvania, June 24, 1824. His father, Phelix Reed, was born in Belfast, Ireland, in 1788, and when he grew up he emigrated to America and settled in New Jersey. He was married in Pennsylvania, near the New Jersey line, to Miss Elizabeth Clark, a native of New Jersey and also of Irish descent. After their marriage they removed to what is now a portion of the city of Philadelphia, where they remained two years and from whence they removed to Columbia county, Pennsylvania, and purchased a farm. On that farm they spent the residue of their lives. Mrs. Reed died there in 1856, in the fifty-fifth year of her age. She was a Presbyterian, a woman of many excellent qualities, and was the mother of seven children, six of whom reached adult age. Mr. Reed died in his seventy-seventh year. He had been reared in the Catholic faith and was an honorable and industrious man. Of that family only three are now living—two sisters and the subject of this sketch.

John Reed was next to the oldest in the family and was reared in his native county, attending the public schools in winter and working on the farm in summer. When he reached his majority he left the old farm and secured employment in the iron mills, receiving 87½ cents per day and boarding himself at $2 per week. In 1848 he removed to Mercer county, Illinois, and the following year to La Crosse, Wisconsin, where he was employed in rafting lumber on the Mississippi river. He at first worked for others and afterward for himself, and remained there until October, 1858, when he went to Fort Riley, Kansas. On the 17th of May of the following year he started across the plains with ox teams for Pike's Peak, and reached Denver on the 17th of June, Denver then consisting of only a few log houses. The Gregory mine had been discovered a short time before, and to it Mr. Reed directed his course. He did his first mining in Russell's Gulch, where he and some other parties were partners in a claim. They began work July 1 and worked until August 3, and during that time took out $2,000, after which they sold the claim for $1,000, thinking they could do better elsewhere. Going south, they found gold in paying quantities on the main fork of the South Platte, and there organized the Fair Play district, which was strictly in accordance with its name. They mined there successfully, made other prospecting tours which were not successful, sometimes having plenty of provisions and at other times none, and finally, March 24, 1863, procured oxen and wagons and started for Florence, Idaho, traveling by the old overland stage route to Fort Bridger. When they crossed the Snake river they learned that the mines at Florence were exhausted, and they also heard of the discovery of gold at Bannack. To the latter place they directed their course and arrived at Bannack on the 14th of June.

At Bannack Mr. Reed heard of the wonderful discoveries at Alder Gulch, so to this place he started on foot, carrying a pack of about fifty pounds. The distance is sixty miles. Reaching his destination on the 20th of June, he met two of the men with whom he had crossed the plains, and of them learned that the gulch a mile above the town was all vacant, so he took his mining tools and went up to see the country, going a distance of about three miles. There he camped and began to look for a show. The following morning he began to dig, and dug a hole thirteen feet deep, but the water soon filled it at the place he had selected for the fight, our captain went through the whole manuel of signs, calling them cowards, thieves, murderers, and everything else, and then defied them to come down and fight us. At first they signalled an acceptance, and began moving around, as though they were coming, but finally settled down again behind rocks and trees, evidently concluding they would wait a better chance. After waiting until satisfied they would not come, we returned to camp. It was now about three P. M., and Jim said we would soon have to start. Bell had given up all his valuables, and given me directions what to do with his property if I escaped; but when Jim felt his pulse, he expressed surprise at not finding him sinking; yet from the nature of his wounds, he could not hope for his life. On asking him if he didn't think he could ride, he expressed a willingness to try, saying he might go little ways at any rate. While helping Bell on a horse, poor Bostwick blew his brains out. Geery, who was sleeping with him, said that when Bostwick found he was shot, he asked him (Geery) to cock his revolver and put it in his right hand, stating that he wanted to sell his life as dearly as possible; that he had not long to live, but would save some of the Indians. He was sinking rapidly, up and he was obliged to select another spot. The next morning he began with renewed energy, at a point about twenty-five feet east of where he had worked the day before. At ten o'clock he had got down nine feet, without water, and had struck the sloping rim rock and found the precious metal. Here he took out $180 to the pan of dirt. He and his partner weighed it to make sure of the exact amount. The men who were with him entered ground for their friends, and he took claims for his partners he had left at Bannack. One of the men mounted his pony at eleven o'clock A. M. and started for Bannack, arrived there at daylight the following morning, informed the boys of their good find, and the next day by three o'clock they were all on hand. Mr. Reed and the men who were with him had kept themselves secreted in the brush until the others arrived. On the 4th of July, 1863, they organized their district and elected their officers, and here Mr. Reed has mined ever since. He now owns nineteen-twenty-fourths of the whole district comprising two miles of the gulch. From time to time, as other members of the company wished to sell, he bought them out, and during each summer he works successfully about thirty men. During his mining career he has taken out many hundred thousand dollars, which he has invested chiefly in Government bonds. Besides these bonds he has 400 acres of land, several pieces of property in Virginia City, and the pleasant residence in which he and his family reside.

Mr. Reed was married in 1882, to Mrs. Clara L. Hathaway, widow of H. H. Hathaway. She was born in New York, and reared in Branch county, Michigan. Mr. Hathaway was thrown from his wagon and instantly killed in 1879. He was for a number of years in partnership with Mr. Reed.

Mr. Reed is identified with the Masonic fraternity, being Treasurer of the blue lodge, Excellent King of the chapter, and Treasurer of the commandery. He has been a consistent and reliable member of the Republican party since its organization, but has never been an office-seeker. Ever since he located here he has been identified with the best interests of Virginia City. During its early history, when it became necessary for the safety of the settlers to organize the Vigilant Committee, he joined it and thus rendered needed and timely aid in ridding the country of the lawless class that had made this the seat of its murders and robberies. Indeed, his whole life has been one of industry and integrity, and by his many estimable qualities he has won the esteem of a wide circle of friends.

PHILIP E. EVANS, deceased, was for a number of years one of the honored residents of Montana.

He was born in Cooper county, Missouri, December 22, 1833. His remote ancestors were Welsh, but for many generations his people had been residents of America. His father, Dr. Thomas Evans, was born and educated in Baltimore, Maryland, and removed from there to Missiouri in the early history of that State. He practiced medicine there up to the time of his death, which occurred in the seventy-first year of his age. Philip E. was the fourth of his family of eleven children, and was reared and educated in his native State.

For several years Mr. Evans was successfully engaged in the mercantile business in Missouri, continuing thus occupied until the panic of 1857, when he failed. After his failure in business he turned his attention to farming, in which he was engaged when the civil war broke out. He was drafted into the State militia and a little later was elected Justice of the Peace, being released from the militia in order to serve in this office. Soon afterward he removed to Kentucky. While he was a Southerner in sentiment, he was opposed to the war and believed that it could and should have been avoided, and consequently had no desire to take part in it.

In 1864 Mr. Evans came up the Missouri river to Montana and located on a ranch in Ruby valley, near where the town of Sheridan now stands. Here he obtained 160 and refused to let us try to put him on a horse, saying that it was utterly useless, and would increase his sufferings for nothing, as it was impossible for him to live. This was some time before, and the report of his pistol suprised me, as I supposed him to be in a dying condition.

"Succeeding at last in getting Bell on a horse, we started slowly off, as of course he could not go fast. Riding up to Jim, I said I believed Bell would live. To which he replied that he feared not; that it was only a spasmodic effort, and that he would probably fall dead off his horse within an hour or so.

"As we began to move, the Indians mounted their ponies, and moved along parellel to us, but out of gunshot. Bell apparently got stronger; and when we reached a little stream about five miles from our camp, Jim called a halt for consultation and further examination of Bell's pulse and wounds. After which, he announced that there was a show for his life; therefore, we would camp right there and then, and give Bell a chance to recruit up, adding that we would stay by him at all hazards, so long as there was a hope of his life, but that it would now be impossible for us to go more than fifteen or twenty miles a day. This was a serious and desperate change in our plans, as we had thrown away nearly all our provisions, expecting to go seventy-five miles in the first twenty-four hours, and thus get beyond reinforcements to, and possibly out of reach of the Indians, who were at that acres of land, and the following year was joined by his wife and five children, they too making the journey up the Missouri river, and being met by him with teams at Fort Benton. On this frontier ranch they resided until 1870, when he sold out and purchased a farm two miles southwest of Deer Lodge, where he spent the residue of his life and died, the date of his death being May 11, 1889. His last illness was inflammation of the bowels, the result of an injury received by his being thrown from a cart in which he was riding. For nearly twenty years he had resided on his farm near Deer Lodge, making numerous and valuable improvements upon it. His distinguishing characteristics were his honesty, industry, generosity and kindness of heart, and these estimable qualities endeared him not only to his family, but also to a large circle of friends.

Politically, Mr. Evans was a Democrat all his life. While in Madison county he served as County Commissioner, after coming to Deer Lodge county was elected and served three terms as County Assessor, and he was also, for a number of years, Justice of the Peace. In the winter of 1869 he was elected and served as Engrossing Clerk of the Territorial Assembly. In all of these positions he performed his duty with the strictest fidelity. His public service brought him into contact with nearly all the leading pioneers of the State, and by all who knew him he was held in the highest esteem.

Mr. Evans was married in Missouri in 1856 to Miss Mary B. Powell, a native of Virginia and a descendant of one of the old families of that State. She is still living and is now an honored resident of Deer Lodge. They had ten children, of whom nine are living, occupying useful positions in life. Their son John is Register of the Land Office at Missoula, another son is clerk in the Treasurer's office at that place, and a third son, Nathaniel P., is County Commissioner of Deer Lodge county. It is through the kindness of the last named that we obtained the data for this sketch. The names of the daughters are Mrs. A. McMurphy, Mrs. J. W. Lister, Mrs. Wm. J. Allin, Mrs. Lewis Crutchfield, and Miss Sophia C.

AUGUSTUS F. GRAETER, of Red Rock, Beaver Head county, Montana, has been identified with Montana since its early pioneer days and has done his part toward bringing about its present development.

Mr. Graeter was born at Allentown, Pennsylvania, July 29, 1834, son of Augustus and Sarah (Hoffman) Graeter. His father was in early life a book and newspaper publisher, but after his removal to Ohio, in 1836, he turned his attention to farming and also ran a brewery. In Warren, Trumbull county, Ohio, the subject of our sketch received his education in the common schools, remaining on his father's farm until 1856. Then, at the age of twenty-one, he went to Nebraska and began clerking in a store, and was thus employed when the Pike's Peak excitement broke out in 1858. He was among others who sought the gold mines of that district, and mined at Russell Gulch and Quartz Hill, being moderately successful. And we here state that his mining operations, there and subsequently in Montana, have been on his own account, as he never worked more than one day in the mines for wages.

In 1862 Mr. Graeter came to Montana, intending to go to the mines on Salmon river, but when he got as far as old Fort Lemhi and could go no farther with team and wagon, he concluded to go to the Bitter Root valley, but got on the wrong trail, and before he reached his destination became discouraged and returned down Snake river, bought some provisions and started back on another route, and landed in Bannack in the latter part of 1862, where he began mining. In the fall of 1864 we find him at Alder Gulch. Here, he took a claim and mined two seasons, moment gathering about us on the hills. Still the men all cheerfully and heartily indorsed the captain's resolution, and we accordingly halted and remained some two or three hours, getting supper and allowing Bell to rest.

"After a very difficult and tedious descent into a gorge to get water, we halted about four P. M. to get supper. All of us were intensely wearied and worn out. A few men were thrown out as pickets, and the rest were busied in unpacking, when, in the midst of our preparations for supper and rest, York announced that he saw Indians approaching from the points above us. All hands flew to arms, but were startled and checked by the report of a rifle right in our midst. We knew that it must be one of our own guns, but whether accidently or purposely discharged we did not at first know; but looking inquiringly around, all eyes at last centered upon Geery, who, with a deathly pallor on his face, stood with his head erect, but his body partly leaning against his rifle. He answered our anxious looks by saying: 'I have foolishly but accidently destroyed my life.' Rushing up to him we eased him down to a sitting posture. He then, with great calmness and deliberation, opened the bosom of his shirt, pointing to the ghastly wound, about three inches above his left taking out considerable gold. Early in 1865 he went to Last Chance," now Helena, and from there to Blackfoot City. At the latter place he conducted a store until 1866, when he returned to Bannack. From that year up to the present time he has carried on a merchandising business at Bannack and has also been engaged in extensive placer and interested in mining operations there.

His son, L. D. Graeter, now has charge of the placer mines, working them on a paying basis. In 1871 Mr. Graeter purchased a ranch on Horse prairie in Beaver Head county. Here he has 2,000 acres of land and raises hay and stock.

July 29, 1858, Mr. Graeter married Miss Emily Drury, who died in June, 1880, and is buried at Highgate, Vermont, her birthplace. She was the mother of two children: Luther D., who married Miss Birdie Miner, of Arcata, California; and Blanche Alice, who is now the wife of Charles Falk, of Eureka, California. In September, 1881, Mr. Graeter married Miss Mary J. Taylor, of New Brunswick, and they have three children,—Arthur, Edith and Sarah.

Mr. Graeter's political views are in harmony with the principles advocated by the Democratic party. He is identified with the Masonic order and is a member of Bannack Lodge, No. 16.

THEODORE BRANTLY, Judge of the Third Judicial District of Montana, comprising Deer Lodge and Granite counties, is a native of the State of Tennessee, born in Wilson county, February 12, 1852.

Judge Brantly's great-grandfather, Edwin Brantly, came with his family from Holland to this country and settled in South Carolina. He was twice married, the maiden name of his second wife being Mary Reading. She was descended from a family of French Huguenots who had escaped massacre in their own land and had sought a refuge in America, taking up their abode in South Carolina. Edwin Brantly and his wife had four sons and two daughters. He served as a Captain during the war of 1812, and after that war removed to south Alabama, where he was a slaveholder and owned and operated a large plantation. He spent the residue of his life there and died at the age of seventy-five years, his wife's death occurring there several years before his.

Edwin Theodore, their youngest son, was Judge Brantly's father. He was born in southern Alabama, and was educated in the University of Tennessee at Knoxville, and in the Union Theological Seminary in New York city. He was then ordained a Presbyterian minister and became pastor of the Bethany Presbyterian Church in Giles county, Tennessee. In 1850 he married Miss Eliza Brown, a native of Giles county, and a daughter of Duncan Brown, Esq., who had sprung from Scotch ancestors who had emigrated to the north of Ireland and from thence to America previous to the Revolution. Some members of the family participated in the war for independence. Some time after his marriage, Rev. Brantly removed to Wilson county. His whole life has been devoted to the work of the ministry, and he is now preaching in Nashville, Tennessee. His good wife died in 1853. She was the mother of three children, two of whom are still living. The eldest son is following in the footsteps of his honored father, and is doing faithful service as a Presbyterian clergyman.

Judge Brantly was the second born in his father's family. He had the advantage of a refined home influence, and through his own efforts he secured a college education. It may here be noted the ravages of the Civil war had swept away nearly all the property belonging to the Brantly family, and as Theodore grew up he found himself dependent upon his own resources. In 1874 he graduated with the degree of A. B. in the Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville, Tennessee. From that date until 1878 most of his time was spent in teaching. He then entered Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tennessee, and after spending one year in that institution resumed teaching in order to earn the means nipple, said: 'My life is fast ebbing away -only a few hours more; but that is too long for you all to remain here. See, the sun is fast declining behind the mountains; the Indians will soon be upon you, and it would be impossible for you to defend yourselves in this place. Jim, tell the boys I am fatally wounded.' The request but too plainly indicated his dreadful resolution, and too soon brought us to an awful realization of our desperate but determined agreement on the morning after the attack, and we all appealed to him not to think of so rash an act, telling him that he might live, and using every argument that we could think of, collectively and individually begging him not to think of such a thing. During the whole time he held his revolver firmly grasped in his right hand, and warned us that any attempt to take it away from him would only hasten his action. No one attempted to force it away from him; we only reasoned, or tried to reason with him, but could not make him lose sight of the inevitable fact that he must die within a few hours anyhow, but that in the meantime darkness would be upon us, and with it the Indians, who were already approaching us, and whom we could not successfully resist in such a place. Finally, he he called upon Jim to 'tell the truth; tell the boys I can't live over a few hours at the most.' Jim, who was in tears, and his big heart almost breaking, could not truthfully answer him in the negative; therefore he evaded a direct reply, by answering: 'Never mind, Geery; we will stay by you—all the Indians in the world couldn't drive us away from you.'

"This reply only seemed to fix his noble soul in the resolution to do what he knew would probably save the party, or most of them; yet how few men there are that could so reason and act under such circumstances. Turning to us, he said: 'See, comrades, Jim knows that I am fatally wounded, and must die soon, but he avoids telling me; and the fact that you would all, I know, stay by me and die for me has with which to complete his studies. He returned to the university and finished his course, and graduated in 1880 with the degree of B. L. Immediately after his graduation, young Brantly formed a law partnership with Hon. J. S. Gribble, of Lebanon, Tennessee, where he remained until March, 1883, when the partnership was dissolved. He then traveled in the West, looking for a locatton, and finally decided upon Lincoln, New Mexico. While making final arrangements for his removal to that point, he received notice of his election to the chair of ancient languages in Lincoln University, Lincoln, Illinois. This position he accepted and filled for a period of four years. In 1886-7 he was a teacher of Latin in the Sauveur Language School at Oswego, New York, and in 1887 he was elected to the chair of Latin and Greek in the College of Montana at Deer Lodge. This position he filled two years. In 1888, on examination before the Supreme Court of the State, he was admitted to the bar, after which he associated himself in the practice of law with Hon. J. C. Robinson, of Deer Lodge. A year later this partnership was dissolved, and Mr. Brantly opened an office on his own account and continued the practice of his profession alone. About this time he was nominated on the Republican ticket for District Judge, but was defeated by a small majority. In 1890 Hon. Ed. Scharmkow became associated with him in practice, and they did a large and successful business for two years, when, in 1892, Mr. Brantly was elected to his present position, that of Judge of the Third Judicial District of Montana. He is now serving his third year on the bench and giving the highest satisfaction, his decisions seldom being reversed.

Judge Brantly was married June 9, 1891, to Miss Lois Reat, a native of Tuscola, Illinois, and a descendant of Scotch-Irish ancestors. They have a son, born in Deer Lodge, whom they have named after both his grandfathers—Theodore Lee. They reside in one of the lovely homes of Deer Lodge, which the Judge built, and in which he and his amiable wife entertain their many friends.

Like nearly all the enterprising men who have come to Montana, Judge Brantly has invested in mining operations. He is also interested in real estate. Of his political views, we may say he was reared a Democrat, and affiliated with that party until the Garfield campaign, when, disagreeing with it on financial questions, he became a Republican and has since been in harmony with this party. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and is Past Chancellor of the K. of P., and both he and his wife are members of the Presbyterian Church.

PROF. RUFUS C. GARLAND, who is engaged in the practice of law with Judge T. E. Crutcher, at Helena, Montana, is one of the talented young men of the city.

determined me. Remember (putting the muzzle of his pistol against his breast), I am not committing suicide. Bear witness to my friends that I am only shortening my life a few hours to prevent you from uselessly and foolishly sacrificing yours in defense of mine. God knows I don't want to die; that I fear death—but have a Christian hope in eternity—yet must die, rather to save than to sacrifice. Remember this gorge in the mountains, and the spot where I am buried; describe it to my friends some day, if any of you ever live to tell of it.' Those strong men were all weeping over him as he continued: 'God bless you all, comrades; I must die, and in time for you to bury me and escape before dark. Bury me in this coat, and here.' He was about to fire the fatal shot, when Jim said: 'For God's sake, Geery, don't; but if you will do it, don't shoot yourself there; it will only prolong your agony (the muzzle of the pistol, as before stated, was against his breast). If you must do it, place the pistol to your temple.' To which Geery replied: 'Thanks, Jim; and may God bless you all, and take you safely out of this.' As he placed the pistol to his temple the men, with weeping eyes and full hearts, all turned to walk away, as they could not bear to see him fire. He pressed the trigger, and the cap only exploded. I never heard one half so loud before; it echoed in all directions as if to make him realize what he was doing. I then appealed to him saying, 'Geery, for God's sake desist, this is a warning.' To which he paid no attention nor made any reply, but rather seemed to be soliloquizing, and said, 'I know not what to think of that; it never snapped before.' Cocking his pistol again, he engaged a few seconds in mental prayer, and again pulled the trigger that launched him into eternity. The report of the fatal shot was awful, and sent a thrill through our swelling hearts that will never be forgotten.

"We gathered around his dying form, and it was 'indeed a fearful thing to see a human soul take wing,' especially as he had so nobly died to save us. Never before had I seen our little band give way; they all wept like children, and seemed far more disheartened than the morning after the massacre. Waiting some half hour after he had drawn his last breath, we buried him, as desired, in his soldier overcoat. We had scarcely finished his burial, when the pickets announced that the Indians were approaching us, and were within gunshot—yet there was no firing. After our last duty was finished, Jim directed us to pile limbs and brush on the grave,

Rufus C. Garland was born in Arkansas, October 23, 1867, son of A. H. Garland, prominent in the history of this country, having represented Arkansas in the Senate, served as Governor of that State, and under Cleveland's first term served as Attorney General of the United States. Rufus C. spent his early life in Little Rock, attending private schools. Afterward he went to Georgetown College, District of Columbia, and still later attended the Law School of the University of Georgetown, graduating in 1887. He was admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of Montana in 1891, and is now associated with Judge T. E. Crutcher.

Professor Garland began the study of music at Georgetown College, and at the age of eighteen began composing. He is the author of two operas—the first, "Madjoon," purely comic, and the other, "Silootah," an Indian opera. The latter was rendered at the opera house in Helena, and its introduction in New York is anticipated by its composer. He has also composed two masses, one in D minor, written especially for the celebration of Columbus day, which was sung in the Helena cathedral with great success; the other has not as yet been rendered. A Te Deum of fifty pages was composed by him for Mgr. Satolli, the papal delegate who visited Helena. Mr. Garland is the recipient of a letter from Bishop Brondell, bishop of Montana, stating that the Te Deum was of a nature so pleasing to the Monsignor that he desired a copy of it sent to St. Peter's at Rome, an honor hitherto accorded to but one other American composer. Mr. Garland has also composed many instrumental and vocal selections, sacred songs and ballads, which have met with the endorsement of lovers of music.

He is a member of the Catholic Church.

and burn them so as to conceal it from the Indians, and to prevent them from digging poor Geery up for his scalp and clothes. We then gathered our things together, as best we could, and packing up, moved on in single file, out of the gorge, camping, or rather hiding, in the sage-brush, some six miles away, where we arrived in the night."—S. T. H., in the Historical Society of Montana: Vol. 1, p. 200.

But to return to Alder Creek. The first finders of gold here were only five in number. If they had been more numerous or better equipped for battle, perhaps they would not have been "held up" by the Crow Indians as they were, and the great discovery might have been anywhere in the far or near future. The names of these five men were: William Fairweather, Thomas Conner, Henry Edgar and Barney Hughes. The last mentioned set out alone, after claims had been staked off, for Bannack, sixty miles to the west of the new world of gold, to give the good news to his friends of the mining, and a sort of Masonic fraternity. His friends and he, having been robbed, were also in hard straits for food. Wild berries were not yet ripe, and their scant ammunition could not be spent on game; though, as

WILLIAM J. MCNAMARA, of Butte City, came to Montana on the 18th of August, 1864.

He is a native of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, born on the 4th of March, 1842. His father, Peter McNamara, was born in county Clare, Ireland, emigrated to America in 1835, and was married to Miss Bridget Quinlin in 1838. After some years they removed from Cambridgeport to Jones county, Iowa, where he procured a farm and resided upon it until 1846, when his death occurred, in the fiftieth year of his age. He left four children, of whom only two of the sons survive. When they settled in Iowa it was a new country and the opportunities for education were limited.

William J. McNamara attended school at the pioneer log schoolhouse, obtaining but a meager education. His stepfather went to California at the time of the gold excitement, where he remained five years. His mother remained at home with the children, and the son assisted her to the extent of his ability in working the farm, breaking many an acre of tough prairie sod with seven yoke of oxen attached to one plow. His stepfather returned from California in 1855, having attained a moderate success.

In his twenty-second year the gold excitement carried him off to Montana. March 25, 1864, he started from Cascade, Dubuque county, Iowa, crossed the plains to Montana, arriving at Virginia City on the 18th day of August. He drove four yoke of oxen all the way, besides paying $40 for the privilege of coming with the train and being furnished his provisions by it. That year the Indians were very hostile, and when the emigrant train reached Powder river they were attacked by the Sioux and Cheyenne Indians, and had a severe fight, which lasted all day. The whites corraled their wagons, got the stock inside, and withstood charge after charge from the savages. In the train were 150 wagons and 450 men and about twelve women: all hands were engaged in the fight, and the women showed as much courage as the men. Had the Indians succeeded it would have been a big haul for them, but they were continually repulsed, and when night came on they withdrew, carrying with them, it was believed, about seventy-five of their number killed and wounded, while the brave emigrants lost seven of their number. During the conflict the Indians set fire on the prairie to the windward, but the whites succeeded in extinguishing it. When the Indians had withdrawn, the train moved on five miles and camped. On the way they found an emigrant with 100 arrows in his body, which was fearfully mutilated! They kept strict guard until after they had crossed the Big Horn river. They came by way of Bozeman, but there was no settlement there at that time.

When Mr. McNamara arrived at Virginia City his wealth consisted of $20 in money and a little bedding. He obtained work at mining, being paid $5 a day, and thus managed to obtain a livelihood. After a month he went to Last Chance, where there were about 150 miners, all of whom were complaining of the hard times there, and Mr. McNamara immediately returned on foot to Virginia City. By this time winter had set in, and, everything being frozen up, nothing was being done. Mr. McNamara had no money, and what little flour there was the few owners held at $1.60 a pound! In their desperation the miners arose and seized all the flour they could find,—about 160 sacks,—and divided it into twenty-five-pound parcels and sold it at 30 cents a pound, letting each one have only twenty-five pounds. Mr. McNamara stood in line for a long time to ascertain whether he would obtain a package of the flour, but finally gave it up, and subsisted mostly on beef. The trains with provisions from Salt Lake City had been snowed in, and did not arrive until about the 1st of June, 1865. For three months the miners subsisted mostly on beef.

In August, 1865, Mr. McNamara came to Silver Bow. There being no railroads in the country then, he was obliged to walk the entire distance of ninety miles with-the Indians had taken about everything they had, they were in less peril than when they first set out, fairly well equipped, on their prospecting tour.

A big party, about 200, came back with Hughes from Bannack, mostly strangers. Great courtesy is always extended to first discoverers, such as an extra claim by right of discovery to each member of the original party. Old miners, who are not personal friends, generally defer not only to the discoverers, but to their personal friends. In this case the bulk of the 200 camped within call for the night and allowed Hughes and his favorite friends to go on into Fairweather's camp alone.

The next morning they were on hand to help make mining laws and measure off claims. Captain James Stuart, the intrepid explorer, founder of cities, organizer and chosen leader of the expedition which resulted in this great discovery, was not "in at the death," as an Englishman would say. His story of this date is only a fair illustration of what may be called "the irony of miners' luck." He did not return to Bannack and thus learn the good news till late in June. And even then not all of his followers came back with him; nor did all of them ever come back any more. Three of them fell at the hands of the Crow Indians, and all were terribly worn and discouraged when they out meeting scarcely a house. D. D. McDonald had been there and staked out three or four claims, one of them for Mr. McNamara. He took his claim and mined there till 1872, making a living. In that year he came to Butte and began to operate quartz mines, and the town then took a new start. He located the Mountain View and the Never-Sweat. At times he found himself unable to represent his locations and was obliged to re-locate them several times, but finally sold the Mountain View to Charles X. Laraby for $30,000, and his quarter interest in the Never-Sweat to the Anaconda Company, at the rate of $40,000 for the mines. Both of these mines became famous producers. Mr. McNamara is still interested in a number of valuable mines,—among them the Poland, the Carrie, the East Moscow, the Snohomish and the Tramway,—all copper mines, besides several silver mines. He has built the Silver Bow block, one of the finest brick blocks in the city, also the McNamara, a brick building; and he has also other houses. His mining claims at Centerville enclosed a great portion of the town. He has leased the ground, and it is now occupied and built upon.

Taking a single glance over the life career of the subject of the foregoing sketch, it is remarkable to observe how he has arisen from a state of poverty, walking in the wilds of the West and carrying his own blankets and sleeping out of doors, to his present position of wealth and influence,—all by his own unaided efforts. He is a member of the Silver Bow Club, in politics a Democrat, has been a member of the City Council, and is considered one of the best citizens of Butte City.

THE SANFORD BROTHERS, prominent ranchers of the little Prickly Pear valley, are natives of England. William, the youngest brother, came from his native land in 1849, at the age of sixteen years, to make a fortune, but with no intention of becoming an American citizen. After arriving in this country he was first employed as a clerk in a store in Chicago until the spring of 1852, and then went to St. Paul, Minnesota. He remained in that State until 1864, and during that time took part in an Indian war. Mr. Sanford drove the medicine wagon to Fort Ridgely and Birch Cooley, and also took part in a number of battles. In 1864 he crossed the plains to Montana, and September 17, of the same year, located near where he now resides, where he engaged in mining operations, but met with only moderate success. He next began the purchase of land, and he and his brother now own 360 acres, where they are engaged in the raising of Herford and Durham cattle, and English shire and Hambletonian horses. They also have 160 acres on the Missouri river, from which they cut large quantities of hay for their stock. The farm contains valuable gold diggings, and during a portion of the year the brothers are engaged in mining.

Thomas Sanford came to America from his native country in 1869, spending the first year in Michigan, and then came to Montana. He was married March 7, of that year, to Miss Ann Cox, a native also of England, and a daughter of Charles Cox, also born in that country, but now a resident of Michigan, having reached the good old age of eighty-five years. Mr. and Mrs. Sanford have had eight children, namely: John, born in 1859; Mary Tressa Agnes, born in 1861, is now the wife of H. J. Herring, and resides near her parents; William James, born 1863, died during the following year; Julia M., who was drowned in the river in her sixth year, soon after the family's arrival in Montana: Frances Mary, born in 1866; Lucy Mary Cicely, in 1869; and Clara Rose and Rose Clara, twins, the former now Mrs. John Painton, and the latter deceased when two weeks old. The Sanford brothers are life-long Republicans, are men of a high order of intelligence and integrity, have been prominently identified with the country of their adoption, and have been very successful in their business dealings.

got back. They had made a journey of nearly 2,000 miles through a trackless land of savages, finding nothing for which they sought. It is some pleasure to know that the early miners of Bannack were vastly profited, on the whole, even though Stuart, the first man in that camp as well as at Gold Creek, was not.

I must not omit to mention here that many good men claim that the first mining done in Montana was at the place, Bannack, under the leadership of John White. He seems not to have realized greatly, like many another leader, and, taking to ranching, was murdered for the sake of money realized from his dairy.

An inspection of Montana's map will show that the famous mines are grouped singularly near together. Put your finger on Alder Creek to begin with and you can read in the radius of a few inches nearly all the famous mining camps that gave the yellow flame which fired the commercial heart of the world, built railroads, reared palatial homes and illuminated the way to Statehood. Kootenai is a long distance from this center, and Bannack is not in this narrow radius, nor is Gold Creek; but these must be set down nearly as right on the way to the glittering city of gold. And while glancing at this map of the gold and silver centers, read the names of the towns, creeks, peaks and so on. For, as we can generally tell by a map of the Atlantic States what nationality first set ploughshare here or there along the seaboard, so we can read in the names on the Montana map the place from which the first miners in this camp or that set out to seek their fortunes, and to which their hearts turned most fondly when they thought of home. Here, too, you can read natural history, in such names as Rattlesnake creek, Elk creek, Black-tail Deer creek, Grasshopper creek.

Something of the magnitude—if the term may be applied to the length of a stream—may be comprehended in the fact that Alder creek alone, with its tributary gulches, was soon divided into six separate mining districts. The mining laws of each were, in a general way, the WASHINGTON NYHART, a successful farmer and stock-raiser, residing at Point of Rocks in Beaver Head valley, Montana, was born in Pennsylvania, August 13, 1835, and is a descendant of German ancestors.

Great-grandfather Nyhart was born in Germany. He emigrated to America and settled in Pennsylvania, and there our subject's grandfather and father were born, the latter, Adam Nyhart, in 1806. Adam Nyhart married Susan Rumbeck, also a native of the Keystone State, and they became the parents of seven sons and three daughters, Washington being the third born. The mother died in her forty-first year. In 1858 the father removed to Iowa, where he now resides, having attained his eighty-seventh year. He has been an honest, industrious farmer, and a God-fearing man.

Washington Nyhart was reared to farm life in his native State, his education being obtained in the district school. He continued to work on his father's farm until he was twenty-five years of age. September 24, 1861, he was married to Miss Mary Linder, a native of Greenfield, Greene county, Illinois, and they continued to live in Iowa until 1864, where two children, George W. and Jordan L., were born to them.

In 1864 Mr. Nyhart crossed the plains to Montana, bringing with him his wife and children. Mrs. Nyhart's brother, W. J. Linder, and her father and family were also members of the emigrant party. Their trip across the plains and their trouble with the Indians are referred to elsewhere in this work, in the sketch of W. J. Linder. After their safe arrival in Virginia City, Mr. Nyhart built a log cabin and soon afterward had a siege of mountain fever. When he recovered he worked for wages at mining, receiving from five to eight dollars per day. Thus he was employed two winters and a summer, and one summer he teamed. He came to his present location in 1868. Here he squatted on land. After it was surveyed he secured 160 acres, to which he has since added until he now owns 320 acres. The little log cabin which served for his home until 1878 was then replaced by a comfortable residence, and here he and his good wife have worked hard and raised their large family of children.

The children born to them in Montana are as follows: Columbus Albert, John Adam, Mary Delila (now Mrs. William Stewart), Susan E. (who died in infancy), Charles Edward, Earnest Gilbert, William Sylvester, Thomas Leander and Eliza.

Politically, Mr. Nyhart has always been a Democrat, but at present is displeased with the action of his party on the silver question.

same, and were born of the experience of many years. Like the school laws of Montana, they were taken almost bodily, in the first instance, from that State. They were brief,—would that the same might be said of all our laws—terse, to the point, equitable, capable of no interpretations, and, as a rule, without appeal. These simple laws governed cities of more than 10,000 souls and governed so justly that one cannot help saying with Buckle as he contemplates how little time and money was wasted in settling disputes which might have been interminable if we had had laws and lawyers: "The strewn with the remains of dead "cities" all along the Sierras, and so were not swift to build beyond immediate needs. But despite all their caution and experience, cities more than a mile long, though usually not more than one street wide, grew up like Jonah's gourd.

The best mines naturally fell to old miners, men with a dash of gray about the temples, men true and tried, sober, steady, energetic best law that man could enact would be a law repealing all former laws."

Life went on with a rush and a roar from the first. The Californians had come from a land

JAMES P. MURRAY, a prominent stockman and ex-Sheriff of Beaver Head county, Montana, was born in Ashland county, Ohio, August 8, 1849. His grandfather, Patrick Murray, was of Irish birth and emigrated from the Emerald Isle to America with his family in the year 1800, becoming one of the pioneer settlers of Ashland county, Ohio. He served as a soldier in the war of 1812, and lived to be ninety-nine years of age. Hugh Murray, our subject's father, was the youngest of Patrick Murray's family of eight children, and was born in Ashland county in 1816. He married Miss Elizabeth Nazor, a native of Pennsylvania and a descendant of German ancestry. They had five children. He died in 1850, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, leaving his widow to care for her little children, James P. at that time being only nine months old. Although they experienced some pretty hard times, the mother reared and provided for her family, and lived to the advanced age of seventy-one years. Her death occurred in June, 1892. They were most worthy people, the Murrays being Methodists and the mother a Lutheran.

Early in life James P. Murray attended the district school near his home, and when he was only eleven years old began to do farm work, for which he received $6 per month. When he was seventeen he began learning the carpenter's trade; and followed that business for eight years. In 1875 he came to Montana and settled at Bannack. There he formed a partnership with Isaac Portras, with whom he was engaged in the wagon-making business and also in blacksmithing for four years. In 1879 Mr. Murray was elected, on the Democratic ticket, Sheriff of Beaver Head county. The county seat was then at Bannack. During his term of office Mr. Murray had many hard characters to arrest and handle. One of them was sentenced to be hung, but secured a new trial and got a life term, Mr. Murray thus escaping the painful duty that would have devolved upon him. In 1881 he purchased a ranch in Beaver Head valley, near Dillon, the tract comprising 800 acres, and on it he engaged in raising horses. Now, however, he gives his chief attention to the sheep industry, his flock numbering 5,000 head. He also raises hay and grain, to some extent. On his farm is a most valuable spring which affords from 700 to 800 inches of water, rendering his place one of the most desirable in the whole valley. In the summer his sheep have a large free range and in the winter they are kept on the ranch.

In his political views Mr. Murray is a Democrat first, last, and always. He is yet unmarried.

In 1877, during the Nez Perce raid, the people of Bannack city, Montana, became very much alarmed as to their safety, as reports were flying thick and fast that the battle at Gibbonsville, General Gibbon in command, had been fought and that the Indians had come out victorious and were now on their way up the Big Hole basin and were killing settlers all along the line. A meeting was held at Bannack for the purpose of getting volunteers to go out on picket duty to locate the reds. Mr. Murray, Thomas Hamilton and William Shineberger volunteered to undertake this dangerous task. They saddled their horses, took along a little flour and bacon and started for the Big Hole basin, sixty miles away: rode all day and part of the night and went into camp near the summit, between the Grasshopper and Big Hole valleys.

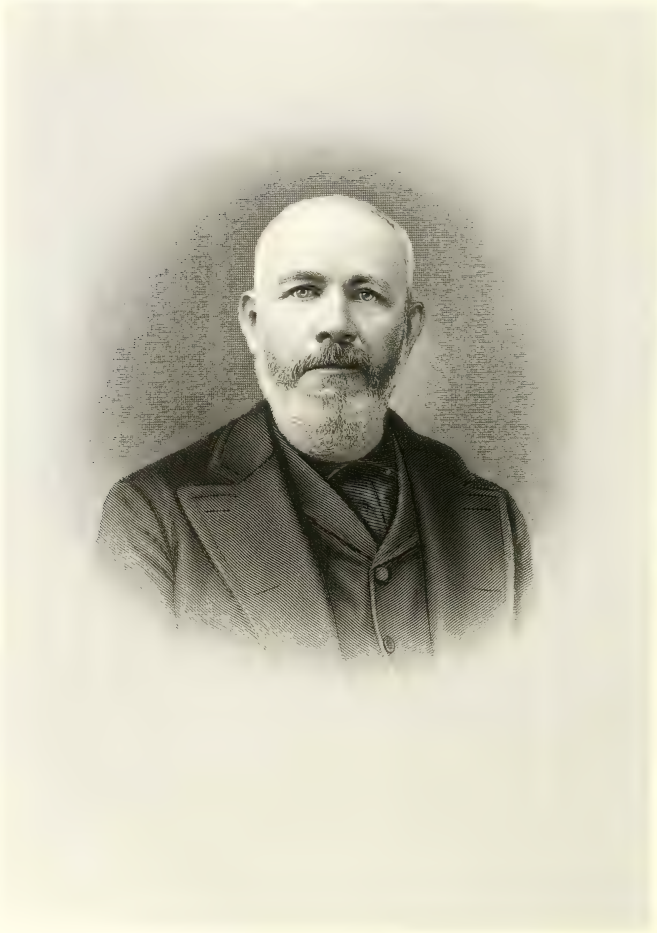
The next morning they resumed their journey, and about noon they spied something far in the distance that appeared like the "red devils," which appearance proved true by the aid of field glasses; sure enough the advance guard was Indians. The white party put spurs to their horses and struck out for the hills, and procured a good hiding place in a ravine, where they could see the Indians' movements. They came along up the valley and in the rear could be seen what was supposed to be Chief Joseph's army; but it proved to be General Howard and command, and his Indian scouts. Mr. Murray and his colleagues felt better after they saw that they were United States soldiers, and went down and met them, to learn that the Indians they were looking for had passed along during the night within a short distance of where the whites were sleeping.

and industrious; these laid the corner-stones of Montana, laid them in solid gold, if you please.

The men were called "tenderfeet," possibly because they had come far and felt tender-footed, possibly because they never felt quite sure of their footing in a mining center; these took naturally to a higher line of work,—the builder, the butcher, the baker, the boarding-house keeper,—and here, as Lincoln would say, I am reminded of a little story:

Mrs. Mc—— had come all the way from Chicago with lots of pluck and no money, to start a boarding-house. There was plenty of competition, for other pretty widows had come from other places of enterprise also, and she went up Alder creek one day where the miners were doing their own cooking, mainly to solicit other boarders. After a little talk with a confirmed "bach," finding that she was making no headway, she said, half pettishly, "Well, they do say that you fellows never wash your hands when you make bread, at all." The big miner stopped blazing away with his pick at the bed-rock and looked up angrily at the pretty woman on the running-plank above him. "It's a lie!

Mr. Murray and party then returned to Bannack with General Howard and command, to learn that the reds had killed five ranchmen on Horse prairie, and were headed toward the National Park. On their return to Bannack they were met by the citizens who warmly thanked them for their efforts to locate the reds and to learn that all danger was past.



CHARLES HENRY BENTON, Judge of the Eighth Judicial District of Montana, and a resident of Great Falls, is a native of the State of New York, born in Saratoga county, May 30, 1844.

Judge Benton is of Norman and old English descent, and traces his ancestry back to the twelfth century. His remote ancestors were Knights of St. John, of Jerusalem, afterward called Knights of Malta, and went on a crusade to Jerusalem to rescue that city from the Saracens. The progenitor of the family in America, Andrew Benton, came from England to this country in 1637, and joined the "Hartford Colony," Hartford, Connecticut. His son, Samuel Benton, was one of the founders of the town of Tolland, his name appearing in the deed of the committee to the first proprietors of the town. His son, Samuel Benton, was Judge Benton's great-grandfather. He served in the Second Company, Fifth Connecticut Regiment, was in the battle of Bunker Hill, and, later on, the expedition to Quebec. After his discharge he was in the employ of the Government, carrying munitions of war from Boston to western New York. His son, George Benton, was born in Hartford, Connecticut, and removed from there to Saratoga, New York, where his son, Henry, the Judge's father, was born, in 1814. Henry Benton married Mary Ann Marks, a native of Saratoga county, and a descendant, on the maternal side, of the Reynolds family, one of the prominent early families of the Empire State. They had two sons, Andrew and Charles Henry, the former being still a resident of Saratoga county. Their mother passed away in 1883, at an advanced age, and their venerable father is yet living, having reached his eightieth milestone. He is a member of the Baptist Church, as also was his companion.

Judge Benton was reared on his father's farm and was educated in the public schools and the academy at Stillwater, New York. When he started out in life for himself it was as a clerk in a dry-goods store at La Fayette, New Jersey, where he remained three years. He then went to Northville, New York, and read law for some time under the instruction of John Patterson, but before completing his law course he removed to Minnesota. There he continued his studies in the office of Gordon E. Cole, of that State, and at Hastings, Minnesota, was admitted to the bar, in 1872, before Judge Crosby. He entered upon his professional career at Austin, in partnership with Judge D. B. Johnson, and from there removed to Dodge county, same State, where he continued practice and where he was for a number of years Judge of the Probate Court of that county.

In 1887 Judge Benton came to Great Falls, being one of the first lawyers to settle in the town. Here he practiced law until Montana became a State. He was then elected on the Republican ticket to the office of Judge of the Eighth Judicial District. At the close of his term he was re-elected for a second term of four years and is now the incumbent of that office. His ability, both as a lawyer and as a Judge, is of high order and he is held in high esteem by the members of the bar in Cascade county.

Since coming to Great Falls, Judge Benton has invested in real estate to some extent. He has a ranch within two miles of the city, and he built the comfortable residence he and his family occupy here. He was married in 1876 to Miss Augusta E. Slocum, who was born in Pennsylvania and reared in Minnesota, and who is the daughter of Judge George W. Slocum, of Minnesota. The Judge and Mrs. Benton have two children,—Mary Louise and Sara M. Mrs. Benton is a member of the Episcopal Church. Fraternally, he is an A. O. U. W. and an I. O. O. F., and is also a member of the Sons of the Revolution of Montana, and of the Sons of the American Revolution of the State of Minnesota.

John C. C. Thomas

a blamed big lie! we allers wash our hands. How could we get the dough off if we did n't." Having proved the truth of his assertion the big man bent sulkily to his work again, and the pretty widow passed on.

The amalgamation of "tenderfeet" and "forty-niners" was of slow growth. One trouble was, the stranger from the States, with his natty dress and neat, rounded sentences, thought himself a little above the bearded miner; that is, he thought so for a time; and another trouble was, the old miner thought himself a little above the light, grammatical and most proper young man fresh from the East.

There was constant and great demand for day-laborers, wages ranging from half an ounce to an ounce a day; but the stranger from the States could hardly get work at all. The old Californian on the bank above the "gang" down in the mine who had made him "boss," or, maybe, alternated with him one week after another as they did at cooking, always asked the man seeking work where he came from. Usually the stranger from the States was too quick with his tongue, and gladly gave his name, age, State, county, town and a lot more of information, only to be told in answer: "No, I don't want anybody: better try company above."

Of course the cleverest strangers "got onto this." A young man who brought to Montana with him the name of Washington Harrison Peterson, applied to old Boss Day, as he

COLONEL JOHN C. CALHOUN THORNTON, one of the pioneers of Montana, and a prominent lawyer of Deer Lodge and of Butte City, was born in Clay county, Missouri, October 20, 1834. He was then the only son of the late Colonel John Thornton, a pioneer of northwestern Missouri, who was born in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, December 24, 1786, and who went to Missouri in 1817, and located in old Franklin, Howard county, then the most flourishing town west of St. Louis.

In February, 1820, Colonel John Thornton married Miss Elizabeth Trigge, a daughter of General Stephen Trigge of Virginia, who figured in the war of 1812, and granddaughter of Major John Trigge, who was an officer of artillery at Yorktown, and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis. He represented the State of Virginia in Congress from 1797 to 1809. His father, Abraham Trigge, emigrated from England to America in 1710, and settled in Virginia. In April, 1820, Colonel John Thornton removed to what is now Clay county, Missouri. December 8, 1820, he was appointed, by Governor McNair, Judge of the County Court of Ray county, Missouri, which had been organized from a portion of Howard county. January 4, 1822, he was appointed, by Governor McNair, Judge of the county court of Clay county, Missouri, which had been organized from a portion of Ray county. August 24, he was commissioned as Colonel of the militia by Governor McNair, after being duly elected by the Twenty-eighth Regiment of the Missouri militia. From 1823, when the trouble with the Indians began, until 1829, Colonel John Thornton was actively engaged with his troops in repelling their attacks. He served as a member of the Missouri Legislature from Clay county from 1824 to 1832. He was Speaker of the House in 1828 and 1830. June 7, 1834, he was commissioned Aide-de-camp to the Commander-in-chief of the Missouri militia by Govenor Daniel Dunklin. He was a Democrat and very popular with his party until the proclamation of President Jackson was issued against South Carolina nullification. His openly declared opposition to Jackson caused his defeat for the Legislature in 1834, but in 1836 he was elected by a large majority. He died on his farm in Clay county, Missouri, October 24, 1847, seven daughters and one son surviving him.

Colonel John C. Calhoun Thornton, the subject of this sketch, being an only son, the hopes of his parents were centered in him. At the early age of thirteen he sustained an irreparable loss in the death of his father, and to that misfortune must be attributed much of the fortitude and self-reliance that were characteristic of his subsequent career. When the time came for college life he was placed under the care and guidance of Alexander Campbell, president of Bethany College, Virginia, where he at once took first rank in his class. The genius he displayed in argumentative oratory, caused him soon to be known as the "stump" speaker and leader of the Democratic party of his college. At the close of his collegiate career, he commenced the study of law under his brother-in-law, General A. W. Doniphan, of Missouri. After being admitted to the bar, he removed to Leavenworth, Kansas, and subsequently to St. Joseph, Missouri, where he formed a law partnership with the late General J. M. Bassett.

His forensic efforts were, however, soon cut short by the sound of the call to arms, and he abandoned home, fortune and a life of ease to cast his lot with that side of the contest which his judgment deemed in the right. True to his principles, he was found with the Missouri State Guard, under General Sterling Price, in the battle chewed tobacco on the bank above and watched his gang.

"Wher 're ye frum?"

"California, sir. I—I—"

"Wal, now, yer hold on! Yer can't even pernounce Californy! better try company above."

The young man looked up the gulch and down the gulch. The clang of picks and creak of derricks: dozens and dozens of great groaning and creaking derricks, and each in ropes enough to rig a ship, as he thought of Shibboleth.

Frankly and truly, the handling of dirt is a high art down there in a hole with a dozen others. It was not only right, in one sense, to send each tenderfoot to "try the company above," but a real mercy; for if he, in his awkwardness, had not killed some one of the gang with his double-pointed pick he would probably, like Absalom, have been caught up in the derrick ropes.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE EYES OF THE WORLD LIFTED TO THE "SHINING MOUNTAINS"—THE PLEIADES—WIDENING OF THE GOLD BELTS—AN INCREASING AND TUMULTUOUS POPULATION—VIGILANTES—GENERAL SHERMAN'S ESTIMATE OF THEM.

BOOMING! By day and by night men now poured in from the four points of the compass. Old miners of old camps, ever on the alert and ready to move at a moment's notice, came in such crowds as to almost depopulate what is now Idaho. They knew that other mines than those of Alder Creek could not be far from this center. They came, saw and conquered. Soon there were many other and singularly rich camps: Harris Gulch, California Gulch, Wisconsin Gulch, Bivens' Camp, Silver Bow Butte.

Alder Creek and environs of mining camps have been aptly called the Pleiades by more than one writer fond of brilliant simile. To describe any one of these and the surging, roaring, swift life there after looking at Alder Creek, would be like writing of one bright member of the Pleiades and then the others. They were all alike in daring audacity of persistent endeavor and hard toil. Instead of the few dozen "hotels," "palace saloons," and little log cabins at Bannack and Gold Creek, where mining life went sternly on, and men cooked of Wilson's Creek. He commanded a battalion in General Slack's brigade, and was stationed on "Bloody Hill," where the main battle was fought and the heaviest losses sustained. Major Thornton bore himself with conspicuous bravery and was immediately promoted to the rank of Colonel in the Confederate army. At the close of the war he removed to Montana, where his wife, who was Miss Louisa Clementine Archer, and to whom he was married April 28, 1863, and his daughter, Elizabeth Trigge, joined him in 1866.

When Colonel Thornton first came to Montana, he engaged in business with his brother in law, R. W. Donnell, at Blackfoot. In 1867 he went to Deer Lodge and formed a law partnership with Lee J. Sharp and Thomas L. Napton, under the name of Sharp, Thornton & Napton, and afterward with Robinson & Stevens. About this time he became interested in mining and abandoned the legal profession, and was one of the principal projectors and constructors of the Rock Creek Ditch Company's mining ditches, used to convey water from Rock creek and adjacent streams to the Pioneer, Pike's Peak and Pilgrim Bar placer gold mines. He also built the Race Track ditch and afterward French Gulch ditch, all in different parts of old Deer Lodge county.

and ate and then smoked as they sauntered down to the store and sat about on nail kegs or roosted on the counter and talked of gold, we now have thousands of cabins, tens of thousands of just such noblemen, tens of thousands of just such scenes, only broader, stronger, deeper. Why repeat the brave, pathetic story? Health was singularly good. Rocky mountain water is always pure; no better water in the world. The malodorous name, Stinking Water, was given to that stream by Indians simply because it was impregnated with sulphur. Being singularly short of descriptive words, you may remember they spoke to Lewis and Clarke of the far-away Pacific as the "heap big nasty water."

As people poured in continually so the bright belt belt of Orion widened and widened. Roads were hewn here and there from camp to camp, rumbling stages with eager men pushing their heads in a mass through the windows on either side, express wagons and pony expresses, freight trains, mule trains half a mile long!

Gradually the "tenderfoot" melted into the lives and ways of the old miners, as the new recruits melt into the lives and ways of the

In 1875, Colonel Thornton removed with his family to Butte, where he engaged for a time in the practice of law. His numerous mining interests demanding personal supervision, he once more abandoned his profession.

Colonel Thornton was a close student and of retiring disposition, and while deeply interested in the questions of the day and frequently tendered political preferment, he always declined such honors. In 1882 he was nominated for Mayor by the Democratic party of Butte, but declined to be a candidate. In 1883 he was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention, but did not attend. He was frequently urged to become a candidate for Congress from the west side, but always refused to enter the contest. He was president of the Miner Publishing Company of Butte.

In every relation of life he was esteemed and venerated. The poor loved him for his unostentatious and sympathetic charity; the rich honored him for his independence and unswerving honesty of purpose.

He died in Butte City, Montana, after a brief illness, September 15, 1887, leaving a wife and eight children to mourn his loss.

ANTHONY H. BARRET, one of Montana's most respected pioneers, and senior member of the firm of Barret & Jacky, is a Kentuckian, born in Grayson county, January 25, 1834. His great-grandfather Barret, a Presbyterian minister, emigrated from Wales to Virginia, where he spent the remainder of his life. His son, Francis Barret, was born there and became a Baptist minister. He removed with his family to Greensburg, Kentucky. In 1832, while the Asiatic cholera was raging, he and wife busied themselves in administering to the wants of the sick and dying until they also were stricken with the horrible disease and died within an hour of each other, neither knowing that the other had been taken sick. Thus nine children were left orphans. One of them, Augustus (father of the subject of this sketch), was born in Green county, Kentucky, May 8, 1804. For his first wife he married Miss Mary M. Marshall, and they had three children, one of whom died when a child, one lived to womanhood, and one still survives. For his second wife Mr. Barret married Miss Mary J. Cunningham, a native of Grayson county, Kentucky, a daughter of William Cunningham, of that State, and they also had three children,—two sons and one daughter. The last mentioned died when a year old, soon after Mrs. Barret died; one of the sons, William L., was killed in the battle of Mansfield, or, as some call it, Pine Ridge, while he was a Lieutenant in the Confederate army; and the remaining son is the subject of this sketch. Their father was County Clerk and Clerk of the Circuit Court of Edmonson county for thirty years. By trade he was a merchant and tanner. In 1852 he moved to Missouri, where he had a farm and where his death occurred in 1857. He had married his third wife in 1839, wedding Miss Berroyal H. Rountree, a native of Edmonson county, Kentucky. She, too, had three children, a son and two daughters, and died in 1885. There is now only one surviving child by each of the marriages. The parents were Baptists.

Mr. Anthony H. Barret learned in his youth the trade of harness-maker at Bowling Green, Kentucky. In 1852 he moved to Texas, where for a portion of the time he was traveling salesman for a drug house, and during the interval he was salesman in a general merchandise store. Moving to Shreveport, Louisiana, he had charge of a cotton warehouse there. His father then dying, he returned to his old home to assist in the settlement of the estate.

In 1861, as the war came on, he went to St. Louis and opened a gents' furnishing goods store, but as the business proved unsatisfactory he sold it and was salesman in a clothing store for a number of years. His health failing, he crossed the plains, arriving at Alder Gulch in the spring of 1865. By the following winter he had secured a mining claim, which, however, he was unable to work satisfactorily for want of water. Selling out his interest here, he was appointed by Governor Meagher his private secretary, and besides serving in that capacity he was also Clerk of Indian Affairs and Assistant Auditor of the Territory. In March, 1867, he was appointed Special veterans, and soon they could hardly be distinguished, the one from the other, save by the fact that youth was largely with the man from the sunrise, while age was the mark of a veteran from under the path of the sun.

But amusing things continued to happen between the two for quite a time. Pleas. Johnson, an old schoolmate of mine, and his partner, sat disheartened at the stage office door one day resolved on a new experiment. Years before they had tried something like it in California. So when the stage came in they picked out the greenest young man in the crowd of comers and proposed to take him in as a partner, furnish everything, ask no questions, and go prospecting that very day, share and share alike. The young fellow's eyes stuck out with delight; it was just what he wanted. They were off at once; but alack and alas! four days of tramping without finding the color, and the "tenderfoot" was indeed tenderfooted. But they had gone the length of their tether, had no more "grub" and must go back.

"But, boys, we'll strike it yet, we'll strike it on our way home. I'll bet a four dollar yaller dog we'll strike it before we get back to Alder."

Indian Agent for the Jocko Indian Reservation, near Missoula, in which capacity he served to fill a vacancy. In 1866 he was elected Chief Clerk of the Territorial House of Representatives and served for twelve sessions. In the winter of 1869 70 he represented Jefferson county in the lower house. During a part of the above period he was in the grocery business at Radersburg, but, owing to circumstances over which he had no control, the business failed, and for two winters he was forced to chop wood in the mountains to maintain himself. Such were the reverses to which Montana's stout-hearted settlers were often subjected, but when broken at one thing they always immediately tried another.

In 1875 Mr. Barret started a harness shop at Adobetown, in Alder Gulch. After a time he moved to Pony with his business, and on the 8th of April, 1878, he opened his shop on Granite street in Butte City. The following year he admitted his present partner, Mr. Jacky. In 1880 they built their brick block on West Park street, where they have since done a large and prosperous business; and now for many years they have been the leading manufacturers of harness and saddles, and dealers in buggies, etc., in Butte City. They also have branch stores at Anaconda and Phillipsburg. They have erected a large brick block on Galena street, where they store their buggies and carriages. They are also interested in placer mines in Deer Lodge county.

In his political principles Mr. Barret has always been a Democrat. From May, 1890, to May, 1892, he was Alderman.

November 9, 1880, he married Miss Lizzie Brooke, a native of Virginia (now West Virginia) a daughter of Dr. Brooke, of that State and of an old Virginia family. Mr. and Mrs. Barret are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. They are bringing up an adopted daughter, Marie Barret, a native of Kentucky. Mr. Barret has been a member of the Masonic fraternity for thirty-one years; has been Master of the blue lodge, High Priest of the chapter, Grand High Priest, Commander of Montana Commandery, No. 3, and Grand Commander of the State, and he has received the thirty-second degree of the Scottish rite. He is thoroughly informed upon all the early experiences of Montana's pioneers, is acquainted with all the survivors of the early days, and is a good representative of the brave men who were early settlers of this State.

JUDGE HENRY RIPLEY MELTON, ex-Probate Judge of Beaver Head county, Montana, and now a prominent lawyer residing at Dillon, dates his birth in Ballard county, Kentucky, February 17, 1852.

The Judge is a descendant of Scotch and English ancestors. His father, Henry P. Melton, was born in the State of Alabama in 1823. He belonged to one of the old families of that State. Removing to Kentucky, he was there married, in 1841, to Miss Mary Ann Sams, a native of that State. He is still a resident of Blandville, Kentucky, where he has spent the most of his life, engaged in milling and merchandising and farming. He has been married four times and is the father of twelve children, our subject's mother being the first wife. She died in 1856.

Judge Melton received his early education in private schools at Blandville. In 1870 his father, and other prominent citizens of the town, attempted to start a college there, and in it Judge Melton taught two years. He read law in the office of G. W. Reves, and also at Paducah, under the instruction of Judge C. S. Marshall. He was admitted to the bar in 1874, after which he practiced with Judge Marshall for a number of years.

Hon. R. B. Smith, an old friend of Mr. Melton, had come from Blandville to Dillon, Montana, and at his suggestion, in 1884, soon after the town of Dillon was started, Mr. Melton came out here, and together they engaged in a law practice, which partnership existed two years. Then Mr. Smith was appointed United States Attorney and Mr. Melton was elected Probate Judge. This was in 1886. Mr. Melton served his term of two years in an efficient and acceptable manner, and at the expiration of this term returned to his law practice, which he has since continued. In 1888 his party nominated him for County Attorney. In 1892 he was its nominee for Lieutenant

This assurance did not assure, but nettled the spirited young stranger, and he said sharply:

"Now, by the twins of Rome (you, gentlemen, call them jemeny out here) how do you know?"

"Well, Bub, I'll tell you. Pard and I went to a negro barber in California once and took him in as a full partner, just as we have you, only we let him keep right along with his striped-pole work, and, by George, we struck it in less than a week!

"Nigger luck. See?"

"But, heavens! gentlemen; I am no negro!"

"Ah, but there is another good old adage: 'A fool for luck.'"

Strange as it may read, as they sat down in sight of Virginia City on their return, almost dying of fatigue and disgust, Pleas. picked up a ragged piece of rock to toss at a little sand lizard that kept bobbing its tiny head up and down on a stone below him, as if mocking at his miserable plight, and lo! he saw that it was nearly half gold. They sold the discovery next day for a fair sum, which of course was shared equally, and the young man took the next stage

Governor of Montana, and stumped the State in the interest of the Democracy. Since coming to Beaver Head county he has taken a lively interest in the affairs of the county and in the town of Dillon. He drew up the first charter of the city and had the honor of being elected her first City Attorney.

In 1886 Judge Melton returned to Paducah, Kentucky, and was married on the 28th of July of that year to Miss Dora K. Love, a native of Louisville and a daughter of William Love of that State. They returned to Dillon and Judge Melton built the comfortable residence in which they now reside. They have three children: Henry L., born in 1887; George M., 1889; and William R., 1891. Mrs. Melton is a Presbyterian, while the Judge is a Baptist. Both have aided in advancing the religious interests of the city of their adoption, and by all who know them are held in the highest esteem.

OTHO KLEMM, cashier of the First National Bank of Dillon, Montana, was born in Stuttgart, Wurtemberg, Germany, July 26, 1836, of German-Lutheran parentage. His father, Edward Klemm, was a civil engineer and came from Germany to California in 1850, where he was engaged in mining up to the time of his death, which event occurred in 1870. There were three children in the family, and of that number the subject of this sketch is now the only survivor.

Otho Klemm came to America with his father in 1850, at that time a lad of fourteen years. Previous to his coming to this country he had received a fair education in his native land. When he arrived in New York his uncles, Otho and Adolph Klemm, were engaged in banking there, and for four years he remained with them, having a clerkship in the bank. He then went to Cleveland, Ohio, where for two years he occupied a position in the Canal Bank. In 1856 he went to Chicago and accepted a position in the banking house of R. K. Swift, Brother & Johnson. In the financial crisis of 1857 they failed, and Mr. Klemm next went to Toledo, where he was employed as bookkeeper for W. J. Finley's wholesale fruit and oyster house, and where he remained until 1859. After that we find him occupying a position in the United States and American Express office at La Fayette, Indiana, from which place he was soon afterward transferred to the express office in Chicago, where he remained until July, 1861. The Civil war coming on, he then enlisted in Company B, First Illinois Light Artillery. He served in the Western army under Generals Grant and Sherman, and participated in seventeen battles; served three years and was mustered out at Springfield, Illinois. Again we find him in Toledo, Ohio, this time embarking in the dry goods business, in which occupation, however, he did not remain long. Soon after disposing of his stock of dry goods he was elected Auditor of the city of Toledo, in which position he served most creditably for a period of seven years.

Mr. Klemm's next move was to the West. Locating in Idaho, he ran the banking house of F. J. Kiesel & Company until January 1, 1879, at which time they sold out to Sebree, Ferris & Holt. Mr. Klemm retained his position, remaining with the firm as cashier, bookkeeper and accountant, and following the railroad from Oneida, Idaho, to Dillon, Montana, doing business in most of the terminal towns. It was in September, 1880, that he arrived in Dillon. Mr. Holt at that time sold his interest in the establishment and Mr. B. F. White became a member of the firm, the name being changed to Sebree, Ferris & White. All these years Mr. Klemm has continued his connection with the bank. In 1884, when the National Bank was organized, he was made assistant cashier and three years later was promoted to cashier, in which capacity he is now rendering efficient service. He is also a stockholder in the bank. His strict attention to business and his extensive experience in the same have gained for him the reputation of being an able financier, as well as a man of the highest integrity.

Mr. Klemm became a member of the A. O. U. W. in Ohio, has since been identified with the order and is now one of its oldest members. He is a Past Master and at this writing is Receiver of the lodge at Dillon.

In 1873 he was married to Miss Bertha Schansenbach, a home without even stopping to buy a new pair of shoes, very tender-footed but very lighthearted.

Dunraven, who seems to have seen much of the old ways and days here, told me, when we met one winter in Egypt, that two old colonial English friends of his once employed a "tenderfoot" to teach them history and geography of evenings after their hard day's management of their very rich claim. They did this for diversion and also to give the helpless young fellow work. Soon he began to cook and clean up things and make himself so useful that they let him in "on the bedrock" and he made a fortune.

"The fun it was," laughed the Earl, "these boys were both Oxford men; but that Wisconsin schoolmaster taught them things in geography and history that they never heard before, and never will hear again."

But anecdote is not history, save in the hands of some great man, like Esop or Lincoln, and we must leave such things behind us now entirely. The young Hercules has left his cradle. Club in hand he goes forth to his seven labors.

Politicians, Territorial organization: law, lawyers, vigilantes! Strange, is it not, that crime came creeping in about the time that law, lawyers and women came? General Sher-native of Germany. After eighteen years of happy married life, her death occurred at Ogden. Since then he has remained single.

Politically, he has affiliated with the Republican party ever since the firing on Fort Sumter.

HENRY MONROE, one of Montana's respected pioneers of 1864, and one of the successful farmers of Prickly Pear valley, is a native of Michigan, born in Oakland county, August 4, 1837. He is of Scottish ancestry. His father, Alfred Monroe, born in Scotland, came to Massachusetts when a young man, removed to Michigan when that State was a Territory, and become one of the pioneer settlers of Oakland county. He was married there in the year 1836 to Miss Susan Crawford, a native of the State of New York. In 1854 he removed to a farm, seven miles from Grand Rapids, where he spent the residue of his life. During his residence in Michigan he cleared and developed two farms. In his religious views he was a Baptist, and as a worthy pioneer citizen he stood high in the community in which he lived. He died in 1887. His wife had passed away in 1850. They reared a family of four sons and two daughters, Henry being the eldest child.

Henry Monroe spent the first seventeen years of his life in his native State. In 1854 he came as far West as Minnesota, which was then a Territory and inhabitated chiefly by Indians. There he began to make his own way in the world. For eight years he remained there, engaged in the lumber business the most of the time. In 1864 his spirit of adventure led him still further West. In company with 250 emigrants and in an ox train, with O. W. Rockwell as captain, he crossed the plains, their destination being the gold fields of Montana. Both before them and following after them were numerous other trains, all on the same mission bent. The Indians were somewhat hostile that year, but as this emigrant party was large it was able to protect itself, and in due time Alder Gulch was reached in safety. Instead of entering the mines as most of the new-comers did, Mr. Monroe engaged in lumbering, purchased an interest in a sawmill, and in that business continued four years.

It was in 1868 that our subject came to his present farm in the beautiful valley just three miles north of the city of Helena. Here he purchased 320 acres of land at a cost of $10 per acre. He had been married February 22, 1863, to Miss Elvira Fadden, a native of Canada, and after purchasing his farm he sent for her. She crossed the plains, bringing with her their little son Henry, then a child two years old. They came in Captain Fisk's party. They had started the previous year, but had been driven back by the Indians. At last the party got through in safety and Mr. Monroe and his wife were reunited after two years' separation, filled with danger and great anxiety to both of them. They resided happily on the farm, and here two other sons, Mark and Bert, were born to them. In 1875 Mrs. Monroe died. She had been a most excellent wife and mother and her loss was deeply felt by her husband and little family.

The year following his wife's death Mr. Monroe leased his farm and went to the mining district in the Black Hills, where he engaged in hauling quartz and lumber with a twelve-mule team, and where he was quite successful. During this time he invested in property at Gay City and Central City, and also conducted a livery business. He returned to his farm in 1878. In 1883, after remaining single eight years, he married Mrs. Mary Pepworth, and since that date they have continued to reside in their valley home. In 1890 Mr. Monroe sold all his land except six acres, realizing $300 per acre for it, and since then has lived on the interest of his money. Soon after selling off his land he erected the handsome stone residence in which he resides. While he was engaged in farming Mr. Monroe's chief products were stock, hay and grain, and to him belongs the credit of being the first man in the valley to raise alfalfa. He also gave considerable attention to the raising of fine horses.

man, in command of the State troops when the words, Vigilance Committee, or the name Vigilante, were born in San Francisco, despised this form of government from the first; and many another good man has, more quietly, perhaps, done the same. For my own part I watched this thing from the conception. I saw it spread like a prairie fire, smouldering for a time, breaking out afresh and in some remote place, and dying at last in the distance for want of something to feed upon, in a piteous way consuming many good fields.

I remember three farmers of Oregon, the only men in a remote valley, had a quarrel. Two took sides against one. Then one night the two formed themselves into a vigilance committee, arrested their neighbor, tried him for stealing cattle, found him guilty, ran up three fence rails into a tripod in his own door-yard and hanged him therefrom with his own lasso. Next week, when snow fell in the mountains, the missing cattle came home! I don't know that anything quite so dreadful as this ever took place in Montana; but it is almost impossible to think of big, brave Alex. Carter, who was executed by vigilantes as a criminal. My schoolmate and I worked for him one vacation when attending Columbia Col-

CHARLES W. SAVAGE, proprietor of the McQueen House, the only first-class hotel in Miles City, is a native of the State of New York, and was born near Syracuse, in 1833, a son of Aaron and Caroline (Whitford) Savage. His mother was born in Rutland, Vermont, and his father in Royalton, New York; ancestry English. His father, a shoemaker by trade, served as a soldier in the Mexican war.

Charles received a common-school education. The family moved in 1839 to Michigan, where Charles grew to manhood as a farmer. In 1855 he went to Minnesota, located land and engaged in farming in Hennepin county, twelve miles from Minneapolis, where he was engaged in 1861, when President Lincoln called for troops to defend the Union. In April, of that year, he enlisted in the First Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, in the same company with Captain William Harmon. Serving in the Army of the Potomac, he was engaged in twenty-eight battles. At the battle of Fredericksburg, Virginia, just before which he had been promoted Corporal, a shell struck his right foot and carried away the first and second toes, which wound rendered him unfit for further active duty, and he was discharged.

Returning to Minneapolis, he engaged in mercantile business until 1872, when he was employed by the supply company in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad, Moorhead department, and remained with them until the road was completed to Bismarck. He was in the clerical department. Later, he had full charge, and closed their business in 1874. He was thus employed during the construction of the Minnesota & Dakota division of the Northern Pacific. In 1876 he came to Montana, during the construction of Fort Keogh, where he was employed in clerical work for Captain Harmon. Later the two engaged in mercantile business together in Miles City, which was continued successfully until 1883.

He was elected the first Treasurer of Custer county, in 1878, and, after serving two years, was re-elected and filled that responsible position four years. He was the first Postmaster of Miles City, appointed by President Hayes. He was elected Sheriff of the county in 1884, and served two years. He then moved to Livingston, where he engaged in the drug business and conducted the Hotel Albemarle for four years, when he returned to Miles City and took charge of the McQueen House.

He was married in Minnesota, in 1853, to Miss Fannie Blowers, a daughter of Hiram and Polly (Cooley) Blowers, natives of Vermont. Mr. Savage and wife have two children living: William E. Savage, present Treasurer of Custer county; and George W. Savage, residing at Deer Lodge, Montana. Our subject is a member of the Masonic fraternity,—of the Blue Lodge, Chapter and Commandery of Glendive, and is a member of Algeria Temple, at Helena,—a charter member of all the lower Masonic bodies. Has filled the positions of Junior and Senior Warden. He is also a member of the I. O. O. F. and K. of P., Miles City,—a charter member of each. Politically, he is a Republican of the purest type, and in the hotel he is a genial host.

JAMES KNOX POLK MALLORY is a son of one of Montana's pioneers, and was one of the first men to engage in business in Anaconda, he having established himself at this place when business was transacted in tents. A sketch of his life is therefore of interesti n this connection.

Mr. Mallory's parents, Phillip and Amanda (Mahony) Mallory, were born and reared in Virginia. For some years they resided near New Market, that State, and from there removed to Indiana and settled near the town of Liberty, in Union county. Near Liberty, November 14, 1846, James Knox Polk Mallory was born, and in his native county he was reared and educated. When the civil war broke out his two older brothers immediately went to the front, and he, although yet a boy in his 'teens, was not to be left behind, so he enlisted in the Ninth Indiana Veteran Regiment, and served one year, until the lege, the nucleus of the Oregon University, and I recall no greater kindness than he showed us boys. Work was scarce, we were poor, we were only boys, and I know we did poor work; for we had gone all the way from Eugene to Rogue river valley to join this thresher, and so were not only weak but worn. But he gave us men's wages and paid us promptly, so that we could get back to school. He paid us and let men wait, for money was scarce. When he came to Idaho he had a pack train of horses, from his thresher teams, of course. I loved him, and Mossman, of Mossman's express, trusted him, and once gave him gold dust in bags full when leaving Florence to take to Lewiston.

I do not say he was not guilty. I only say it is next to impossible for me to think of him as a bad man and I set down the reasons. I lay this leaflet above his dishonored dust and go on about my work. But I insist on saying right here that I am not ambitious for Montana to be known to the world merely for the hanging; and I will have no hand in the reciting or the glorification of these unhappy scenes. If it be history, in the name of pity let the history be brief. I have already shown how the hanging of some of these men was transferred, by an alleged historian, from Lewiston to Walla Walla; and another murder and hanging from Canyon City, Oregon, to Idaho. It is safe to say that inves-close of the war. He was discharged at Galveston, Texas, and returned with his regiment to Indianapolis, Indiana, where they disbanded. Among the engagements in which he participated were those at Franklin, Tennessee, and at Nashville, same State.

In the meantime young Mallory's father had come out to Montana and engaged in mining, he being one of the first discoverers of the rich gold deposit at Alder Gulch, and, in company with Joseph Ramsdell, owner of the noted Parrot copper lead. He was also among the first to locate mines at Butte, where at one time he had twenty-five claims. He discovered the Twin Brothers mine, which was afterward relocated by a son of Mr. Ramsdell, and called the Rainbow, was purchased by Marcus Daly, and is now known as the Alice. The senior Mr. Mallory was killed while trying to make peace between two disputants, which calamity caused J. K. P. Mallory to immediately come to Montana. Soon afterward he sent for his mother, who has lived with him ever since, she being now seventy-three years of age. The father's untimely death occurred at Diamond City, Montana, in 1866.

When the subject of our sketch came to Montana he located at Deer Lodge, where he engaged in the lumber business, in company with a Mr. Stuart, and where he remained for two years. In December, 1873, he took a claim to 160 acres of land where the town of Anaconda is now located. The following spring he put 100 acres of this tract in oats, using water through ditches to irrigate the crop. It promised an abundant yield, but just before it was ready to harvest, an army of grasshoppers invaded his ranch and nearly devoured his crop, leaving him only about 600 bushels. This misfortune caused him to quit farming. He then followed stage driving for a few months, and after that was employed one year as penitentiary guard at Deer Lodge. It was about this time that the mining excitement at Butte caused many to center there, he among the number, not to engage in mining, however. He became associated with Robert Porter and together they entered into the sheep industry. They purchased a ranch on Lost creek, on which they placed their flocks, and it was not long before Mr. Mallory purchased his partner's interest in both the ranch and the sheep. This involved him in debt to the amount of $6,000, but within three years he paid the whole sum and sold out, having made $4,000 during the time. He then engaged in buying and selling stock. It was not long after this when he met D. D. Walker, with whom he became interested in a project to purchase brood mares in Oregon and sell them in Montana. Mr. Mallory made one trip and invested in a number of animals which he disposed of at a good profit. In the meantime they invested in a logging business, which Mr. Walker superintended, while Mr. Mallory looked after the stock and ranch. In the fall of 1883 they opened the butcher shop in Anaconda, in which enterprise Mr. N. J. Bielenberg was interested with them, and which the three conducted successfully until June 1, 1893, when Mr. Mallory purchased the interest of both his partners. He has since conducted it alone.

Mr. Mallory was married December 22, 1892, to Miss Fannie A. Gibbs, a native of Pennsylvania.

Fraternally, he is a member of Acasia Lodge, No. 33, F. & A. M., Anaconda and Colfax Lodge, No. 20, I. O. O. F. He is a practical business man and has spent his energies and means in developing the resources of his adopted State and in building up the town of Anaconda.

JOHN T. PARKISON, now of Boulder City, Jefferson county, and State of Montana, was born in Washington county, Pennsylvania, October, 22, 1821. His grandfather, Joseph Parkison, was one of the early settlers of western Pennsylvania, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and was a Commissary at Valley Forge. After the war he settled on the Monongahela river at a place afterward called Parkison's Ferry; he laid off a tigation would show equally false accounts of at least some of these things in Montana, For thirty years about the first thing and the last that the average newspaper writer has done on setting foot in Montana is to celebrate these deplorable deeds of outlawry, as if the great, strong, clear-headed and cultured men who fashioned Montana from the first could not protect themselves or still cared to hear of things that should be forgotten. Mark me, I am not finding fault with those who took part in the hurried tribunals. I only find fault with those who continually flaunt these stories before the world and make them the burthen of their so-called histories of Montana.

Briefly and finally, then, let it be here recorded that at intervals, before the organization of Montana Territory, May 26, 1864, some very good men and possibly some very bad men, organized vigilance committees in some of the mining towns and hung several very bad men, and possibly some very good ones also.

No complications or trouble of any sort ever came of these swift executions; nor has any blame, but on the contrary great praise has often been bestowed on those who organized and maintained these tribunals until the civil law could be asserted. But these deplorable events were never quite so many as have from time to time been laid at the door of Montana, and at best they are of but dim and doubtful lustre, and shall find no place in pages of mine.

town and called it Monongahela City, where he died, at the age of 108 years; his wife departed this life at the age of ninety-seven years. They had four children. William Parkison, the father of our subject, was born at Parkison's Ferry about 1780, married Susan Wells, a native of Virginia, and they continued to reside at Parkison's Ferry for some years, carrying on glass-works and merchandising. Mr. Wm. Parkison was a sutler or commissary under Gen. William Henry Harrison; also his brother-in-law, Major Warne, was a Major in the same campaign, which was an Indian war that Gen. Harrison was engaged in at that time.

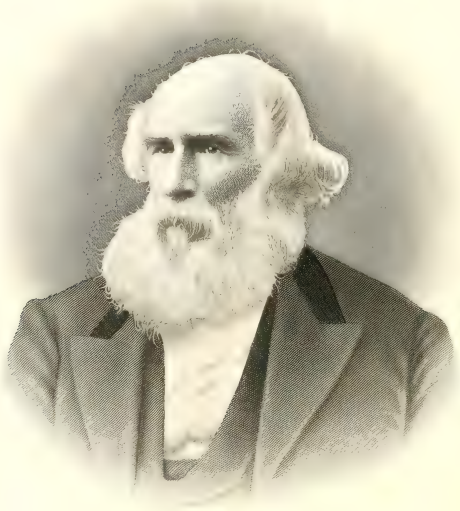
After the death of Mr. Parkison, his widow returned to Virginia, with her three youngest children. Their family consisted of eight children, but at that time the older ones were grown.

John T. Parkison, the subject of this sketch, remained in Virginia until fifteen years of age, then went to Tennessee, and later to Texas, in the year 1842, while General Sam Houston, was president of that country, left Texas in 1843, spent a short time in Louisiana, and from that State went to St. Louis, Missouri, where he and his brother, William H. Parkison, engaged in steamboating, and together were interested in some seven or eight steamboats, his brother serving as captain, himself as pilot. In 1852 he went to California, during the gold excitement; went overland and was about six months making the trip; returned in 1854 and went to steamboating; remained on the river until July, 1858, then went to what is now known as Denver city. His brother, himself and others, laid off what is now known as Denver city, called after General James W. Denver, who was at that time Governor of Kansas. His brother and himself located two ranches adjoining the city of Denver and farmed them, raising the first crop in Colorado, also built one of the first brick business houses in Denver, which was built for a post office.

Mr. Parkison had made the trip to Montana and returned in 1863, and in the following year he located at Alder Gulch, this State, where he and his brother opened a store, they having brought three large trains of merchandise from Denver. One year later, when gold was discovered in Last Chance Gulch, the brothers moved their store to Helena. While there they became the owners of large numbers of cattle, horses and mules, which they kept in Boulder valley. After selling their stock, they purchased teams and engaged in freighting between Milk river and Fort Benton. They disposed of their store in Helena in the fall of 1865, and engaged in mining in Confederate Gulch, White's Gulch and Grizzly Gulch, but during their operations at different places lost considerable money. They next embarked in placer and quartz mining in Boulder valley, which they continued for many years, and still own interests in various valuable mines. Mr. Parkison owned a store at Comet until 1893, but the mines having then shut down he closed his store and retired from active business.

Mr. Parkison has crossed the plains fourteen times to California, Colorado and Montana, forth and back, and and since that time the great Western world has sprung into being, with its teeming multitudes of intelligent citizens and its great wealth. Had he still held his property in Denver he might now be many times a millionare. He is an intelligent and well informed citizen, has a wide acquaintance with the early settlers of Montana, and is highly esteemed by all who know him.

CHAPTER XVII.



THE BENCH AND BAR OF MONTANA, THE FIRST CHAPTER BY EX-CHIEF-JUSTICE DECIUS S. WADE*—THE PLANTING AND THE GROWTH OF LAW—PIONEERS AND EQUITY—VIGILANTES AND THE RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE—A COMPANY'S PROSECUTION IN THE NAME OF THE PEOPLE—LAWYERS WHO PRACTICED LAW IN MONTANA BEFORE THE ESTABLISHMENT OF OTHER THAN MINERS' LAW. 1862 TO 1864.

SYSTEMS of law are things of growth. They do not appear full-fledged and finished, but come creeping through the ages bearing with them the fruits of human experience and the products of human progress. Roman jurisprudence impregnates that of the common law, and Rome borrowed of Greece and from all that had gone before it.

In every age and in every country the law has been and is an index to the moral and intellectual development of the people. An unerring and extensive history of the English-speaking race might be written from their law reports and judicial proceedings. Such a history would show step by step the advancement from barbarism to civilization, from the weakness and ignorance of infancy to the strength and knowledge of age, and the slow but steady establishment and application to the ever expanding wants and needs of progressive humanity, those principles of justice and equity which we fondly proclaim as the perfection of human reason.

* The ex-Chief Justice naively observes that every body is presumed to know the law,—everybody except lawyers and judges who have devoted their lives to the study of the law; presumption prevails most largely with those who know nothing of the law. The truth is, the ablest lawyers and the profoundest jurists, burn midnight oil as they may, grow gray with but little more than the alphabet of the law on their lips. Marvel not then that I hesitated to go forward with the history of Montana's bench and bar, for having been schooled in the law and having sat for years on the bench with such able advocates as ex-Attorney General Williams and W. Lair Hill, to argue mining and water-right cases before me, I knew enough to know that I could not do this part of the work assigned me, and so ex-Chief Justice Wade was appealed to. I cannot find words to say how profoundly grateful I am for his response. None but those deeply versed in the law, especially the laws of Montana, can reckon how much labor these chapters have cost and how indispensable they are to those contemplating practice in Montana. For the fact is, the bench and the bar of Montana have had to make the laws here, especially those pertaining to mines and water rights, de novo. They are as new, if we except some precedents and practices from California and Nevada where similar conditions have obtained, as newly minted coin. And so it follows that the lawyer from other lands, be he never so learned, without some knowledge of these chapters or the material from which they were so laboriously wrought, would be as helpless in Montana courts as if he went from the one State, where are still present the Latin or Code Napoleonic laws of practice and equity, to practice law in some city in the northern part of this Republic.

In fairness to Judge Wade, I must mention that his several chapters on the bench and bar of Montana were sent me in continuous and compact form, but it has been thought best to launch them on the current of Montana's history as it sweeps forward cotemporaneous with the law cases and events of which they treat; and this is all the change, if change it is, that I have made. Not one word or letter have I added or taken away; but I shall go forward less doubtful now, accompanied by this precise and profound man, feeling certain that whatever may be the temporary triumph or defeat, the book will be of lasting value because of the chapters on the bench and bar of Montana by ex-Chief Justice Wade.

James Fergus

In one way and another, in the course of time, the court-rooms picture and portray the whole of human life.

Emerson said humanity is a progress and not a station; and so it is with the law. It is a perpetual growth; it expands as human life takes on a wider range and a broader experience; it goes with every discovery and every advance, as irresistible progress moves the world along; it applies itself to new conditions and circumstances as they arise, and molds and gathers maxims from what is discovered or found to be always true.

History tells the story of race movements and migrations and the planting of laws and institutions in new countries, but there is nothing in the history of the law, or in that of the migration of races, more interesting or remarkable than the story of the march and journey of masses of men, women and families from the States over plains and mountains to the gold fields of the Pacific slope,—a march more perilous than that of Xenophon and the ten thousand, and the establishment of law and order in a vast and desolate region, and such law as would secure individual rights and promote and protect the mighty industries and enterprises to arise therein.

JAMES FERGUS.—This pioneer of pioneers has figured so prominently in Montana's history that the influence of his life will be felt long after he and his pioneer comrades shall have passed away.

James Fergus was born in the parish of Glassford, Lanarkshire, Scotland, October 8, 1813. His parents were well-to-do farmers, owning some real estate,—his father a rigid Presbyterian, and his mother more liberal in her spiritual views. Under this kind of home influence and with the advantage of the common schools, the first nineteen years of his life were spent. During this period he showed a disposition to do everything well that he undertook, and he early developed a fondness for good books. These characteristics remained with him and became intensified as he grew older.

When he was nineteen, seeing in his native land little chance for a young man to rise in the world, and longing for less restraint and more liberty and equality, young Fergus sailed for the United States by way of Canada, stopping three years in the latter country in a Quaker settlement, and spending the time to advantage in learning the trade of millwright. Getting involved in some political trouble, immediately before the Canadian rebellion, he took his departure for the United States, which was his intended destination when he sailed from home. The first summer he was employed as a millwright on a public work at Green Bay, Wisconsin. Then he spent a few weeks at Milwaukee, passed on to Chicago and from there went to Buffalo Grove, near Dixon's Ferry, where he spent the winter of 1836–7. While in Chicago he was offered 160 acres of land in what is now the heart of the city, at $8 an acre, partly on time. From Buffalo Grove Mr. Fergus went to eastern Iowa, then known as the Black Hawk Purchase, and made his home at what is now Sabula. Afterward he built and superintended powder mills at Savanna, Illinois, and engaged in the foundry and machine business at Moline, in the same State. In the latter business he was first associated with D. B. Sears, the founder of Moline, and afterward at the same place and at Rock Island with General N. B. Buford, being the managing partner. He was required by ill health to retire from this business and for some time thereafter was a member of the firm of Wheelock & Fergus, paper manufacturers at Moline.

In 1854 Mr. Fergus moved to Minnesota, where he was an active and enterprising citizen. In company with William Sturgis and Calvin A. Tuttle, he laid out the town of Little Falls on the Mississippi river, 100 miles above St. Anthony Falls. He owned five-twelfths of the town, and in conjunction with his partners built a dam and bridge across the Mississippi at that place. He afterward became identified with Fergus Falls, Minnesota, and owned half of the townsite. Failing in business, he again set his face toward the West, stopping in Colorado.

When the report of gold discoveries in Montana, or, rather in Idaho, reached Mr. Fergus in the winter of 1861-2, he was not long in making up his mind to go to the new diggings. To that end he joined Captain Fisk's expedition in 1862, driving his own ox team from Little Falls, Minnesota, to Bannack, the first mining camp of this State. Mr. Fergus entered actively into mining operations, and almost from the day of his arrival attained a prominence in affairs and was looked up to as a leader and safe counselor. We find that he was the first Recorder of Alder Gulch at Virginia City, and the first County Commissioner appointed in the Territory, for Madison county, of which Virginia City is the seat of government. He afterward moved to Lewis and Clarke county, near Helena, where he enjoyed the same distinction and respect of his fellowmen. He was elected and served two terms as Commissioner of this county and represented the same constituency in the Legislature one term.

Mr. Fergus had early engaged in the stock business, and, realizing the necessity of controlling wider range, he located some fifteen years ago in what was then

Judge Pomeroy says: "Vast numbers of immigrants poured over the mineral regions, settled down in every direction, appropriated parcels of the Territory to their own use, and were prospecting and mining in every mode rendered possible by their own resources, under no municipal law, and with no restraint except that of superior physical force. The world has probably never seen a similar spectacle—that of extensive gold fields suddenly peopled by masses of men from all States and countries, restrained by no law, and not agreed as to whence the laws ought to emanate or by which they would consent to be bound."

These hardy pioneers, these builders of States yet to be, more venturesome than Columbus or Marco Polo, found themselves in a new world, full of resources and surrounded by new and strange conditions. They were beyond the reach of law. They were effectually beyond the protection or control of the Government of the United States. These mineral lands had not been declared open to exploration or purchase. There was no means of acquiring title. These immigrants, miners and prospectors were trespassers upon the public domain, and as between themselves actual possession was the only evidence of ownership.

Meagher county, now Fergus county, near Fort Maginnis. He represented Meagher county in the first Constitutional Convention and afterward in the upper branch of the Legislature. During this latter service he was instrumental in getting a new county set off from Meagher, which bears his name and of which he is an honored resident. In the original bill (introduced by Mr. Fergus) the county was called Judith, but before the final passage in the Council, on motion of Judge Buck, seconded by Judge De Wolf, both Democrats, the name was changed to Fergus, the amendment receiving every vote in both branches, save that of the author of the bill. It was an honor worthily bestowed.

Mr. Fergus is a Republican in politics and is liberal in religious belief. His main characteristics are a natural aptitude for mechanical enterprises, a sturdy independence of thought, a strict integrity of purpose and a love for study and good books. He has beyond question the best and most select library of any ranch or stockman in Montana. He takes and reads, on an average, twenty-five of the best publications of this country, and some from Europe, reading, by his own estimate, not less than three hours a day, on an average, for the past sixty years. It may well be inferred that he keeps fully abreast of the times. Although eighty years of age, and an invalid for some time, Mr. Fergus is still active and energetic, giving a portion of his time to the management of his affairs.

Mr. Fergus was married to Pamelia Dillin, formerly from Jefferson county, New York, at Moline, Illinois, March 16, 1845, and she, his faithful consort for almost half a century, died October 6, 1887. So far as there is credit in being a pioneer Mrs. Fergus shared equally with her husband that honor. Colonel W. F. Sanders delivered a feeling and eloquent address at the grave of Mrs. Fergus, into which he incorporated the following words prepared by the husband:

"Friends:—The dead wife, mother and friend who lies here belonged to no religious sect, believed in no religious dogma and desired no religious services over her remains. The wishes of the living will be kept as a sacred contract with the dead. While she could not understand how she could live after death, or locate a heaven or a hell, she clearly comprehended the duties appertaining to her station in life, and in their performance was an obedient child, a faithful wife, a loving mother, a true friend and an honest woman, performing her full duty in all stations of life, beloved by all, leaving not an enemy behind. When our end comes may as much be said of us."

This worthy couple had four children, namely: a son, Andrew, still unmarried; two daughters, Mrs. R. S. Hamilton and Mrs. S. C. Gilpatrick, of Helena; and one, Mrs. Frank H. Maury, of Washington county, Oregon.

At the organization of the Pioneer Association of Montana, Mr. Fergus was elected the first president of the society, and upon taking the chair said: "I would rather occupy this position than be President of the United States." In writing of this organization and its first president—and the quotation is a fit conclusion to this sketch—Captain James H. Mills said in the New Northwest; "Mr. Fergus is a thoroughly honest man,—the noblest work of God,—in every sense of the word. His character is as sturdy as the mountains of his chosen home and his life as pure as the snows that tip their summits. May James Fergus be hailed in fellowship at many succeeding convocations of the pioneers."

Robert McMoran Donaldson, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Bozeman, Montana, was born at Ossian, Wells county, Indiana, son of Wilson M., and Elizabeth M., (Egbert) Donaldson. The Donaldsons are of Scotch origin, and their ancestral tree has been prolific with luxuriant growth of educational and ministerial branches. The descendants have taken no little interest and pride in gathering and putting in print the worthy deeds of their ancestors.

There was no law defining a mining claim, its extent, what should constitute a discovery, to what the discoverer should be entitled, the means of ownership, how a claim might be conveyed, how it might be worked or mined, or how water for that purpose might be used and delivered to the next claimant for the same purpose. The situation demanded law, and that without delay. There was no legislature to enact laws, even if it would have had the right, and Congress had not yet spoken upon the subject.

But these American citizens, most of them well educated, many of them graduates of colleges, and all of them familiar with the principles of self-government by the people, and accustomed to exercise the right at the ballot-box, proved themselves equal to the emergency. They invoked the good old method of the New England "town meeting" and made laws for themselves, by which they agreed to be governed. Wherever there was mining ground, they organized a mining district, and adopted rules and regulations for the government and control of all matters concerning mining, the use of water for that purpose, and the acquisition and disposal of mining claims, after defining of what a mining claim should consist.

Wilson M. Donaldson, the father of our subject, was born in Pennsylvania, was reared and educated there, and came from that State to Indiana in pioneer days. He devoted the best of his life to pastoral work. For forty-five years he served faithfully in the ministerial field, thirty years of that time in Indiana, ten years in Pennsylvania, and five in Ohio. Now at a ripe old age he makes his home in Minneapolis, Minnesota. He reared five sons and one daughter, all of whom are living except the daughter, namely: John B. Donaldson, D. D., an able and energetic minister and educator, is a graduate of Wabash College, Indiana, was for two years pastor of a Church at Ashland, Oregon, has for a number of years been editor of the North and West, a religious journal published in Minneapolis, and is also now pastor of the Fifth Presbyterian Church of that city; A. M. Donaldson, a graduate of a college in Colorado City, Colorado, is an assayer of metals in Denver; Wilson E. Donaldson, a graduate of both the Wabash College of Indiana and of the Allegheny Western Theological Seminary, of Pennsylvania, has for ten years been pastor of Bethel Church in Allegheny, Pennsylvania, and is now pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Toledo, Ohio; Charles A. Donaldson, M. D., is a graduate of the medical department of Wooster University, Cleveland, Ohio; and Janet, who was also educated at Wooster University. She died in Minneapolis, October 30, 1893. All spent several years at Elder's Ridge Academy, founded by their uncle, Alexander Donaldson, D. D. Their father and this uncle were both graduates of Jefferson College, Pennsylvania.

Alexander Donaldson, D. D., was from his youth up deeply interested in educational progress. He erected a log cabin, fifteen feet square, at Elder's Ridge, Pennsylvania, where boys were educated, and it soon became so popular that capacious, modern buildings were erected. Later, girls were admitted to this preparatory academy, and it continued to grow in favor. Among its graduates are numbered many eminent lawyers, doctors, ministers and men who have ranked among the leaders of their day. Alexander Donaldson's wife had three sisters whose husbands were doctors of divinity, and her brother was a Presbyterian clergyman A record of Alexander Donaldson's children is as follows: James Henry, who graduated at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, in 1858, was ordained as minister in 1863, was for four years pastor of a church at Schellsburg, Pennsylvania, and preached his last sermon in 1868; Martha J., a graduate of Blairsville Seminary, and the wife of Wallace W. Moorhead, D. D., died in 1871, leaving three children, Martha, Alexander D. and William Paul, the daughter being a graduate of the Woman's Medical College, Pennsylvania, and a practicing physician in a Boston hospital, and is now home physician in the North Western Hospital, Minneapolis; the sons being graduates of Jefferson College; Thomas Wilson, who died when young; Anna M., who married a prominent merchant and a Presbyterian Elder, John Milton Guthrie, of Indiana, Pennsylvania; David E., who died in 1862; Alexander H., a graduate of Jefferson College and of the Western Theological Seminary, Pennsylvania, died in New Mexico while acting as a missionary to the Navajo Indians; William Bracken, who was in college with his brother, Alexander H., and graduated with him at Jefferson College in 1869, died in 1871, while preparing himself for the ministry; and Robert McShane, a graduate of Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, with the class of 1885, died while on his way home after his graduation.

Robert M. Donaldson, whose name heads this article, was educated at Elder's Ridge Academy, University of Wooster, in Ohio, the Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pennsylvania, and the McCormick Seminary of Chicago, Illinois, being a graduate of the last named institution, with the class of 1888. While attending seminary he was licensed to preach, and for three years before his graduation at Chicago he had been filling a charge at Hastings, Minnesota. July 3, 1888, he was ordained to the ministry

They organized miners' courts, preserved order, protected life and property, and adjudicated rights, and commenced the conquest and reclamation of a vast unexplored country that has since then added so much to the wealth and power of the United States.

The jurisdiction of the miners' courts was not final. From the decision of these tribunals there was an appeal to the whole body of the miners of the district, presided over by an officer whom the miners had elected and called the President of the District. This was a direct appeal to the people and their voice was the supreme law.

These mining rules and regulations, being much the same in each district, very soon came to have the force and effect of the common law, the law of the land, for the mining region, and later, when Congress began to legislate on the subject, these rules and regulations of the miners were recognized as valid laws, and were enforced by the courts in the adjudication of property rights.*

Thus was laid the foundation of that great system of mining law that now prevails in the mining regions of the Pacific States, and upon the validity of which such vast interests and rights depend. This system of mining law is but an instance and example of how the law grows up and adapts itself to novel and strange conditions. This system was formed without a precedent, its language is Greek to lawyers who have not studied and learned to interpret it, and is the product of the wants, needs and necessities of the country where it exists.

Montana is within that region of our country covered by this system of mining law, and was an active agent in building up and perfecting the system. Rich in mineral resources and of vast extent, this Territory at once became a tempting field for the energy and enterprise of those daring spirits who endured the perils of the plains to reach and occupy it. Isolated and beyond the reach of civilization, these men became a law unto themselves, and the miner's rules and regulations, those primitive statutes by the Presbytery in session at Hastings. He succeeded his brother, Dr. J. B. Donaldson, as pastor of the church at that place, his brother having filled the pulpit there for nine years, and he for five years longer. From this field of labor the subject of our sketch was called to Bozeman, Montana, in 1893.

Robert Mc M. Donaldson was married February 23, 1892, to Miss Jennie E. Talcott, of Livingston, Montana, and they have one child, Jeannette, born August 10, 1893. Mrs. Donaldson is a daughter of William H. Talcott, deceased. She has one brother, William Talcott, who is a prominent electrician of Chicago; another brother, Henry Talcott, is engaged in business in Livingston, Montana; and still another brother, E. H. Talcott, who is president of Park National Bank of Livingston.

*The miners' laws of Montana, as were those of earlier gold fields, like the all-enduring constitution of the British empire, entirely unwritten but resided in the miners' heart, based on the eternal principles of equity. I have at hand many an old record in the recorder's original manuscript. One of these is entirely on the blanks of old letters, and they are all exceeding brief, differing, as a rule, only in the length of a claim and the time allowed a miner or a mining company to "lay over" without being "jumped." This was a matter regulated by water, snow, frozen ground and so on. In short, common sense was the common law of the miner. No man was required to work his claim if it could not be worked; nor was it written down that a claim could not be "jumped" while its owner was absent fighting Indians or kept from work by sickness or for the want of "grub" at hand. But such was the insatiable law, and as fixed as that which made Esther mistress of Media and Persia.

Of course as districts rounded down from their first crude existence and began to develop great riches, the receiver became a man of some importance, got a big book and had an office instead of carrying his office and all its belongings around in his hat, as did Abraham Lincoln when postmaster; but the book of the average receiver is a lesson in laconics.

"We, most of the miners, resolve, first, that this district shall be called French Creek, and that a claim shall be one hundred feet long in the creek, two hundred feet long in a gulch and fifty feet front on the bank, and that a man may hold one of each:

"Resolved, secondly, that no more Chinamen shall take up claims.

of the mining districts, made and enforced by the people, became charters of liberty and the parents of law and order.

Montana had a history before it had a name; it enacted laws and established courts before it had a legislature or judges; it planted a State before it was born a Territory.

The period from the discovery of gold in 1862 to the organization of the Territory in May, 1864, was an era of government and control by the inherent force and majesty of American citizenship, unaided by executive, legislative or judicial departments, and as to mines, mining and water rights, this era continued until July, 1866, and May, 1872, when Congress opened the mineral lands to exploration and purchase, and validated the miners' rules and regulations theretofore existing.

The first courts in what is now Montana, were miners' courts, presided over by judges elected by the miners of the districts, to enforce mining rules and regulations made by and for themselves. Besides providing themselves with a system of mining law, the people acting to-

WILLIAM HAYDEN CAMPBELL, M. D., Livingston, Montana, was born in Cobourg, Northumberland county, Ontario, June, 29, 1848, son of William and Sarah Ann (Haven) Campbell.

William Campbell, the doctor's father, was one of the Argyle Campbells of Scottish prominence. He came to America and located in Canada when a mere youth, where he married, and where he became famous as a contractor. He had a contract for building a plank road between the cities of Hamilton and Port Dover, which at that time was considered a more formidable undertaking than the constructing of a like mileage of railroad at the present time.

William H. Campbell early developed a capacity and inclination for professional life. After completing his studies in the grammar school at Cobourg he attended the Collegiate Institute at Port Hope. He also studied medicine in Canada, taking two courses and took one degree there before coming to the United States. In the spring of 1878 he located in Jamestown, North Dakota, where he continued the study of medicine and was associated in practice for a time with his uncle, Dr. F. E. Thorald. In the spring of 1882 he removed to Glendive, Montana, and from there, in November of the same year, came to Livingston, where he has ever since been engaged in the practice of his profession, with the exception of time spent in Colorado, where he further prepared himself for professional duties by taking two courses at Gross Medical College, graduating there in 1890. Fitted by both natural ability and by thorough education for his profession, he ranks with the leading physicians of this part of Montana, where he has an extensive and profitable practice.

"Resolved, thirdly, that a white man must stick up a notice at each end of his claim when he takes it up.

"Resolved, fourthly, that a man may lay over his claim a month by posting a notice and paying the receiver one dollar.

"Resolved, fifthly, that all disputes about claims shall be settled by a miners' meeting and no lawyers."

Here follows the unintelligible name of the receiver and about a dozen others. If the document ever had a date it does not appear. A fine and not a faultless book of laws to be sure; yet millions were oftentimes held by no other tenure, and the miner lost no sleep from dread of his title deeds. The "notice" read all sorts of ways, and, like the foregoing "record," was spelled almost any way. The usual reading was:

NOTICE!

"I (or we) the undersigned, claim [here follows the number and length of claims] for mining purposes, and intend to work the same as," etc. Here follows water, cabin, provisions, or whatever cause of delay, ending with signature and date. But even date and signature, oddly as it may read to a lawyer, could be dispensed with under certain circumstances.

The first lawsuit in which I ever appeared as advocate was occasioned by what was counted a defective notice. This was in Florence, from which lawyers were not debarred. The lawyer on the other side was a bright young fellow by the name of Thurmond, famous afterward as one of the lawyers who unsuccessfully defended George Ives, and who, being notified by the vigilantes to leave the country in twenty minutes, replied that he would be off in less than five if his mule didn't balk. This notice read:

"Notese, i clames the clames on dese here gulch here."

Thurmond held that this was no notice at all; but his client admitted that he knew Dutch Jake, the baker, put up the notice and claimed the ground; and so they gave the poor illiterate fellow the claim without even giving me a chance to make my maiden speech! The Supreme Court of the United States could not have done better. Let me add that it was often allowed in the old days, as in this case at Florence, that a miner could take up a claim for his coming partner.

The mining laws of Last Chance Gulch, from which grew the wealthiest city per capita in the world, if we except Pilsen, Bohemia, and a few small places of like community business relations, were even more brief than those given here, and will be found literally as first written in the next chapter.

gether were compelled to exercise their original criminal jurisdiction, which corresponds to the right of self-defense in the individual. The discovery of gold attracted thither not only the better but also the worst and lowest elements of society. Criminals and outlaws, following close upon the heels of the pioneer and homeseeker, hovered about the mining camps and infested the country. Their business was crime and plunder.* They lay in wait for stage coaches by which gold was sent out of the country, murdered the passengers, robbed emigrants and travelers, waylaid miners, and terrorized every mining camp and community. In the summer and autumn of 1863 the supreme question was whether criminals and murderers or the well-disposed people should rule the country; whether cut-throats or honest men should control. There were no courts or officers to preserve order or to punish crime. Life, liberty and property were without any protection. The situation was desperate and unparalleled. It was crime against society, criminals against honest men, murder and robbery against life and property.

Associated with him is Dr. Alton, one of Montana's noted surgeons, now employed as surgeon for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company at Livingston. Dr. Campbell was for some time connected with a drug business here, but has disposed of his interest in it. He served two years as Alderman of Livingston, representing the second ward. Dr. Campbell is a member of the State Medical Association of Montana and of the American Medical Association, and holds a certificate from the Colorado Medical Examining Board. He also took a four months' course at the Chicago Polyclinic, in the winter of 1894. He is connected with both the A. F. & A. M., and the B P. O. E., being Exalted Ruler of the latter.

Dr. Campbell's residence is one of the most attractive homes in Livingston. He was married in 1885 to Miss Rose Ferte, daughter of Dr. Edward Ferte, a Frenchman and a resident of Livingston. He and his wife are members of the Episcopal Church. He has been, and is now a consistent Democrat, and an ardent friend of silver.

*I mean no more to dispute or disrespect Bret Harte than to contradict Dickens or Dumas. But for the benefit of the young John Oakhursts that are sprouting up in the little "cities" along the "Shining Mountains," I want to say flatly there never was such a man except in the matchless story of the Outcasts of Poker Flat, and there never will be. And yet he is a fact as the Count of Monte Cristo is a fact.

But if you could have taken off those pretty boots which he so carefully dusted with his pocket-handkerchief, and in which, let us hope, he died, you would have found holes in his socks and his feet very dirty.

For the good of the rosy, rural girl who is disposed to love her embryo Oakhurst who haunts the saloons of the little town of the mountains or foothills, I want to say positively that anything that is on him or about him, except the boots and outer shirt, is as dirty and ragged as his character; and that is saying that he is filthy, repulsive from top to toe, a coward, a liar and a sneak, who would no more think of taking his own scalp, as John Oakhurst did, than he would of paying a board bill.

And please remember, that even perfect and pathetic as this ideal Oakhurst is, he became an outcast and died miserably by his own hand to escape the rope. Cherokees Sal, Mother Shipton,—all such, in fact, perished most wretchedly. And here is where the work of the perfect artist is apparent. He could not, if he would, forget the eternal equities. They all and each went to the dogs in the great "round up." Only the work is so perfectly done and the shadows so compact with pathos that we are all lost in sympathy, and don't see the dismal end, or the dirty feet in the polished boots.

And now let me announce a fact, not without deliberation and observation—one which I shall stand at all times ready to maintain: the mountain gambler, who has always been heralded as a most generous, liberal and open-handed fellow, is, was and always will be the meanest, stingiest man in the State.

In Europe, where men have nothing to do but spend money, things are not as here. Pent up in cities, or at best crowded together by millions on a continent not much bigger than our back yard, they often turn to cards for diversion. They do nothing but spend money. We do nothing but make money. In Europe, if a man is even suspected of playing cards merely for the money there is in it, he is promptly "cut." But here if your Mr. Oakhurst should be found playing cards for the fun there is in it he would be thought a fool.

The fact is, my dear folks of the foothills, your Mr. Oakhurst does not want to work, but he does want those pretty, polished boots, little matter whether he has anything else on his feet or not; and he is going to fleece some drunken old man or some idiotic boy to get them. And that is the John Oakhurst of the mountains. He is a grade or two higher down in Portland or Duluth, where he hangs around the cigar-shops and the pool-rooms; but he is the same cunning, mean, miserly lout—doing it all for the money there is in it. In San Francisco, of course, there is a higher grade, somewhat as in Europe, where diversion is sought; but my work is with the Oakhursts of the interior, where the rank crop of young would-be gamblers is growing up.

The people, few in numbers and scattered over a wide extent of country, were compelled to organize and confederate together for self-preservation. They acted with deliberation. The supreme hour had come. They were to test their right to live. Their calmness was not that of despair or cowardice, but of self-respect, manhood, American citizenship. They did nothing in the nature of mob violence or lynch law. Remembering the forms of law in their distant homes, where judge and jury tried men for crime, the organized citizens' courts with the miners' judge to preside, formed juries who listened to the evidence, had attorneys to prosecute and defend, and not until the testimony had excluded every doubt was a verdict of guilty returned; and when returned, without undue delay, uninfluenced by petty technicalities, maudlin sympathy, or unholy passion, it was, in an orderly manner, carried into execution. In the period of six or eight months, many men had been tried in these courts, found guilty of murder and executed.

There is nothing in history like these trials.

Col. Harry C. Kessler, of Butte City is a native of Pennsylvania, born in the city of Philadelphia, March 18, 1844, of German ancestry, a family of merchants who came to that city previous to the Revolution. His great-grandfather, John Kessler, was a midshipman in the United States Navy during the Revolutionary war and was prominent in the affairs of the City of Brotherly Love early in the history of that pleasant place. His grandfather, also named John Kessler, was a Philadelphia merchant, and his son, also named John Kessler, born in Philadelphia in 1818, married Sophia R. Steever, a native of his own city, of German extraction. Her people were prominent iron manufacturers. By the latter marriage there were five sons and two daughters, of whom six are still living. Their father died at the age of sixty-eight years, and their mother in her seventy-third year, members of the Episcopalian Church, and highly esteemed in society.

Their third child, whose name heads this sketch, was educated in the public schools of his native city, and in 1861, when only seventeen years of age, he enlisted in the One Hundred and Fourth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, was commissioned Second Lieutenant and served in the army of the Potomac. While making a charge at the battle of Fair Oaks he was wounded and laid up for three months. When he so far recovered as to rejoin his command he was promoted to the position of First Lieutenant, and during the latter part of his term he was on detached service as Acting Commissary of Subsistence, Army of the Cumberland. His regiment rendered excellent service to the country, being in nine heavy engagements, and meeting with heavy losses, but covering themselves with glory.

After the close of the war he started out in business in Philadelphia, as a member of the firm of Breüker & Kessler, lithographers and printers. After prosecuting this business nine years he sold his interest to his brother, and the succeeding firm thus formed is still doing business. Mr. Kessler's health had failed, and he was advised to come West.

He came to Deer Lodge county in 1874, and engaged in business with Captain James H. Mills in publishing the New Northwest; and in 1876 came to Butte to establish the Butte Miner, and take charge of the paper, while Captain Mills continued in charge of the New Northwest. In 1877 Mr. Kessler severed his connection with the Miner in order to give his whole attention to mining, in which he has since continued.

Mr. Kessler has been a Republican ever since he became a voter, and in 1883, in Silver Bow county, he was elected one of the County Commissioners, served a term of two years, and then was elected County Treasurer and filled that office eight years.

I was once keeping a night-school for miners near Shasta, where one of those handsome, dashing, valiant John Oakhursts got after me. Now I was not yet fifteen. I was not able to work, having been badly hurt a few months before at Castle Rock, but some kind miners had fitted up an old log cabin where I could read to them at night and teach them to write on Sundays. It seems incredible that lots of young men there then could not even write their names. But such was the fact, and these big fellows from the border learned fast and paid well. It would make a long story; it would take a book to tell how hard some Shasta gamblers tried to get me to play with them. And under these circumstances! Finally, one of them borrowed what little money I had, and then they let me alone. Oh, they were low, all alike low; and in all the towns up and down the coast I have always found them alike—eager to wear polished boots and alike unwilling to work for them.

Frankly, the California gamblers as I knew them, and my trade as teacher, expressman, lawyer and judge brought me in contact with lots of them and in many parts of the country,—were a lousy set. They drifted out of California far to the north as time rolled by, following the miners as sharks follow ships, until finally the miners turned on them, away up yonder toward Canada on the top of the Rockies. In the name of an order established here in San Francisco, the Vigilantes, they laid them to rest by the score. On the snow-sown summits of Montana, their hands tied behind them and a hempen cord for a necktie, they sleep, and they sleep in their pretty polished boots forever.—J. M., in Temple Bar, London.

They were open and public; they were attended by the well disposed people and the desperadoes alike, all being armed and on the alert, some looking for the arrival of confederates and preparing to rescue the prisoner, and others, with their lives in their hands, ready to prevent the attempt. It required supreme courage for a lawyer to prosecute, or for a witness to testify against, a prisoner at these trials.

Here is a picture from the trial of George Ives, at Nevada City, on the 22d day of December, 1863: "The crowd which gathered around that fire in front of the court is vividly before our eyes. We see the wagon containing the judge and an advocate pleading with all his earnestness and eloquence for the dauntless robber, on whose unmoved features no shade of despondency can be traced by the fitful glare of the blazing wood, which lights up at the same time the stern and impassive features of the guard, who, in every kind of habiliments, stand in various attitudes in a circle surrounding the scene of justice. The attentive faces and compressed lips of the jurors show their sense of the vast responsibility that rests upon them, and of their firm resolve to do their duty. Ever and anon a brighter flash than ordinary reveals the expectant crowd of miners, thoughtfully and steadily gazing on the scene, and listening intently to the trial. Beyond this close phalanx fretting and shifting around its outer edge, sways with quick and uncertain motion the

At the first organization of the Grand Army of the Republic, he became a member, and was one of the charter members of Lincoln Post. He has always taken a deep interest in its affairs, and in 1891 he was elected Commander of the Department of the G. A. R. in Montana. When the First Regiment of National Guards in this State was organized he took an active interest in it, becoming Captain, then Lieutenant Colonel and Colonel, and for years has been very active in promoting its welfare, and taken much pride in its drill, discipline and efficiency.

Mr. Kessler is a Knight Templar Mason, a member of the military order of the Loyal Legion and of the society of the Army of the Potomac.

November 8, 1876, in Pittsburg, Mr. Kessler married Miss Josephine Alden Dilworth, the daughter of William Dilworth, a prominent lumber dealer of Pittsburg. Mr. and Mrs. Kessler have two children, both born in Montana, namely: Josephine D. and Harry C., Jr.

JOSEPH HOULE, one of Montana's earliest pioneers, was born in St. Gregoire, district of Three Rivers, in the province of Quebec, Canada, March 27, 1836. His parents were Joseph and Angelina (Miller) Houle, his father of French and his mother of German ancestry. They had nine children, Joseph being the third born and one of the six who are still living. The father died in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and the mother passed away in her seventieth year.

The subject of our sketch resided at his native place until his sixteenth year, when he went to New Hampshire and worked on a farm for wages. After two years spent in this way he went to St. Paul, where he worked three years. He then went to St. Louis, from there to [illegible], where he was employed in cutting cord-wood, [illegible] to St. Louis, and in the spring of 1864 hired [illegible] Fur Company to come to Fort Benton, Montana. On their way up the river, June 24, the boat burned, and Mr. Houle was one of the party who came to Fort Benton on foot. He remained here three years, buying furs of the Indians. During the gold excitement at Virginia City, he went there and mined for six months, got some gold, then went on the stampede to the British possessions. Not finding gold here in large quantites, however, he returned to Frenchtown and located the farm on which he has since resided. In the winter of 1865 he settled on it, took homestead and pre-emption claims, and now has a fine farm of 480 acres. He raises wheat, oats and vegetables. He also raises cattle and horses of the best grades.

Mr. Houle was married November 27, 1865, to Miss Eliza Brown, a native of California and a daughter of Louie Brown, a Montana pioneer. They have had twelve children, eight of whom are living, as follows: Joseph, Kalix, John, Fred, Lizia, Lenora, Annie, Julian and Arthur. Their daughter, Delphine, wife of William Murry, died soon after the birth of her little son William, and this little son is being reared by his grandparents. The whole family are members of the Catholic Church, and politically, Mr. Houle has been a Democrat ever since he has been a voter.

During his early experiences in Montana, Mr. Houle had many narrow escapes and suffered many hardships and dangers. On one occasion he was captured by the Crow Indians, held over night and in the morning released. At another time, the same fall, a war party of Crows captured him at four o'clock in the afternoon, stripped him of all his clothing and turned him loose. In a nude condition and without any food, he made the journey on foot to Fort Benton, a distance of thirty miles. After he settled on his farm it was some time before his supplies could be obtained nearer than Salt Lake or Walla Walla, the trips to those places being made with pack animals wavering line of desperadoes and sympathizers with the criminal, their haggard, wild and alarmed countenances showing too plainly that they tremble at the issue which is, when decided, to drive them into exile from Montana, or to proclaim them as associate criminals, whose fate could neither be delayed or dubious. A sight like this will never again be seen in Montana. It was the crisis of the fate of the Territory. Nor was the position of prosecutor, guard, jury or judge one that any but a brave and law-abiding citizen would choose, or even accept; being marked for slaughter by desperadoes, these men staked their lives for the welfare of society.

"The hero of that hour of trial was avowedly Col. W. F. Sanders. Not a desperado there but would have felt honored by becoming his murderer, and yet, fearless as a lion, he stood there confronting and defying the malice of his armed adversaries."

After a verdict of guilty of murder had been rendered against the prisoner, his lawyers, H. P. A. Smith, John D. Richie, James M. Thurman, Samuel Word and Alexander Davis, made a strenuous effort on behalf of the prisoner to have further proceedings postponed until the next day; but Colonel Sanders, who prosecuted for the people, with unsurpassed courage, and looking into the muzzles of a thousand guns, mounted the wagon and in the presence of the multitude recited that Ives had been de-

NICHOLAS KESSLER, a prominent citizen of Helena and well known as the leading brewer of Montana, was born in Befort, in the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, Germany, May 26, 1833. He was the youngest of a family of six children, and his youthful days were spent amid rural surroundings, his father, Nicholas Kessler, owning and operating a small farm.

At the age of twenty, young Nicholas emigrated to America, landing at New York, January 10, 1854. From there he went to Sandusky, Ohio, and thence to Detroit, Michigan, at the latter place being for a short time employed in a grocery store. We next find him in the lumbering districts of Northern Michigan, where, however, he remained only a short time, going from there to Chicago, Illinois, and embarking in the commission and feed business, in partnership with James McPherson. He spent three years in Chicago, being there during the panic of 1857–8 and at that time losing all he had saved. He remained, however, until after he had adjusted his accounts, and when the Pike's Peak gold excitement broke out he was among the throng that started across the plains for that point.

Arrived in Colorado, Mr. Kessler found what was considered a good prospect at the head of White Gulch, where he invested his hard-earned savings only to find his prospect but a pocket, and he eventually came out of it penniless. From there he drifted into another camp known as Buckskin Joe, and from there to Montgomery. At the latter place a new mining district had been organized, and there he again engaged in mining and obtained possession of several claims, but none of them proved to be good, and his mining ventures there resulted in failure and he came out in debt. Next he went to Breckenridge and from there to French Gulch, provisions all the time being high and our subject in hard luck; so, finally, in August, 1863, in company with a few others, he started for Bannack, Montana. After a rough and adventurous trip they arrived in Virginia City, September 22, 1863 This camp was then in the height of its prosperity, and here Mr. Kessler started a bakery, restaurant and liquor business, making money rapidly and remaining until the following year. In 1864, having accumulated a considerable sum, he returned to Germany on a visit. While in Germany he received a letter from a friend in Diamond City, then known as Confederate Gulch, in which he was informed that his friend had staked a good mining claim for him, and that if he would come back it would be held till his arrival. He started at once, but reached Diamond City too late: his claim had been jumped and his friend was unable to hold it.

About this time Blackfoot City had a boom. Mr. Kessler started for that point with the intention of building a brewery for Charles Beehrer of Nevada, with whom he had become associated, and upon his arrival there at once went to work on the building. Before it was completed, however, it was found that the mines were limited in their wealth and would not warrant the completion of this undertaking. Mr. Kessler then came to Helena and took charge of a brewery owned by Mr. Beehrer. On May 9, 1865, Charles Beehrer sold the brewery to Mr. Kessler, and from that day the Kessler Brewery has been under the management of Mr. Kessler. This brewery has grown by degrees from a small institution to its present size and capacity, being now the largest and most perfectly equipped brewing establishment in the Northwest. It has been rebuilt and remodeled three times. The present structure was erected in 1886. Its capacity is ample for supplying the needs of the surrounding towns for years to come.

Some time in 1866, brick being very scarce and a demand having been created by the building of the old smelter, Mr. James Mason started a brickyard on the clared a murderer and robber by the people there assembled, and moved "that George Ives be forthwith hung by the neck until dead," which motion prevailed, and the sentence was at once carried into execution.

The lawyers who practiced in the miners' courts before the organization of the Territory, and who were active in laying the foundations of the mining law, and in the preservation of order, were W. F. Sanders, E. W. Toole, W. Y. Pemberton, Samuel Word, Robert Lawrence, James M. Thurman, A. E. Mayhew, H. P. A. Smith, G. W. Stapleton, Louis McMurtry, J. A. Johnston, John Richie, J. H. Brown, W. J. McCormick, L. J. Campbell, and Alex. Davis.

Among the judges of the miners' courts of that period were B. B. Burchett and Gaylord S. Bissell of Bannack; John S. Lott, Don L. Byam and Walter B. Dance, of Nevada City; Wilson of Adobetown, and Fuller of the Summit Mining District.

premises close to the brewery. Mr. Kessler became interested in the industry, and subsequently, when Helena began to grow into a city, he continued the manufactory, making the greater part of the brick of which Helena is built, and supplying the surrounding towns. The quality of the brick being very superior, a demand soon arose for them, and a large trade in this product was built up in a short time.

Mr. Kessler has, during his life in Montana, acquired a considerable amount of real-estate in Helena and elsewhere throughout the State. He has erected a number of brick buildings. He is also interested in mines, farms and stock-raising.

Mr. Kessler was married, in 1873, to Miss Louisa Ebert, of New York city. In 1880 Mrs. Kessler died, leaving three children, two sons and a daughter. Both of the sons are now associated with their father in the care and management of his extensive establishment and business interests throughout the State. Mr. Kessler has not since married.

He is now sixty-one years of age. For thirty years he has averaged eighteen hours per day of hard work, and is still an active, healthy and vigorous business man. He is a zealous advocate of the virtues of the proper use of malt drinks, and points with pride to his healthy family and successful career as proof of his doctrine.

BENJAMIN STRICKLAND, one of the early pioneers of Montana, came to Emigrant Gulch and engaged in mining in 1864. He also mined for a time at Carpenter's Bar.

In 1868 he was married to Nancy J. Dailey, daughter of Ebenezer and Catherine (Miller) Dailey. Her father was a native of Virginia, and her mother of Ohio. Mr. Dailey was one of the early settlers in Montana; an active, enterprising business man, well and favorably known throughout the Territory. He reared a family of sons and daughters, all of whom are energetic, well-to-do citizens. After their marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Strickland removed to Oregon and settled on a ranch, where he carried on farming operations and stock-raising until 1872. In the fall of that year they returned to Montana, and in 1875 permanently located on the ranch they now own, it being located in Paradise valley, on the Yellowstone, ten miles south of Livingston. To the original 160 acres, which Mr. Strickland homesteaded, he has still added by purchase, until he is now the owner of a whole section of land opposite Point of Rocks, on the east side of the Yellowstone river, thirty miles from Livingston. On this ranch is kept a herd of several hundred cattle.

Mr. and Mrs. Strickland have five children living, namely: Catherine E., David F., Millie L., Ebenezer and Samuel. They lost two children, Mary Isabel and John Russell, who died at the ages of two and nineteen years, respectively. Catherine E. is now the wife of Lou Carpenter. Mrs. Strickland is a woman of more than ordinary intelligence and business ability. To her industry, careful economy and good judgment, Mr. Strickland attributes much of the success that has come to them.

Mr. Strickland is a member of the Masonic fraternity, having attained the twenty-second degree. During the war, in 1862, he enlisted in a Minnesota regiment of cavalry, and, under General Sibley, spent two years on the frontier, fighting the Indians. Politically, he and his wife are Democrats. Mrs. Strickland is a member of the Board of School Trustees, and is an active worker in the field of education. The Strickland family are among the highly respected people of the community in which they live.

*The first case tried in or near the bounds of what is now Montana, was that of an insubordinate soldier, so far as we have any authentic record. In the expedition sent out to the Oregon by Jefferson, a sort of court martial, at which Captains Lewis and Clarke presided, found the accused guilty and had him whipped. This sort of court prevailed with more or less rigor, especially when Stevens and Mullen were pushing their explorations and military-road enterprise—supplemented by the guard-house when such a thing was at hand; and these trials, convictions and floggings were not confined to soldiers by any means, but also extended to thieving Indians and worse than thieving whites,—jackals that always hover about the coming lairs—till the civil law made advent in Missoula, the first county in Montana, July, 1862.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE RICHEST CITY IN THE WORLD—HELENA—A GEORGIA GOLD MINE—THE RISING AND RECEDING TIDES OF MINING CAMPS—TENDER-FEET—FIRST MAGISTRATE—FIRST MARRIAGE IN HELENA—DEVELOPMENT OF SILVER BOW AND BUTTE—RIVERS OF SILVER FLOWING FROM BLACKENED ROCKS.

1864 TO 1866.

THE discovery and founding of the capital of Montana, which is now the wealthiest city in the world, was not at all intentional. An old gold-hunter from Georgia, despairing of getting any foothold in any of the famous placer mines already found in Montana, set out with a small party and pushed down the river into unexplored regions. His name was John Cowan, but was known as "Uncle Johnny," being a very aged man. On the 21st of June, 1864, his party did some desultory mining where Helena now stands, but had little faith in the future of their discovery, although they formed a district and gave the place a name.

I have before spoken of the simple, terse and laconic laws set up by miners for their own government and by which millions and hundreds of millions were held in perfect confidence and absolute security. I here insert a copy of the

Here in this county, the first marriage in Montana, in which both parties to the sacred contract were white Americans, took place, and here also the first civil trial. We quote from Woody's Centennial History of Missoula County:

"The first lawsuit ever commenced in Missoula county, or in fact in Montana, was commenced and tried at Hell's Gate, in the month of March, 1862, before Henry Brooks, justice of the peace. The proceedings were under the laws of Washington Territory. A Frenchman called 'Tin Cup Joe'—other name forgotten—accused Baron O'Keeffe with beating one of his horses with a fork-handle and then pushing him into a hole, thereby causing his death, and claimed damages in the sum of $40, and sued O'Keefe to recover that amount. The place of trial was in Bolte's saloon. A jury of six was empaneled and sworn to try the cause. W. B. S. Higgins and A. S. Blake, now of Missoula county, and Bart Henderson, of the Yellowstone, were of the jury. As the trial progressed the proceedings became less harmonious until it ultimately culminated in a bit of unpleasantness between the defendant and the writer, who was acting as attorney for the plaintiff. During the unpleasantness the friends of the respective parties lent a hand, and it was far from being a select or private affair. While the unpleasantness was in progress the court and a portion of the jury had fled for dear life, and when harmony was restored they were nowhere to be found. After considerable search the court and jury were captured and the trial proceeded. The case was finally given to the jury, and after a brief absence they came into court and rendered a verdict for plaintiff for $40 damages. The costs swelled the judgment to about $90. This was probably the most hotly contested case ever tried in the Territory. The defendant endeavored to take an appeal to the district court, but as that court was held in Colville, 300 miles distant, he concluded to settle the judgment, which he did. Poor Bishop Brooks was in 1865 killed in Uncle Ben's Gulch, near Blackfoot City,—shot through a glass door,—by whom or for what cause was never known. This Brooks was given the sobriquet of Bishop Brooks owing to his performing the first ceremony of uniting the first white Americans married in the eastern county of Washington Territory."

In this patriarchal county, Missoula, also occurred the first legal execution in all Montana, that of a Chinaman for striking to death a fellow Chinaman while trying to rob him. This first execution in Montana took place in 1883, more than twenty years after the advent of civil law and nearly twenty years after the law had full dominion over all the land. I call especial attention to these dates, for I know not what better evidence can be put in the witness box than this to prove beyond dispute, as I have repeatedly asserted, that Montana was from the first, as she is still, one of the most secure, peaceful and law-abiding districts to be found, or was ever known, under the flag

"Mining Laws" that first governed that portion of Montana where the capital now stands. The miners' meeting at which these laws were called into existence was held on Last Chance creek or gulch, as you please to call it, as with Alder creek or gulch, on the 20th of July, 1864. The laws read as follows:

"That the gulch be named Last Chance Gulch, and the district in which the discovery is made be named Rattle Snake District, to extend down three miles, and up to the mouth of the cañon, and across from summit to summit. That mining claims in this district extend for 200 feet up and down the gulch, and from summit to summit. That no person be allowed to hold more than one claim by pre-emption, and one by purchase, except as regards the discovery claims. That each member of the discovery party be entitled to hold, in addition to 200 feet by pre-emption, 100 feet for a discovery claim. That the discovery party shall have the prior right to the use of the gulch water. That claims, when pre-empted, be staked and recorded. That any person, besides his own claim, be allowed to record one for his actual partner, and one only, and that he can represent both; but if a partner be so recorded for, it must be specified, and the name given in full."—John D. Ludwig.

WILLIAM V. MYERS, County Commissioner of Jefferson county, was born in Fayette county, Ohio, March 24, 1839, and is of German and Scotch descent. His great-grandmother lived to the age of 103 years, and his grandfather reached the age of eighty years. The latter moved to northwestern Ohio in 1809, where he raised his family. Isaac Myers, the fourth child in order of birth, was born in Ohio in 1810. He married Miss Elizabeth Vance, a native also of Ohio, and they had ten children, six sons and four daughters, six of whom still survive. The father lived to the age of sixty years, and the mother now resides at Greenfield, Adair county, Iowa, at the age of eighty-four years.

William V. Myers, the third child in order of birth in the above family, was reared on his father's farm in Ohio, where he worked during the summer months, and attended school in winters. In 1858 the family emigrated to Iowa, and in 1860 our subject crossed the plains to Colorado, having spent three years in the mines at Pike's Peak, working chiefly on his own account, but with poor success. In 1863 he came from that place to Virginia City, Montana, and from that time until 1873 mined at that place, Helena, in the Blackfoot region, Confederate Gulch, Diamond City and Indian Creek. At Diamond City he made from $100 to $400 a day on his claim, and on Indian Creek the mining was equally good. In 1874 Mr. Myers embarked in the mercantile trade in St. Louis; in 1876 engaged in the same occupation in Radersburg, remaining there three years, and spent four months at his old home in Ohio. Since returning to this State he has purchased 320 acres of land near Toston, where he now resides. He has a large free range for his stock, and for a number of years has been successfully engaged in raising a grade of Durham cattle and trotting horses. He keeps as high as 200 head of cattle, and is considered one of Montana's competent stock farmers.

In [illegible] 1880 Mr. Myers was united in marriage with Anna Parks, a native of Cleveland, Ohio, but who died after twenty months of happy wedded life. In political matters, Mr. Myers affiliates with the Republican party, and is now holding the office of County Commissioner. Socially, he is a member of the A. O. U. W., and of the Pioneer Society. He enjoys the highest esteem of all who know him, and is a worthy representative of the Montana pioneer of 1863.

WALLACE L. MILLIGAN, a successful farmer and respected pioneer of Montana, came to the Territory in 1863, and, having long been identified with it, he is entitled to some mention in connection with its representative citizens. A brief sketch of his life is as follows:

Wallace L. Milligan was born in the State of New York, February 4, 1837. His father, James Milligan born in Scotland in 1796, came to America in 1805, and settled in New York. He was in the war of 1812, stationed on Long Island. After he grew up he was united in marriage to Miss Eleanor Mead, a native of the Empire State. As the years passed by they had sons and daughters, nine in number, of whom six are now living. His wife died in 1863, and he lived to the advanced age of eighty-four years, dying in Helena, Montana, in April, 1881, and buried in the old cemetery.

Wallace L. was the last child born in this family, and, the Milligan family having removed to Wisconsin in 1847: in that frontier Territory he was reared and educated, receiving his education in a primitive log schoolhouse. He remained with his father until 1859, when he came across the plains, his objective point being Pike's Peak, at which place he mined until the spring of 1863. He then came to Bannack, Montana, and engaged in mining during the summer, his operations there being successful. On one occasion he got $9 out of a single panful of dirt, and his best day's work netted him $250.

After this Mr. Milligan returned, in November, 1863, to Iowa, and April 9, 1864, married Miss Martha Rockofellow. Two days after their marriage, April 11, 1864, they started on the long journey across the plains. Their wagon was drawn by a four-horse team, and they came on One of the editors of the Herald, writing of those early events, says:

"From Mr. Wellington E. Wood, who was one of the earliest settlers in the camp, who still lives among us, who, with his brother, Captain George J. Wood, erected the third cabin in the camp, which stood where the Independent office now stands, we have secured a copy of the minutes of the original meeting at which the town was named. There was a scarcity of writing materials in those days, and the minutes were only recorded in pencil in a blank book of Captain Wood's. The meeting was held in the cabin of Mr. Wood and his father-in-law, Orison Miles, of Bozeman. From each of these parties, and others who participated in that original meeting, the writer has heard the same story oft repeated, and the minutes of that meeting were made also by the writer hereof from what were the original documents. Though there is other matter besides that which pertains to the name alone, we will give the whole, for it will possess interest for other reasons.

"'HELENA, October 30, 1864.

"'At a meeting of the citizens of Last Chance Gulch for the purpose of naming the town and electing commissioners, etc., on motion, G. J.

a new trail from Fort Laramie to Virginia City, arriving August 28. After spending the winter in Bannack, they went to the Blackfeet country and kept a boarding-house, in which venture they were very successful. Flour at that time was worth $125 a sack of 100 pounds, but they had brought a large supply of flour with them, and they served meals at $2 each.

In the fall of 1865 Mr. Milligan came to Helena, and took homestead claim to a quarter-section of land, three miles northeast of the city. On this property they at once established their home. They began with very little, their household furniture consisting of a stove, a home-made bedstead, fastened to the side of the log house, and a few tin plates, and tin cups and spoons of the same material. Mrs. Milligan says, in speaking of her early experience here, that she did not see a white woman for five months. She paid $10 in gold for the first pair of chickens she got, the eggs from which she sold for $2.25 per dozen. She received $2 per pound for the butter she made, and paid $9 in gold-dust for a calico dress. Notwithstanding the many privations they endured in their new home, they were happy and prosperous. In 1872 Mr. Milligan added another 160 acres to his farm, all of which he still retains, his principal crops being wheat, oats, peas and barley. His land is well supplied with water, having the first water right. Mr. Milligan was the first farmer in the valley to begin raising alfalfa here, which he is now growing successfully.

This worthy couple have had thirteen children, all born in Montana. It was their misfortune to lose three of their little ones from diphtheria. Nine of their children are now living, a record of whom is as follows: Carrie M., wife of Wallace Evans, resides in Helena; Willard Lewis, on the farm with his father; Hattie Ann, wife of Robert Maccolum, resides in Cascade county, Montana; and Martha E., Robert LeRoy, George W., Cora and Nina,—all at home.

Mr. Milligan is a member of the A. O. U. W., and all his life he has been a Republican in politics. For six years he served as County Commissioner of his county, performing faithful and acceptable service. Was judge of the first election in Colorado, and voted at the first State election of Montana. He is a member of the Baptist Church, as is also his wife. Both are well known and highly esteemed, and they and their family are ranked with the leading people of the community in which they live.

THE BOULDER HOT SPRINGS. In a beautiful locality, surrounded by picturesque scenery, and only two miles from Boulder, these wonderful springs are located. They were discovered in 1863, by James E. Riley, while hunting. Believing he had made a discovery that in some future day would be found to be of great value, he located on the land, where he resided from 1863 until 1882. The great medical properties of the waters of these springs became known long before any move was made toward building the hotel, baths and other appliances for the comfort and treatment of invalids, on the present large scale. After Mr. Riley's death, in 1882, A. C. Quaintance purchased the property, and soon afterward the fine hotel and other improvements which now adorn the property, were built. The hotel was managed for five years by William Trother, a pioneer hotel man of the West, and during that time the intrinsic value and wonderful healing power of the water became more and more evident. In July, 1891, a stock company was organized by many of Boulder's most reliable citizens, to purchase the property and give it the attention which it merited. Messrs. Gaffney, Berendes and Beckwith organized the company and became its stockholders.

The main building, 35x100 feet, is artistic in design, is three stories high, heated throughout by the hot water from the springs, without fuel; has electric communications in every room, and the building is supplied with an adequate number of porcelain baths, a fine plunge bath and laboratories. They have also a fine dining-room, and their table furnishings are unexcelled by any health or pleasure resort. The temperature of the water is

Wood was elected chairman and T. E. Cooper, secretary. After several motions and balloting, the name of Helena was given to the town, and G. J. Wood, H. Bruce, and C. L. Cutler were elected town commissioners, and ordered to lay out the town and get their pay for the work by recording the lots at two dollars each, the proceeds to go to the commissioners for their labor and trouble. They were further authorized to make such laws and regulations as may be deemed necessary, to regulate the location and size of lots, streets, alleys, etc. At a meeting of the commissioners it was decided that the lots should be thirty feet front by sixty feet deep, and that any person might pre-empt a lot by laying a foundation on the lot, which foundation should hold the lot ten days, and if a person record his lot at the time of laying the foundation, then the foundation should hold good for twenty days. And it was decided that if there were no improvements made on the lots at the expiration of the ten or twenty days, the lots should be jumpable; but all persons should record their lots. G. J. Wood was elected recorder of the town. All disputes to be settled by the commissioners or an arbitration, until civil law is established.'

from 125 to 187 degrees. The diseases specially benefited and cured at these springs, are rheumatism, indigestion, kidney diseases, the various skin diseases, hemorrhoids, lead, copper and antimonial poisoning, liver complaints, etc. The following is the analysis of the water: Chloride of sodium, 4.7; sulphate of soda, 4.3; carbonate of soda, 2.6; carbonate of lime, 3.6; sulphur, 4.8; iron, 2.9. The rates of the hotel are from $2 to $3.50 per day, or from $12.50 to $17.50 per week, and special rates are given to families or large parties.

HON. ALFRED CAVE, a Montana pioneer of 1865, now a resident of Missoula and manager of the Missoula City Water Works, was born in Boone county, Missouri, October 5, 1829. He traces his ancestry back to the early settlers of Virginia, in which State his grandfather, Reuben Cave, was born. Reuben Cave emigrated to Kentucky at an early day and was among the brave pioneers of that State, where he was engaged in the manufacture of powder. His son, Richard Cave, was born in Kentucky in 1799, and at the age of twenty years moved to Boone county, Missouri, where he married Miss Colma B. Williams, a native of Franklin county, Kentucky, born in 1803. They became the parents of eight children, all of whom reached adult years, and five are still living. Richard Cave was among the gold-seekers who went to California. After mining for some time he turned his attention to the cattle business in Siskiyou county, was successful in his operations, and in 1859 was killed for his money. His widow survived him several years, living to be seventy-eight.

Alfred Cave, the subject of this sketch, was the fourth child born in the above named family and is now the oldest one living. From his sixth year his early life was spent in Iowa, to which State his parents had moved and where his educational advantages were limited. The schoolhouse in which he conned his lessons was lighted by holes in the roof that also served the purpose of a [illegible]. In 1850 he crossed the plains to California, [illegible] Reading and Ready and on the North [illegible], meeting with only moderate success, and going from there to Trinity county, where he was more fortunate. Later, he was engaged in packing from Big Bar to Humbolt Bay. After this the Salmon river excitement attracted him to that place, and he was there engaged in merchandising and quartz-mining. He was one of a party to locate the Black Bear mine, which subsequently became noted, and of which in 1863 he was superintendent. He sold his interest in it and came to Montana in 1865.

After coming to Montana, Mr. Cave for a time engaged in mining at McClellan Gulch, near Helena, but soon turned his attention to packing, which was then a paying business. He packed all over the Territory of Montana, Idaho and Washington, and British Columbia as well, and camped out the greater portion of the time. In 1870 he located at Cedar Creek, where, in partnership with a Mr. Buck, he did a successful merchandising business for nine years, the firm of Buck & Cave being well known throughout all the mining districts of the Territory. In 1874 he had purchased property in Missoula, and in 1879 he came to this place to live. Since that date he has been identified with the various interests of Missoula and the surrounding country. He was one of the first to set out an orchard here and demonstrated the fact that apples, pears and various other fruits can be successfully raised in this locality. In 1876 Mr. Cave was elected a member of the Montana Legislature, in which capacity he served with credit to himself and his constituents. Since then he has served as Public Administrator of his county, and for six years past has held his present position, that of manager of the water company.

In 1871 Mr. Cave was married to Mrs. C. A. Heckleman, a native of Detroit, Michigan. Her maiden name was Miss Carrie A. Nichol. By her first husband she had one son, William, who has taken Mr. Cave's name.

Mr. Cave has been a Democrat all his life. He belongs to the rank of brave pioneers and has seen and endured many of the hardships and privations on the frontier. In recalling some of his reminiscences, he relates that he has paid as high as $1 for a newspaper and has given $62 for a fifty-pound sack of flour.

F. W. Hoerner

"As Mr. Wood informs us, there were present at the meeting all that the cabin would hold, probably thirty or more, among whom he gives the names of the following, who will all be remembered by the early settlers. Besides Messrs. Wood and Miles, already named, there were Abraham Mast, A. Peck, John Cowan, Robert Stanley, T. E. Cooper, C. L. Cutler, John Clore, Dr. Sales, John Somerville, H. Bruce, — Folsom, — Wilder, O. D. Keep, the 'Michigan Boys,' as they were called—Murray, Marshall and Burke—Henry Sellick, P. B. Anthony, John Scannell, now living in town, with others who came through in Captain Allensworth's train. It will be seen that the date when the meeting was held was October 30, 1864, at which time there were not a great many at the mines, which had only been first discovered by Cowan and Stanley in July. The Woods, who came across in Bridger's train that season, came here in September, and most of the other early residents came in from Minnesota, in the fall of 1864. At that time Silver City was already quite a settlement, and on the other side Montana City, of which only a single house survives, was the chief business center, where Constans & Jurgens had a store before starting the first one in Helena. In regard to the name

HON. NEWTON W. MCCONNELL, of Helena, Montana, was born in Marshall county, Tennessee. He is of Scotch-Irish descent, his ancestors having settled in the South during the early history of this country.

His grandfather, Manuel McConnell, was born in Port Tobacco, Maryland, and from there went to South Carolina, where, at the age of sixteen, he enlisted in the Colonial army, and rendered efficient service throughout the Revolutionary war. He was in the battle of Cowpens and the seige of King's Mountain. By occupation he was a farmer. His religion was that of the Presbyterian faith.

Manuel McConnell reared three sons and five daughters, lived to a ripe old age and died in Marshall county, Tennessee, in 1843.

His second son, whom he named Jeremiah, was born in Georgia in 1798. He was the father of the subject of this sketch. He married Annie Martin, a native of North Carolina. Her grandfather was an Irish gentleman, who was one of the very earliest settlers in the South. Her people on both sides were likewise participants in the struggle for American independence.

The parents of the subject of this sketch both removed to Tennessee when they were small children. They there became acquainted, were married and reared their family of seven children. The father died in the seventy-fourth year of his age. The mother lived to be eighty-four. Both passed away at the old home in Marshall county, Tennessee.

Newton W. McConnell was the third child of this union. He was reared in his native State, and was educated at Alleghany College in Meadville, Pennsylvania. Upon leaving college he turned his attention to teaching. He was principal of the Girard Academy, in Girard, Pennsylvania, for two years. For two years immediately succeeding he was principal of the Hartsville Female College. In the meantime he studied law and began the practice of that profession in Hartsville, where he conducted a successful practice until 1875.

In 1872 he was elected a member of the State Senate of Tennessee, representing the ninth Senatorial district. He served on several committees, notably the Committee on Public Schools. As a member of this committee he championed, and was largely instrumental in securing, the passage of the bill which gave to Tennessee her present splendid school system. The race prejudice had not, at that time, died out, and there was strong opposition to the passage of the bill because it gave to colored children the same rights and opportunities possessed by white children.

In 1874 Judge McConnell was a candidate for Congress before the Democratic convention of the fourth Congressional district of Tennessee. In this convention the two-thirds rule was adopted. He received a large majority of the votes for nearly 200 consecutive ballots, at one time lacking only one-sixth of a vote to secure the nomination. He finally withdrew in the interest of harmony, and the Hon. S. M. Fite, judge of the fifth judicial circuit, was nominated. Thereupon Judge McConnell was appointed by James D. Porter, Governor of the State, to fill the vacancy created by the election of Judge Fite until the next general election. At this election he was chosen, without opposition, to fill the unexpired term of Judge Fite. He was commissioned to this office in April, 1875. At the expiration of the fractional term, to which he had been elected, he was a candidate for re-election, and after one of the most exciting races ever known in that section, he was elected by a large majority for a term of eight years. He remained upon the bench of the fifth judicial circuit of Tennessee until the fall of 1886. In the month of April, 1887, President Cleveland appointed him Chief Justice of Montana. This appointment was without solicitation on the part of Judge McConnell. He tendered his resignation of the Chief Justiceship in December, 1888, but his successor was not appointed until March, 1889, at which time he again entered upon the practice of law as a member of the firm of McConnell, Carter & Clayberg; afterward McConnell & Clayberg, and now McConnell, Clayberg & Gunn.

'Helena,' it will be seen that it was only adopted 'after several motions and ballotings.' It was proposed to call it after Cowan, Stanley and Wood, but neither proposition commanded a majority. Then it was that John Somerville proposed the name of Helena, and, as Mr. Wood remembers, told the company, among other things, that it meant 'a place far in the interior of the country.' At any rate, that was the time, place and manner that the name was selected, and upon the suggestion of John Somerville, a tall, hardy, jovial frontiersman from Minnesota, who had his wife with him. On the discovery of Nelson Gulch, he moved up there and lived until he returned to Minnesota. He was appointed by Governor Edgerton first treasurer of Edgerton county. In this connection, and as a historical fact worth preserving, it may be stated that W. E. Wood was the first person in the camp or in Edgerton county who received a commission as a legal officer. He was appointed notary public in 1864, and had some notarial stamps printed at Virginia City, at a cost of $20 per hundred."

Many and very contradictory are the accounts of the swift current of events, no two testimonies agreeing entirely in dates, names, number of first settlers, and so on, although most of

As he had been one of the ablest judges in the history of the Montana judiciary, so Judge McConnell rapidly established for himself an enviable position at the bar of Helena and the State. Able, alert, fearless and untiring, his genius for mastering details and marshalling facts, and his invariable habit of presenting himself in the forum of legal combat, armed at every point, have given him the reputation of an invincible antagonist.

The force of his splendid eloquence and logic, not less than his ready, profound and intricate knowledge of the law, has swayed the doubtful issue to the side of justice and right in many of the important cases tried in the Montana courts within the past five years,—contests in which not only great property rights and interests were involved, but in which the lives of his clients were at stake. His legal acumen and ability are fortified and embellished by a wide and thorough general knowledge. He possesses rare physical energy, a commanding and conspicuous presence, and a magnanimous nature. Keenly sensible of the ethics of his profession, no man loves the ardor of honorable controversy better than he, and no practitioner at the bar of Montana excells him in unselfish and incorruptible devotion to duty and to the cause of his client.

His personal and professional integrity is irreproachable. He is an honorable opponent, a loyal friend. His manner is frank, cordial and courteous. His active sympathy with every exalted public impulse and purpose can always be relied on. His life is open, clean and elevated; his impulses warm, ardent and generous; his record untarnished, and his character a public inspiration. No man stands higher in the esteem of his fellow-men, and few have unconsciously done more to deserve it.

After years of service on the bench, at a mature age he again took his place in the ranks of the profession, and by his ability, his ripe experience and knowledge and, more than all else, his unconquerable energy, he has achieved lasting and honorable renown as one of the foremost men and lawyers of the Northwest.

Judge McConnell was married, February 26, 1856, to Nannie Elizabeth McCall, a native of Pennsylvania, their acquaintance being formed while he was at college. She is a daughter of Samuel McCall. They have three children, Frank Winston, Odell Whitfield, and Annie Eloise.

While in Tennessee Judge McConnell was an active member of the Masonic fraternity, having been successively Deputy Grand Master, Grand Orator, and a Grand Master of the order in that State. In politics he has always been a Democrat. He joined the Presbyterian Church at the age of seventeen and has continued his membership uninterruptedly to the present time.

HON. GEORGE C. FITSCHEN, another one of the successful business men of Butte City, Montana, is of German nativity and possesses many of the sterling characteristics of his countrymen. For nearly three decades he has been identified with Montana, and as one of her representative pioneer citizens he is justly entitled to some personal mention in this work.

George C. Fitschen was born in Germany, June 22, 1843, of German parents, and in his native land spent his early boyhood days and received good educational advantages. Through the advice of his brother, who was in business in New York city, he, when a boy of fifteen years, set sail for America in the Hamburg steamer, Austria. The passage was not a pleasant one. This fine vessel was burned at sea, and out of her 641 passengers only fifty-six were rescued, Mr. Fitschen being one of them. The date of that disaster was September 13, 1858.

In New York city young Fitschen obtained a clerkship in a store, at $5 per month and board, and continued thus occupied for two or three years. During this time he attended night school in order to learn the English language, and he also took a business-college course at night.

In 1861, with a desire to see the Golden State, he made the voyage by way of the isthmus of Panama to San Francisco, landing there in April. He at once procured a sit-them made their claims on the spot, and even participated in the tumultuous scenes they relate. How, then, shall a stranger tell exactly what transpired when eye-and-ear witnesses so singularly fail to agree upon a verdict as to this fact or that? It seems the best I can do is to fall back upon that ponderous book, which is said to be as nearly correct as it is possible to be, "Leeson's History of Montana." I here quote his selection from the reminiscences of R. Stanley, in the Helena Herald of 1882, supplemented by the historian's own observations:

"In July, 1864, mining was commenced on the bar, on the west side of the gulch, nearly opposite where Taylor & Thompson's store stood in 1867, and the five men who worked there made each a fortune of $50,000 in two years. The first cabin, of one room, was erected in the middle of September, 1864, in the rear of the site of the St. Louis drug store, subsequently opened by John S. Cowan. The second cabin was built above it by Reginald (Bob) Stanley, and the third by G. J. Wood, where Gans & Klien built their stone warehouse. By October 1, 1864, there were five cabins in the town. About this time Capt. James L. Fisk's party or Minnesota train arrived in the Prickly Pear valley, also Capt. Holmes' party. Capt.

nation in a store and was employed in that city for two years. Then he sought the gold diggings in Calaveras county, where for some years he mined, meeting with only moderate success, however.

In 1866 he came to Montana, arriving here on the 9th of June. At German Gulch he engaged in mining and butchering until 1870, and during the four years he was located at that place he was prosperous in his undertakings. He then became largely interested in buying and selling stock, going down into Texas and buying and bringing a large band of cattle to Montana and selling the same here at a good profit. In 1877 he turned his attention to the mercantile business in Butte City, and, in partnership with H. C. Weehbald, for some years did a large wholesale and retail business, carrying all kinds of goods from a shingle nail to a silk dress, their store being located on Main street where the capitol building now stands. Theirs was the first general store in Butte City. In 1876 Mr. Fitschen went back to California on a prospecting and speculating tour, and two years later returned to Butte City. He then gave his attention to prospecting and mining in Montana, and still continues in this business. He is also largely interested in stock-raising and ranching. He now owns a valuable meadow farm at Steward. During his mining career he has owned several very valuable properties, among which may be mentioned the Elm Erloo, which he sold to W. A. Clark and from which has since been taken more than three fourths of a million dollars. He was also the owner of the Gold Hill mine. This property he recently sold for $55,000. Another valuable mine he once owned was the Self-Rising, which is now the property of the Colorado & Montana Mining Company. In Jefferson county Mr. Fitschen has several mines, one of which, the Custar No. 2, is considered very valuable. He has refused $60,000 in cash for this mine.

While he has had, and still has, large holdings in various parts of Montana, it is in Butte City where Mr. Fitschen's chief interests are centered. In 1890 he erected the Exchange Block at No. 17 South Main street. This building is 27 x 100 feet, has four stories and a basement, and is one of the finest and most artistic buildings in the city. He also owns numerous other buildings in Butte. He was a member of the first electric-light company organized here, and he has given his support to many of the leading enterprises which have brought about the development of this city and county.

Politically, Mr. Fitschen is a Democrat. From 1873 until 1875 he served as Deputy Sheriff of Silver Bow county. In 1892 he had the honor of being elected by his party to the State Legislature of Montana, and while holding a seat in that honorable body he introduced a number of bills which he believed to be of value to his county and the State at large.

October 19, 1876, Mr. Fitschen married Miss Ida B. Pfeifer, a native of Iowa. Their only child, a son, died at the age of six years.

Fraternally, Mr. Fitschen is a member of the K. of P., and the A. O. U. W. He is Past Chancellor of the first named organization.

JOHN S. TRUSCOTT.—This gentleman is a conspicuous illustration of the possibilities of the great West, and what pluck and perseverance will accomplish.

He was born in the State of Connecticut, in 1858, a son of Samuel Truscott, who was a Cornish miner and captain of mines, and who prospected and opened many mines in the White mountains.

Young John grew up to be a machinist and steam engineer, engaging in that business in New Hampshire, Pennsylvania and New York.

He entered the United States Army, Fifth Infantry, General Nelson A. Miles' regiment, Company C, in the spring of 1879, and served in all the Western campaigns for five years, participating in the capture of the Indian chief, Gaul, on Poplar river. He was a non-commissioned officer. During his term of service in the army his leisure time was occupied with books; and when he left the army he had a practical education and was a competent bookkeeper.

G. J. Wood induced a number of both parties to stay at Last Chance, and many of those who went into the Prickly Pear returned shortly to this point. In October, 1864, the first election of members of the legislature was held here, when 200 votes were cast. Capt. G. J. Wood discovered the minutes of the miners' meeting, held at Last Chance Gulch. October 30, 1864, Mr. Wood was chairman, and T. E. Cooper secretary. Three commissioners—Capt. Wood, H. Bruce and C. L. Cutler, were chosen to lay out the town, and adopt rules respecting pre-emption and occupancy. During the following winter there were 115 cabins erected in the gulch, and in February, 1865, Scott's addition to the town plat was surveyed east of Main, north of Broadway, and extending beyond Rodney streets.

"Second Meeting.*—A meeting was held within the cabin of George J. Wood, October 30, 1864, for the purpose of appointing commissioners to lay out a town, as well as to adopt a name for the settlement. The light-hearted disposition of the meeting is evidenced by the propositions then made to name the location. Punkinville, Squashtown, Tomahawk, Tomah, and sundry other mirth-provoking titles were suggested; but at length the name St.

After his term of service expired he engaged in the bakery business in Miles City, in which enterprise he lost all he invested. In July, 1887, he, in partnership with one Berkil, engaged in a general merchandising business in Miles City. They started with less than $1,000. At times they were in debt as much as $35,000. Mr. Truscott was the business manager of the firm, as his partner was an invalid. In 1892 they shipped 213,000 pounds of wool, and on July 1st of that year sold their mercantile interest, having made $40,000 while engaged in the business. In 1891 Mr. Truscott invested in sheep. His ranch is thirty-five miles north of Miles City, where he now has 6,000 sheep. He also represents an Eastern wool commission house, for whom he buys and ships large quantities of wool. He also deals in real estate. His residence is on Tenth street, Miles City. He is a member of Yellowstone Lodge, No. 26, A. F. & A. M., Miles City, being Junior Warden of the lodge; also a member of Crusade Lodge, No. 7, K. of P.

He was married in 1885 to Miss Delia A. Jordan, a daughter of Michael and Elizabeth Jordan of Scranton, Pennsylvania. They have four sons,—William, Albert, Guy and Harry. His wife is a member of the Catholic Church. Politically, Mr. Truscott is a Democrat. He has been Alderman of the Second Ward, being the first elected under the Australian system in Montana. He is favorably known as a genial, social gentleman.

JOSEPH D. CONRAD, Postmaster of Marysville, and one of its highly respected early settlers, was born in Indiana, October 2, 1842. His father, Joseph Conrad, was born in Pennsylvania in 1801. He married Miss Lucy Griffin, a native of Ireland, who removed to Pennsylvania when eleven years of age. They had ten children, five of whom still survive. The father, a railroad contractor by occupation, died in Indiana, at the age of seventy-five years, and his wife died a short time previous to his death.

Joseph D. Conrad, the second child in order of birth in the above family, spent his early life in his native State. In 1865 he came to Montana. He crossed the plains from Leavenworth, Kansas, and arrived in Virginia City October 18, 1865, 180 days having been consumed in the journey. The party consisted of eighty-seven men and five women. While camped on the Platte river they were attacked by 125 Sioux Indians, who withdrew after five of their number had been killed. Mr. Conrad arrived in Virginia City a poor boy, and his first experience in mining was at Helena, in 1867, but in the fall of the same year he took a claim at Independent Gulch. In the following fall he returned to Helena, leased a claim and mined during the winter with fair success, in 1868 went to New York Gulch, but after working there eleven months lost all his previous earnings. Mr. Conrad then mined at the lower end of the gulch, and during the year 1869 took out large quantities of gold. During the following year he mined at Oregon Gulch, but met with poor success; next accepted the position of clerk in the store of E. Ingersoll at Cave Gulch; while there he purchased an interest in a prospect, and after spending $4,300 on the same it proved a failure. From that time

*The account of the naming of the city of Helena, as given by Thomas E. Cooper, of Grafton, Dakota, is as follows: "Thomas Cowan, from Georgia, in 1864, had a sluice, and was mining in Last Chance. On September 24, 1864, Mr. Cooper and company of prospectors and Captain Wood built a cabin, where the heart of the city now is. A meeting was called to organize the mining district, and John Somerville was chosen chairman, and Thomas E Cooper, secretary. The question of naming the town came up, and there being a great diversity of opinion as to the name the town should bear, and not being able to agree, the chairman, Mr. Somerville, got up and stated as follows: 'That he belonged to the best country in the world, and lived in the best State in that country, and in the best county (Scott) of that State, and the best town (Helena) in that county, and by the eternal this town shall bear that name.'"—Letter to J. H. Mills, June, 1885.

Helena was proposed by John Somerville, and to this and Tomah the meeting confined its attention, the proposition of Somerville, in its amended form, Helena, being carried by one or two votes. John Somerville is numbered among the dead; John Cowan, a native of Georgia, returned thither; but after a few years revisited the West, and was one of the pioneers of the Black Hills. D. J. Miller, a California miner of 1850 or 1851, was one of the four who discovered Last Chance. He went to Philadelphia with John Dempsey, and is now a citizen of Alabama. John Crab, the fourth of the party, sold his interest in Last Chance and took up a claim in Nelson Gulch, which proving unprofitable, he left for the East the following winter."

In the vicinity of Last Chance Gulch the Cowan party drifted about, hunting, fishing, doing what they best could to find gold "a little further on," and at the same time keep body and soul together with rod and gun.

In the early fall, finding nothing better, they returned to the site of Helena, thinking this their last chance to make bread for the coming winter. They spoke of the place as the last chance; hence the name Last Chance Gulch. The party consisted of twenty-five, when all until 1876 our subject was employed in the store of Court Sheriff, and since 1879 has been a resident of Marysville. The place at that time contained two houses, which were occupied by T. A. Lightbody and S. F. Ralson. Mr. Conrad embarked in the general mercantile business, and has been one of the factors in the building of the town. He has built a good residence in this city, and is interested in mines in the Cruse Hill, which are the richest in the State of Montana.

October 3, 1874, in Helena, Mr. Conrad was united in marriage with Miss Kate Miller, a native of Iowa, who came to Montana in 1874. They have three children,—Eddie, Lillian and Ralph. The two eldest were born at Cave Gulch, and the youngest in Marysville. Mr. Conrad and his accomplished daughter conduct the post-office at Marysville in a very efficient and accommodating manner, giving good satisfaction to the department and to the patrons of the office. Our subject was prominent in the organization of the A. O. U. W. at Marysville, and they now have one of largest and best lodges in the State. He is a Past Master of the order, and has been three times the Representative to the Grand Lodge. He is also a charter member of the K. of P. In political matters, Mr. Conrad votes with the Democratic party. Having resided in Montana since 1865, he has witnessed the great growth and development that has come to the State of his choice, and naturally takes a deep interest in every enterprise for the benefit of his community.

GEORGE W. MYERS, attorney at law, Miles City, is a lineal descendant of John Paul Jones. His grandmother was Polly Paul, a relative of John Paul, who later added Jones to his name: hence John Paul Jones.

Mr. Myers was born in Andrew county, Missouri, March 1, 1851, a son of Ephraim and Nancy (Williams) Myers. His father's mother was a Paul, born in Virginia, and lived to the age of 103 years. Our subject's mother was born and reared near Lexington, Kentucky. His father was a native of Virginia, an early settler in Missouri, and was Judge of his district many years, and represented his county in both the Senate and House of the State General Assembly. George W. was educated at public schools and at the State Normal School, at Kirksville, Missouri, and took a special course in law at the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, under the noted Thomas M. Cooley; was admitted to the bar at Savannah, Missouri, in Judge Kelly's court, in 1875, where he practiced four years. His first case was a replevin suit. The counsel opposing was the present Governor of Illinois, John P. Altgeld, who started in the law profession at the same time and place as Mr. Myers. In this case Altgeld was defeated.

Mr. Myers came to Bozeman, Montana, in 1879, where he resided a year, and to Miles City in 1880, when he engaged in the live-stock business,—sheep and cattle,—which he continued until 1888, when he again entered the law practice. He has a good business, being still largely interested, however, in stock and ranch property.

He was married September 6, 1877, in Wichita, Kansas, to Miss Mary Elberta Bowman, daughter of Frank and Francis (Wood) Bowman. Her mother was a descendant of the famous Wood family, of Luray, Virginia, and relative of General Robert E. Lee. Her father was a prominent land-owner, and her uncles are physicians, lawyers, and ministers. Mr. Myers and wife have two children living,—Mildred G. and Alma May. The second born was a son, Alfred, who died in infancy. Mr. Myers is a member of Crusade Lodge, No. 7, K. of P., at Miles City, and he is master of the work. In political matters he is a Democrat, but conservative. Mrs. Myers, in religion, is a Presbyterian.

DAVID R. PEELER, one of the representative business men of Marysville, was born in Missouri, June 15, 1853, and is of Pennsylvania Dutch extraction, his ancestors having settled in that State before the Revolution. His grandfather, David Peeler, moved to Missouri in 1817, and continued to reside in that State until his death, which together discussing the Indian depredations that continually surrounded them, but that was only in times of threatened attack. Cowan had but four men with him when he really "struck it."

Some emigrants on their way to Alder Creek stopped at this their first mining camp in the latter part of September and went into winter quarters; but, strange as it may seem, the miners who were working what is now the streets of the richest city on the globe, did not know anything about what wealth lay in the deep placers which they had taken possession of, till the next year. This was because of the great depth of the new mines.

Then Grizzly Gulch, Dry Gulch, and other neighboring camps, broke with dazzling splendor on the vision of Uncle John Cowan, of Georgia, and Last Chance gradually became almost as famous as Alder Creek. Meantime, Barber had discovered Silver Bow, some Germans had opened German Gulch, and now the placer gold fields of Montana were all being tilled at once.

The great depth of the bed-rock all along the eighteen or twenty miles of Alder Creek had completed an array of derricks for lifting drift nearly the entire length of the mines. Each derrick had a tall shaft or beam like the mast occurred in the ninety third year of his age. The father of our subject, Alfred Peeler, the eldest in his father's family, was born in Missouri, in 1822. He married Miss Sally Williams, a native of Kentucky, who descended from one of the oldest families in that State. They had seven children, five of whom still survive. The father died at the age of forty-six years, and the mother is still living, aged sixty-five years.

David R. Peeler, the subject of this sketch and the eldest child in his father's family, grew to manhood in his native State. In 1873 he went to California, and at Virginia City, Nevada, began his life work,—mining, milling and assaying. He was employed for a time at Bodie, California, and from there, in 1883, came to Marysville, Montana. Mr. Peeler was induced to come to this State by the Montana Mining Company, to take charge of the milling and assaying of the Great Drum Lummon Mine, and since that time has been constantly at his post of duty, rendering the company much valuable and reliable service. He has been superintendent of the mills continually for nine years, is also an expert assayer, and it is his duty to sample the ore that the mill is working every hour and assay it every twenty-four hours. On arriving here it was a ten-stamp mill, but they now operate 110 stamps, and since Mr. Peeler's connection with the mine it is safe to say that thirteen millions of dollars in gold and silver have been taken out. The gold is sold at the United States Assay office at Helena, and the silver is sold to a refinery in New Jersey.

Mr. Peeler was married October 24, 1888, at Salt Lake City, to Miss Mary J. Winston, a native of Nebraska, but came with her father, P. J. Winston, to Montana in 1865. They have two daughters,—Sadie M. and Lillian. In his social relations, Mr. Peeler is a member of the A. O. U. W. and of the K. of P., and politically is identified with the Democratic party. The family are highly esteemed in Marysville as people of refinement and high integrity of character.

HON. JOSEPH E. MARION, of Frenchtown, is one of Montana's prominent pioneers, the date of his arrival in the Territory being 1861.

Mr. Marion was born in Contrecœur, county of Vercheres, province of Quebec, Canada, June 1, 1842, a descendant of French ancestry. His father, Amable Marion was a patriot of 1838, and the hardships he endured at that time finally resulted in his death, which occurred in his thirty-third year. He had been a merchant, and had married Miss Catharine Deschamps, by whom he had four children. Three of this number are still living. One son is a practicing physician of Seattle, Washington, and a daughter resides in Montreal. The widowed mother survived her husband a number of years, her death occuring at the age of sixty-six years.

Joseph E. Marion received his education at St. Mary's College, Montreal. When he was eighteen years of age he went to St. Louis, Missouri, and in the spring of 1861 hired to the American Fur Company, and was engaged to come to Fort Benton, his journey hither being made up the Missouri river and on board the Chippewa. Before they reached their destination, however, the Chippewa took fire and was burned up. Twelve of the men on board were selected to go on foot to Fort Benton and secure conveyances for the rest of the passengers and the cargo. Mr. Marion was one of the twelve. This mission they successfully accomplished. Mr. Marion remained at Fort Benton that winter, sawing lumber and making boats, with which they took the furs down to Fort Union. From that place he and a number of others returned by steamer to St. Louis.

In 1865 he crossed the plains to Montana, landing at Virginia City, and there prospecting and mining until 1869. That year he went to the Kootenay mines, in the British possessions, where, however, he remained only a month. Coming back to Montana, he arrived at Frenchtown in May, 1869, and soon afterward heard of the mines at Moose creek, Idaho, to which place he directed his course, and where he mined during the most of the sum-of a ship, and then a bowsprit; ropes and chains and clamps and stays. Denuded of alder trees and all sorts of verdure, the whole line and reach of mines looked like a line of schooners becalmed and only waiting for wind to hoist sail and blow away. Then the ten thousand miners down in the deep and warm pits! The clang and bang of sledge and pick and crowbar, the shouts of the men who filled the tubs calling to the engineers on the derricks; the cries of wild delight away down there as they "creviced" the golden dust from the blue and streaming bed rock! All this was now re-enacted at Last Chance, partly transferred to Last Chance in truth, gradually.

The "tenderfeet" now come climbing up the mountains from the Missouri States, weary, worn, but eager to go to work. But mining, plain mining especially, like all sorts of gold and silver mining, is one of the fine arts. The ablest man in strength and willingness to swing a pick or push the blade of a steel shovel through the ground, is simply in the way down in a pit among men who have served an apprenticeship.

With all Montana tearing away at all her placer fields at once, no wonder that gold poured out and down the yellow Missouri like water. I find it set down on good authority

mer. In the fall he returned to Frenchtown. Deciding to locate permanently in Montana, he wrote to his wife to join him here She accordingly came West; they met at Helena, and from there came to Frenchtown, where they arrived in October, and where they built a house and opened a hotel. In the latter part of November, gold was discovered at Cedar creek. With a party of twenty-five he went to that place, secured a claim and mined successfully until the fall of 1870. While at Cedar creek he was elected and served as Recorder. Disposing of his claim, he returned to his home at Frenchtown, and for some time was interested in various enterprises, including the stock business, in which he was quite successful. In 1872 he was elected Sheriff of Missoula county, in which position he served during the years 1872-3-4. At that time there was much lawlessness in the county, and his duties as Sheriff were frequently attended with great danger. On one occasion, while trying to prevent the escape of a prisoner, Mr. Marion was shot through the arm, and carried the ball for eighteen years. While he was Sheriff, and for several years thereafter, he continued his stock business. From 1877 until 1881 he had a store at Nine Mile, and, after selling it the latter year, he opened his mercantile business at Frenchtown, which he still conducts. In the spring of 1893, he built a brick block, 30 x 100 feet, into which he moved his stock of goods, and where he is doing a thriving business. His whole business career has been attended with success.

During the greater part of his life in Montana, Mr. Marion has occupied some public position. His connection with the Recorder's and Sheriff's offices have already been referred to. In 1879 he was elected a member of the Territorial Legislature, and served two years. In the fall of 1882 he was elected County Commissioner, and in that office he remained four years. He was elected a member of the constitutional convention in 1889, and in the fall of that same year was again selected as County Commissioner; has since been re-elected, and is now serving in his fourth year, having the honor during these four years of being Chairman of the Board. In 1890 Governor Toole appointed Mr. Marion a member of the National Guards of Montana, making him a member of his staff, with the title Brigadier-General. We are without fear of being disputed when we state that Mr. Marion is one of the most influential men in Missoula county.

Of his private life, we record that his first marriage occurred in St. Hyacinthe, Canada, October 24, 1864, the lady of his choice being Miss Marie Louise Josephine Dufresne. She joined him in his pioneer home in Montana, shared with him many of the privations and hardships of frontier life, and lived to enjoy the prosperity which came to them in later years. Her death occurred September 27, 1887. She left seven children,—Emma, Ida, Joseph, Albert, Willie, Anna and Aime. Emma is now the wife of Mr. C. McGowan, of Flat-Head county. Ida is now the wife of D. T. Curran, of Missoula. In March, 1891, Mr. Marion wedded Mrs. Maria Zelia Morin. She had a daughter, Regina, by her former husband, and by Mr. Marion she has two children, Alfred and Jean Baptiste.

Mr. Marion's political affiliations are with the Democratic party.

FRANK J. NESBITT, the obliging Postmaster of Bozeman, Montana, was born in Ontario, Canada, in 1854, son of James Nesbitt, a manufacturer of candles, soap, etc., of Ontario.

Frank J. received his education in a collegiate institute, in Ottawa, Canada, and in 1880 he came to the United States, locating in Kansas City, where he was in the employ of the Chicago Lumber Company for three years. He came to Bozeman, Montana, in 1882, and was at first employed as manager in the lumber business for Lyndc & Company, at Salesville, who furnished the lumber, building material, etc., to the Montana division of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. He was at the head of their business here for about eight years. The company was then merged into the Gallatin Mill Com-that a single shipment down the river from Fort Benton about this date amounted to the enormous figure of $30,000. Meantime, the silver mines were also tapped, and men from the quartz caverns and tunnels of California and Nevada now came to the front and began to burrow into the very heart of Montana hills. Gold now flowed in such a stream that for the first time in the history of Montana we can begin to note and estimate its annual product. Of course there is no absolute authority at this date, 1865, for saying exactly what Montana gave during that year to the commerce of the world, but $20,000,000 is as near to the figure as I shall venture, though it has been placed very much higher, and some have set it as low as $18,000,000.

The first magistrate appointed by Governor Edgerton, in 1865, was named Miles, and he performed the first marriage in Helena. May, same year, preachers came to Helena, as well as to Bannack, Butte, Virginia City, and other camps, with the people, and were of the people from the very first. Father Taylor, now bishop of Africa, came to the camps of California the first year gold was found. In truth, I never saw a mining camp without preachers and preaching on Sundays. The first Methodist pany, of which he became a stockholder and of which he was chosen secretary and treasurer. Their mills are located at Salesville, twelve miles west of Bozeman and on the west Gallatin river, where their average yearly product is 1,500,000 feet. They also handle large quantities of lumber cut by other mills. Mr. Nesbitt still retains his stock and official position in this enterprise. He was appointed Postmaster at Bozeman, under President Harrison's administration, in March, 1892.

In 1885 Mr. Nesbitt married Miss Lida E. Rogers, daughter of Edward and Christina Rogers, of Mt. Vernon, Ohio, her father being a merchant of that city. Mr. and Mrs. Nesbitt have had two children, the elder of whom, Lida Marguerite, is living; the other died in infancy. A son was born August 11, 1894. Mrs. Nesbitt died August 16, 1894. He and his wife are both members of the Presbyterian Church, in which he is a Deacon, and he is also a member of the Independent Order of Foresters.

PROF. H. C. OSTIEN.—The State of Ohio asserts herself even in the heart of the Rocky mountains by sending her sons and daughters from home educational centers to fill up the professional ranks in this almost boundless West. Professor Ostien, principal of the city schools of Livingston, is one of these Ohio men who is occupying a prominent and useful position in Montana. Of his life we present the following resume:

H. C. Ostien was born near Tiffin, in Seneca county, Ohio, in the year 1860, son of William and Matilda (Schuler) Ostien. His mother's people settled in northwestern Ohio in 1832, and the following year the Ostiens took up their abode in Wayne county, Ohio; but in 1840 removed to Tiffin, where William Ostien was engaged in agricultural pursuits. The Ostiens are descendants of [illegible] ancestry.

[illegible] subject of our sketch attended the public schools near Tiffin in his early boyhood, and was afterward a [illegible] the Educational Institute at Tiffin, as also [illegible] educational institutions of the State. He graduated in both the scientific and classical courses at the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio. After his graduation he taught school for some time in Seneca county; in 1886–7 he was principal of an academy at Bartlett, Washington county, Ohio; was for four years superintendent of city schools in Neligh, Nebraska; and since 1891 has been a resident of Livingston, Montana. Upon his arrival here he at once accepted the position of principal of city schools, in which he has since served most acceptably. Under his efficient management the educational interests of the city have made rapid strides in advancement. The city has three commodious school buildings, employs ten lady teachers, and the number of pupils enrolled is 540. The first class that graduated here was in June, 1893.

Professor Ostien is a member of Modoc Lodge, No. 109, Neligh, Nebraska, in which he passed all the chairs. He affiliates with the Democratic party and takes a commendable interest in public affairs, but is not an active politician.

MRS. MARTHA J. CRAMPTON, Superintendent of Schools of Yellowstone county, Montana, is a resident of Billings. This estimable and accomplished lady is filling a position the second term, for the duties of which she is eminently fitted. She was first elected to the office by the Republicans when the State was admitted into the Union. Her duties as County Superintendent were so well performed that the Democrats were quick to nominate her for re-election, and really all were so well pleased with her management of the educational affairs of the county that she was re-elected in 1892 by a good majority. At the time she assumed charge of the office there were twelve school districts in the county, and during her administration that number has increased to twenty-seven, and at this writing there is one other application for a district. The number of school districts has not only been increased, but also the schools have in every way been placed on a better footing; new buildings erected and nicely furnished sermon in the Montana mines was by a Coloma man at Bannack. Night schools and debating societies early had place in the mines; and books of a good character, brought into the mines by army officers and heads of trading and trapping posts, and left behind on going away, were not nearly so scarce as is generally believed; so that, with no theatre, no lighted city to walk in, the miner read much. His mind was not distracted, his conscience was as clear as a bell; he had contributed to the commerce and wealth of the world. That day he had made money for himself, perhaps—possibly much money that day,—but he had taken it from no man either by fraud or fine persuasion in the way of commissions, and so he read much and he remembered much.

As Helena rose in the scale of population—about 10,000 at this date—Virginia City (Alder Gulch) declined by degrees from the 14,000 to near half that number. Such are the fluctuating fortunes of newly-found mining countries; and such are the difficulties of the historian along these lines. For what would be the exact truth, statistically speaking, to-day, would not be nearly the truth to-morrow.

The winter of 1865-6 introduced one of those wild "stampedes" not infrequent with and various other improvements made. On her visits to the schools throughout the county, Mrs. Crampton frequently drives from sixty to seventy miles. She has an able corps of teachers. Their annual institute held at Billings, in October, 1893, was well attended and was ably conducted by Mrs. Crampton, assisted by Professor Emery, principal of the schools at Billings.

Mrs. Crampton was born in Utica, New York, where she spent the first seventeen years of her life. From Utica the family removed to Brooklyn. Her parents, John D. and Anna (Morris) Jones, were born in Wales. Her father is now nearly eighty years of age. Her mother died at the age of fifty-seven. Mrs. Crampton received a college education in her native town, and after completing her course spent a few months in teaching. Teaching, however, was too confining for her and was not congenial to her taste, and she retired from the school-room. She was married in 1875 to Robert Crampton, of New York city, their union resulting in the birth of three children, two of whom are living,—Love and William Herbert. Their son Harry died when in his fifteenth year.

Mrs. Crampton, while residing on a ranch and performing all the duties of caring for her house, personally educated her children; and when she assumed the duties of County School Superintendent her children were as well advanced as those of like age who had regularly attended school. She came to Montana in 1883 with impaired health, but has now regained her strength and vigor. She is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Crampton is affiliated with the A. O. U. W. Politically he is independent.

ANGUS BROWN, master mechanic in the shops of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company at Livingston, Montana, is master of his trade in the fullest sense of the term, and is also master of public issues. His well-poised intellect and determined energies are such that had he turned his attention to politics or to any other field of labor he would have made a success. In the special line he has chosen to follow he has proved himself equal to all occasions, and among the prominent young men of the great Northwest he occupies an enviable position. Of his life we make record as follows:

Angus Brown was born in Bradford, Simcoe county, Ontario, Canada, in 1865, son of Archibald Brown, a noted carriage manufacturer of that place. After receiving a common-school education, young Brown was apprenticed by his father to learn the trade of machinist of a manufacturer in Woodbridge, Ontario, by the name of John Able. The contract of apprenticeship was as explicit and binding as is a deed to property in the United States. The article signed by his father reads that "Angus Brown shall serve five years at the machinist's trade. The first year he is to receive $124, the second year $144, third year $164, fourth year $184, and fifth year $204. All lost time to be made good; $2 to be received each week during the year; balance to be paid at end of each year." He was further bound not to indulge in strong drink and not to frequent saloons.

In 1880, soon after mastering his trade, Mr. Brown came to the United States and was employed at Montague, Michigan, in the Hendrick & Wilson Contract Machine Works. Later he was employed by the Chicago & West Michigan Railroad Company, at Muskegon, Michigan, and from there went to Minneapolis, Minnesota, and entered the employ of the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad Company, remaining with that company fifteen months. He then returned to Ontario and worked a short time for John Able, his old employer. His sojourn in the United States, however, with their great resources and vast possibilities for a young man, had greatly impressed him, and he accordingly came back to Minnesota, and at Brainard accepted a position as machinist for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. Not long afterward he was offered a position at Winnipeg, by the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company, which he accepted; gold-hunters. They are ever on the alert, and their vivid imaginations, long fed on excitement, lead them often into the very jaws of death. This was called the "Sun River stampede." Numbers perished in the snow and a greater number were made permanent cripples from exposure.

The gold yield of 1866 is set down variously at from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000.

The last, and yet you may now say the first, of the Pleiades is Butte, in Silver Bow, the smallest county in Montana, yet the richest, paying taxes on more than $5,000,000 worth of property.

The story of Butte, so named from nature, as were nearly all other camps founded by the Saxon with his swift sabre cuts of short speech, is a drama of many acts. First came the two Elser brothers, Budd Barber and a Mr. Allison, from Alder Creek, early in the summer of 1864. They found fair placer mines and set to work near the pretty river bend of Silver Bow; then one of the party went back to Alder Creek for supplies, and, strange as it may seem, there were plenty of men ready to leave a place that was literally paved with gold to go with the new departure.*

I had a younger brother who was one of but upon his arrival there he found an unpleasant labor trouble existing, and not wishing to become complicated with it he returned to Brainard, Minnesota, and in March, 1882, again entered the employ of the Northern Pacific, in whose employ he has remained up to the present time. He was foreman of the Brainard shops from 1884 to to 1886 inclusive. Then he was promoted to the position of master mechanic of the Yellowstone division, with headquarters at Glendive, Montana. He succeeded James McNaughton as master mechanic at the Livingston shops in June, 1890. He has charge of the Yellowstone and Montana divisions and branches, extending from Glendive on the east to Helena on the west, with 800 miles of road including branches, and has 400 men under his jurisdiction.

In connection with the sketch of Mr. Brown's life we make reference to some of his relatives, of whom he should be justly proud. His father's cousin, Archibald Kirkland, M. D., was a prominent man in Ontario politics on the Conservative side, and represented Simcoe county in the legislature for six years. Archibald McMurchy, a brother of Mr. Brown's mother, is a prominent educator, having occupied the position of principal of the Toronto College Institute for a period of twenty-eight years. Professor McMurchy has two sons who are prominent lawyers in Toronto.

In his religious affiliations Mr. Brown is a Presbyterian. Politically he is a Republican, and is a man who is destined to become prominent in public life when his true value is known. During the presidential campaign of 1892 he surprised an audience at Livingston, that for the first time heard him deliver a speech, which, it is said by his political opponents, was a masterpiece of reasoning supported by incontrovertible facts. He is unassuming and never seeks notoriety, but is just such a man as the people should call to represent them. Without [illegible] he will [illegible] occupy a high place in the [illegible] people.

Much more might be said of the life of this interprising young man, but enough has already been given to serve as an index to his character and to place him where he truly belongs, among the foremost citizens of this part of Montana.

*In 1865-6 the first book was published in Montana, by one of its first citizens, Granville Stuart. It was called "Montana As It Is," and aside from its historical importance, already certified to by my generous pilfering from its pages, it contained later a Snake and Chinook Jargon dictionary. As the book is out of print, and as the Chinook is no longer in use, I am tempted to quote a page of this compound or made language. I do not know when it was first used. I first used it in 1852. Stuart in his preface says:

"The 'Jargon' so much in use all over the North Pacific coast among both whites and Indians, as a verbal medium of communicating with each other, was originally invented by the 'Hudson Bay Company,' in order to facilitate the progress of their commerce with Indians, of which there are more than fifty tribes in Oregon and Washington, and as many more in British Columbia; and while there is general similarity of language among them, leading one to suppose that at some remote period they all talked one tongue, yet each tribe has at this time a dialect of its own, differing in many respects from all the others; and as it was impossible for the traders to learn all the languages, and yet it was necessary to have some medium of conversing with each tribe, the 'Chinook Jargon' was gradually formed and introduced among them, and is now universally used by all these tribes in their intercourse with the whites.

"The 'Jargon' is founded on the language of the Chinook Indians, and the bulk of it is composed of words from their dialect, to which is added a great many French words, and a few English ones; there is, besides, a great many Nez Perce words, and a few from many of the other tribes."

the early owners of a claim on Alder creek; but he decided that the mines were too deep to pay for working, having taken lessons in mining mainly in the shallow placers of Florence; and so he gave up his Alder Creek claim for a song, returned to Eugene, Oregon, to try and bid his parents good-by, and follow my elder brother away to the Civil war. Such were the uncertainties attending mining in the early days in Montana, and such was the incapacity of the gold miners to look below the surface. At the same time it should be conceded that this boy brother was, perhaps, carried away by the excitement of war. He never went, and the other brother came back to us. His old partner, Pleas. Johnston, long Wells-Fargo's agent in this region, speaks nobly of him in a publication which I have used in a preceding note; but Johnston is in error when he says he was killed at Gettysburg. He survived his injuries in the war, and died in my arms at Easton, Pennsylvania, where I buried this gentlest man I ever knew.

Allison and his partner stand credited on the books of the Historical Society of Montana with having first set eyes on this last yet first of the seven stars of gold. These two men were the first inhabitants of Butte. They mined entirely on the surface, having no more idea of the millions beneath than had poor old Comstock the first year that he spent in Nevada digging for gold and tracing it down into the bed-rock till it turned to silver.

I take the following from page 120 of Mr. Stuart's book. Let it not be entirely despised, for the time was, and not so long ago, when every man, woman and child, red, black or white, in Montana, knew and talked this "Jargon."

But a tradition is preserved, and is fully credited by the conservative and exact Historical Society, that Mr. C. E. Irvine, who pioneered that region in 1856, at the head of a party, saw unmistakable signs of pre-historic quartz mining on what is now called the Original lode, consisting of a hole in the rotting quartz as deep as a man's length with elk-horn gods and other mining signs lying about. But of this first act in the great historical drama of picturesque and beautiful Butte we shall never know anything more, perhaps.

The old California merchants now in Montana were loth to find fault with the gold dust, for it did not vary greatly in its value from one end of California to the other; but here in Montana it was found that while gold in one gulch might mint as high as $20 per ounce, another gulch might yield gold dust that would mint only three-quarters as fine. This kept open the door of frauds and impositions; and as dust grew more scarce and the merchants had smaller margins, they met at Helena and passed the following resolutions, in February, 1867;

WILLIAM COLEMAN, the representative pioneer merchant of Deer Lodge, came to Montana in 1866 and for nearly three decades has been identified with its interests. Before settling down as a merchant he prospected and mined in the various mining sections of the Territory, and has ever since been more or less interested in mining operations. His business career has brought him into contact with all classes of people of the Northwest, and, indeed, there are few men here who are more familiar with every phase of life from the early mining days on down to the present time, than is William Coleman. A sketch of his life will be one of interest to many.

William Coleman was born in Germantown, Montgomery county, Ohio, January, 25, 1847. He is a descendant of German ancestors who were early settlers of Virginia and removed from there to Pennsylvania and finally to Ohio. In Ohio his grandfather, George Coleman, was born. He cleared up a farm in the Western Reserve and on it spent the whole of his life and died. During the war of 1812 he commanded a squad of friendly Indians and thus rendered his Government valuable service. He and his wife were the parents of eleven children,—six sons and five daughters. His son John, the father of our subject, was born on the farm in Ohio, March 6, 1811. He grew up there and married Miss Mary Boyer, a native of the same place, and they had six children, three sons and three daughters, all of whom are living. The wife and mother died in the fifty-sixth year of her age. She was a faithful member of the Lutheran Church, with which he also has been identified for many years. He is now eighty-three years of age and still resides at the old home place in Ohio.

William Coleman was the fourth born in his father's family. He was reared and educated in the village of Germantown and there learned the trade of carriage blacksmith. When the great civil war broke out he was not old enough to be a soldier, but as he grew older and the war continued to rage he was not to be restrained from entering the Union ranks. Accordingly, early in the spring of 1864, when he was seventeen, he enlisted in Company E, 131st Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and was with the forces that operated in Virginia and Maryland. At the expiration of his term of service he received an honorable discharge and returned home.

In the spring of 1866, in company with his brother Lewis and J. T. Clark, they purchased a mule team and wagon at Kansas City, Missouri, and started West. They came over the old Santa Fe route to Denver, Colorado, thence to Salt Lake and from there to Alder Gulch, Montana. At both Denver and Salt Lake they replenished their store of provisions, but when they landed in Montana their provisions were gone and they were also out of money. They had good clothes, however, and William Coleman traded a coat belonging to his brother Lewis, for $15 to Major Boyce, now of Butte City, and on this amount they subsisted until they secured employment. Their first work was digging a ditch. When this was completed they started for Highland Gulch, where gold had been discovered and to which point the miners thronged from all directions, the wagon belonging to these young men being the fifth one to cross over into that section of the country, and the journey was a most difficult one owing to the steepness of the hills. There Mr. Coleman spent the winter, teaming for wages, and in the spring we find him at the Mariposa stampede. Finding that the gold was not in paying quantities at the latter place, he returned to Highland Gulch, where he spent some time and money working the placer mines, and finally he and his associates found themselves $600 in debt. He then gave up the enterprise and went to work in Charles Wanderlick's shop. Soon afterward he was employed on the night shift in the Forrest Queen Tunnel Gold Company, at $5 per day and board. While he was at work there a little incident occurred which is worthy of note here, illustrating, as it does, the character of the man. One of the men in the mine kept constantly

"Whereas, At a meeting of the citizens of Helena at the courthouse, held on Monday, the 11th day of February, 1867, for the purpose of considering the necessity of fixing a value upon certain gold dust now circulating in the community at a value of eighteen dollars per ounce, and which is worth much less than said value, the undersigned were appointed a committee to consider the matter, and were instructed to report at an adjourned meeting of the citizens, to be held at the courthouse of Helena, on Monday evening, February 18, 1867. Now, therefore, we the undersigned committeemen do make this our report, and move the adoption of the same:

"Resolved, That the article of dust known as first quality mill retort be received and paid out by this community at a value of $16 per ounce.

"Resolved, That the article of dust known as Silver Bow dust be received and paid out by this community at the value of $16 per ounce."

Resolved, That clean gulch gold dust, free from rock and sand and other impurities be received and paid out as heretofore, at $18 per ounce, save and excepting Silver Bow and Boise dust."

"Resolved, That all gold dust received or paid out by this community shall be free from rock, black sand and other impurities to be of the value above mentioned.

watching Mr. Coleman and after awhile the latter was so annoyed by it that he said, "Why are you constantly eyeing me?" To this the man, Mr. Munday, replied, "Billy, I beg your pardon; but I think it is because I have seen and known you somewhere before." In the course of conversation it was found out that the two had met during the war, and Mr. Munday exclaimed, "You were the boy who brought supplies and fed me when I was a rebel prisoner and you were conducting us from Baltimore to Camp Chase." "Yes," replied Mr. Coleman, "I saw you were suffering, and borrowed the money with which I purchased those supplies." It is unnecessary to say that as long as they remained together at Highland Gulch these two were warm friends.

In the spring of 1869 Mr Coleman and three others went on a prospecting tour to the Big Hole country, but as they were not successful they returned to Highland Gulch. About that time an excitement broke out over discoveries made at Loone Creek, in Idaho, and to that place they directed their course, and, as they found nothing, they started across the mountains to Salmon City, meeting with many difficulties in making the journey, being lost for eight days and five days of that time having nothing to eat except flour and water. Finally, however, they reached their destination. After purchasing supplies, they made their way to Bannack and there engaged in mining in the old fashioned way until cold weather set in. Mr. Coleman made a pump of his own invention and succeeded in getting to bed rock in the main channel, and secured considerable gold. In his operations he employed a number of men, some of them rough characters who tried to rob him of his property, but with a six-shooter he succeeded in standing them off. At last he was injured by a falling timber in the mine and was disabled for further work of that kind.

August 11, 1871, Mr. Coleman opened up his general merchandise business in Deer Lodge, and has continued in business here ever since, also at various times having branch stores at other points, his operations thus being extended over a large territory and being uniformly successful. In 1873 he opened a branch store at Pioneer, which he ran one year; from 1875 until 1880 had a branch store at Phillipsburg; and from 1877 until 1884 had a branch business in Butte City. In the spring of 1884 he formed a partnership with W. J. Matthews and opened a store in Anaconda. This he closed out in 1889. That same year he erected his fine brick business block in Deer Lodge, it being the finest block in the town. But Mr. Coleman's enterprise does not stop here. As has been already stated, he is still engaged in mining operations, now being interested in no less than fifty different mining claims in Montana. He has also acquired a large amount of real estate both in Montana and in Washington. And in addition to the energy and enterprise he has put into his own business, he has constantly been the leader in all the enterprises intended to help his town. In 1887 he and two others, N. J. Bielenberg and Willard Bonnet, organized the water company which has since supplied the city with pure water, Mr. Coleman giving his personal attention to the putting in of the works. He was also one of the organizers of the Electric Light Company, in which he is a stockholder and vice-president. He built the elegant brick residense which he and his family occupy, and both directly and indirectly he has done all in his power to make Deer Lodge the pleasant and desirable town to live in which it has become.

Mr. Coleman was happily married August 2, 1875, to Miss Lucy Hammond, a native of Wisconsin and a daughter of William Hammond. Her father emigrated to Montana in 1865 and is now a resident of Phillipsburg. Mr. and Mrs. Coleman have two children: Alice and Joseph L.

Fraternally, Mr. Coleman is a charter member of the George H. Thomas Post, G. A. R.; is Deputy Grand Master of the I. O. O. F., and is also Deputy Grand Patriarch of the Encampment; and is an active member of the Masonic order. Politically, he is a Republican. Mrs. Coleman and the children are members of the Episcopal Church.

Much more might be said of the life of this worthy pioneer, but enough has already been given to show that he is one of the leading business men and pioneers of the State.

"Resolved, That this agreement shall take effect on and after the first day of March, 1867.

"Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by this meeting to secure the signatures of the business men, and others of this community, to these resolutions. James King, S. M. Hall, C. B. ROBERT VAUGHN, the pioneer settler of Sun River valley and now one of the most public-spirited citizens of Great Falls, is a native of Wales, born in Montgomeryshire, June 5, 1836. His parents, Edward and Elizabeth (Davis) Vaughn, were industrious farmers and respected members of the Episcopal Church. They had six children, all of whom are living except the eldest. Mr. Edward Vaughn died in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and his wife lived to be seventy-four years old. Mr. Vaughn and his brother Hugh, who is a well-to-do farmer in McLean county, Illinois, are the only two members of the family who came to America.

The gentleman whose name forms the caption of this biographical account, the third in the above family, had but limited opportunities for an education in his native land; nevertheless, in the hard school of experience he became an intelligent and well-informed, self-made man. Leaving home at the age of nineteen years he went to Liverpool, England, to work for himself and to learn the English language. He spent over a year in Liverpool, employed at flower-gardening, and acquired the English language well enough to express himself fairly well. He then took passage on the steamer Vigo, bound for the United States, and after an exceedingly stormy passage of twelve days he landed at New York city, in October, 1858.

During the first winter in this country he stopped with his brother, who was working on a farm near Rome, New York, and there Mr. Vaughn suffered a severe attack of typhoid fever. In the spring, after he had sufficiently recovered to travel, he went to the home of an uncle in Palmyra, Ohio, and was employed on the farm there about two years, and next in the coal mines at Youngstown, same State, three years; and for a short time after this he was again employed upon a farm,—that of his brother, in McLean county, Illinois.

March 1, 1864, he left Livingston county, Illinois, in company with James Gale, James Martin, John Jackson and Sam Demster and wife, destined for Alder Gulch, Montana; their mode of travel was with four horses and a lumber wagon. The greater portion of Illinois and Iowa through which they passed was then a very thinly settled part of the country, and sometimes they would travel almost a day without seeing a pioneer settler. Council Bluffs was a small frontier settlement, and Omaha had scarcely 1,200 population. How different these populous cities now are!

At Omaha they made up a train of 100 wagons to cross the plains, with an average of four men to the wagon. Their trail was on the north side of the North Platte river as far as to Fort Laramie, following most of the way the surveyors' stakes on the line of the Union Pacific Railway. At Laramie they camped some three days to recruit their stock and make arrangements for completing their long journey. There they met the noted frontiersman, Bozeman, the founder of Montana's city of that name. He sought to organize a train of 100 wagons to take a cut-off route east of the Wind River mountains; but Mr. Vaughn and party had already joined Joe McKnight's train, which was to skirt these mountains on the west. McKnight was a famous scout, versed in the language of every Indian tribe from the Platte to the Saskatchawan, and was both feared and respected by all of them. He was a brave and true man, whose tact and courage on more than one occasion resulted in avoidance of trouble with hostile redskins.

After many hardships and dangers the party arrived at Alder Gulch July 13, 1864. At that time no one had the least idea of establishing a home in Montana, and in truth the field just then was not an inviting one for the home-seeker. All worked for gold and nothing else. Nearly every one had made up his mind as to the amount he wanted, after obtaining which he would return to the States to enjoy it. Many made fortunes and carried out precisely this program; but the great majority were not so fortunate. Among the latter was Mr. Vaughn. He was not ready to return at the end of the first, or even the second, year.

Being an observing man, he had noticed, with others, that the miners' ponies and work cattle fattened readily on

The swift scene shifts and men come and go at Silver Bow as they come and go in the great whirl and excitement all over the stage in the climax of a drama, and all up and down both sides of the "Shining mountains." In a little time the new town had only its name left. It drifted to a new location near by, and all the time men rushing at such a pace that no man could follow them far or continuously and correctly and not forget all else. The tide went out and the tide came in. Forty men with "rockers" and five women is the nearest estimate from "the oldest inhabitant" in 1866. In 1867 the site of the present Butte was laid out.

"Yes, they have laid out Butte at last," said a doubting Thomas in a moan of despondency; "and if it had any friends, now that it is laid out, they would bury it."

bunch grass, and would live on it even during the winter without care or shelter; that the meat of the deer, elk and buffalo were in prime condition even in the dead of winter; that experiments on a small scale in raising vegetables and grain in the valleys were highly successful, and that the climate of the country gave health and vigor to both man and beast. In the light of these observations he concluded that Montana was a country good enough for him to live in; and he has never since changed his mind. Accordingly, in the early years he engaged in the live-stock business, selling meat to miners, and in this way accumulated sufficient means to conduct the business on a larger scale. In 1869 he located a farm and stock ranch in Sun River valley, twelve miles above the present city of Great Falls, which in time became one of the finest and best stock ranches in Montana. That he was a pioneer of pioneers in Northern Montana is shown by the fact that this tract of land was the first in that region to be entered at the United States Land Office. He was also the first in that region to give attention to the raising of high-bred horses and cattle; some of the finest roadsters were raised by him. At each Territorial fair his stalls were always an attraction, and usually he had one or two winners on the race course.

He resided on this farm for twenty years, and in 1890 sold it for $45,000, with some of the stock on it, to Captain Thomas Couch. He then took up his permanent abode in Great Falls. From the beginning of the enterprise, by Paris Gibson, of building a town at the falls of the Missouri river, Mr. Vaughn was an enthusiast as to the future of the place, and was ready at any time to measure words with the scoffer and unbeliever. From the very start he was one of Mr. Gibson's trusted counselors and abettors, showing his faith by deeds as well as words. Accordingly he became one of the earliest investors in Great Falls property, and he is to-day the sole owner of two splendid blocks which he has had erected in the heart of the city, and which are a credit both to him and the city of his choice. He also owns much other valuable property, both improved and unimproved, and his faith in the city's future has never faltered; and he proposes to see it a city of 100,000 population. He is an enterprising, progressive citizen, contributing even more than his quota to promote the weal of Great Falls and surrounding country; and in every undertaking for the public good Mr. Vaughn is found at the fore front.

August 25, 1886, is the date of his marriage to Miss Elizabeth Donahue, a native of Toronto, Canada, born March 19, 1855, the daughter of Mathew and Jane Donahue. After a brief wedding tour they returned to the pleasant home which he had provided, and which her presence completed as a paradise; but within sixteen short months, namely, January 13, 1888, she had to leave for the future world! Their little daughter, born on the first day of the same month, and named Arvonia Elizabeth, is a lovely little girl. Mrs. Vaughn was a most amiable Christian lady, and her loss was to her husband and infant daughter an unbearable affliction. During his great grief Mr. Vaughn addressed a most loving and fatherly letter to his little infant daughter, in most affectionate language, giving her the story of her birth and the very happy Christian death of her mother,—the letter showing him to be a man of the tenderest and most loving heart, passing through a most trying ordeal with Christian fortitude. The last words of his wife were, "Tell the folks I die happy." Mr. Vaughn's little daughter is still spared to him.

January 17, 1893, Mr. Vaughn was again married, this time to Miss Ella De Vee, an amiable Christian lady, who is a native of Indiana, and they are enjoying together their pleasant home in Great Falls, highly esteemed by all who know them.

In his political principles Mr. Vaughn is a Republican. He has been elected County Commissioner, but he has never sought public office, as he prefers a quiet, peaceable life.

But the great tidal wave which was to bear Butte to the top of the crest was coming. By the finding of new gulches or new lodes? Nothing of the sort; but by the help of persistent Yankee ingenuity. The story of failure after failure in attempts to reduce the ores and make them give up their triple treasures is a very pathetic part of brave Butte's drama. Fortune after fortune fell out of sight and left only idle smoke-stacks as sad and lonely mementoes of failure. But we must not anticipate. It was years, even yet, before the great full tide came surging in. The year 1867 found only 300 men and about forty women in Butte. The gold, like that of the old Comstock, was made cheap with silver; but the silver-blackened rock or quartz of Butte was new to the miner, quite unlike that of Nevada. Butte had the gold and silver, but not yet the science to get hold of it.

The gold of Florence was yellow with copper, instead of being white with siver, as in Butte. And this gold of the first famous mines of Idaho was the prettiest gold to look upon ever seen. It was of uniform size, the grains of dust almost like wheat grains in size, shape and color, not a particle of adhering rock, no pyrites of iron or sand of any sort. It

BENJAMIN W. TOOLE, of the firm of Pauton & Toole, dealers in hay, grain and all kinds of feed, Billings, Montana, is one of the enterprising business men of Yellowstone county. Mr. Toole has figured conspicuously in Montana affairs, yet he is so modest and unassuming that he takes no pleasure in asserting what he has done in developing the resources of the State.

He was born in Missouri in 1840, son of Edwin and Lucy S. (Porter) Toole, and a brother of ex-Governor J. K. Toole, of Montana. It was in 1864 that Benjamin W. came out West and engaged in placer mining at Helena, continuing that occupation on a paying basis for some time. Later, in 1887, he settled in Yellowstone county, and for more than three years served as Clerk of the District Court. In November, 1892, he was appointed by Judge Milburn to fill a vacancy on the Board of County Commissioners, in which position he served most acceptably. He has never sought official honors, preferring to give his attention to his own business affairs and to enjoy the quiet of home life. He is, however, eminently qualified to fill any position, and is just such a man as the public needs in a responsible capacity. In 1893 he became associated with Mr. Pauton in their present business, in which the latter has had several years' experience.

Mr. Toole was married April, 1878, to Emma R. Woodworth, daughter of William W. and Lucy (Stephens) Woodworth, natives of Iowa and New York respectively. Mr. and Mrs. Toole have had four children, three of whom are living, C. Walter, May and Nell. Their third born, Lester E., died at the age of fifteen months.

Mr. Toole is a member of the Knights of Pythias at Billings, and has been identified with the Democratic party all his life.

ETHELBERT S. BECKER, a prominent merchant and banker of Forsyth, Montana, is a member of the firm of Alexander & Becker, extensive dealers in general merchandise, and bankers.

He was born at Selma, Alabama, in 1863, a son of Dana O. Becker, a prominent business man of Selma. E. S. Becker received a good, practical business education, came to Montana in 1883, and in the spring of 1889 became associated with Thomas Alexander in the general mercantile business, which he had established in 1883. They have built up a large trade and are doing an extensive mercantile and banking business. The bank was established March, 1892, and is named the Merchants' Bank. Cash capital, $20,000; Thomas Alexander, president; E. S. Becker, cashier. Mr. Becker is also largely interested in the sheep industry and in real estate, and has a fine residence. He is a modest gentleman, a practical, safe business man, and well and favorably known. Is a Democrat. He and Mrs. Becker are social favorites in Custer county.

Mr. Becker was married in December, 1888, to Miss Matie Sears, a daughter of J. D. and Mary A. (Devall) Sears, of Glendive, Montana. Her father is a rancher and stockman in Dawson county, this State, and is a native of the State of New York. Mr. Becker has two children,—Leland S. and Helen.

DR. T. J. MURRAY, founder of the Murray-Freund Hospital, at Butte City, Montana, is a gentleman of intrinsic worth as a benefactor to his race. He ranks with the leading members of the medical profession in Montana, and is therefore entitled to more than a passing notice on the pages of this work. A resumé of his life is as follows:

Dr. T. J. Murray was born in Newport, Tennessee, July 30, 1855. The Murrays were early settlers of Virginia, and later were residents of Tennessee, and it was in Greene county, Tennessee, that James C. Murray, the Doctor's father, was born and reared. He removed from there to Cocke county, where he was a successful grain and stock farmer. His wife, nee Elizabeth Manning, was also a native of Tennessee and a descendant of one of the old families of the South. They reared a family of seven children, all of whom are living, occupying honorable and useful positions in life. The parents are worthy members of the Baptist Church, and are as highly esteemed as they are well known.

looked as if it should be worth quite $20 per ounce. It passed current for $16, as had prime dust in California from the first, but there were buyers of gold dust that paid as high as $17.50. When I left the mines there and sold out my share in Mossman's express lines, I put all my money in this beautiful red gold dust of Florence, and, taking it to Tracy & King, Portland, or my very home, had it melted into bars and assayed, although a dealer in gold dust had called at my hotel and offered me $18 per ounce. My bags of gold dust assayed a fraction less than $9; and more than half my hard-earned fortune was lost, although I had been dealing in gold dust and digging in it for years.

It is conceded that the year of 1867 showed a marked decrease in the yield of placer gold, although the amount is set down in various publications at various figures, from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000; so that the world still received an immense commercial impetus from the source of the great rivers in the "Shining mountains." It is universally admitted in all publications that I can find of this date that the gold yield of Montana, up to the close of 1867, amounted to $92,000,000.

From a tabulated statement of water-ditches used for mining purposes in Montana, I learn

Dr. Murray is the eldest in his father's family. He was reared in his native county and was given the best of educational advantages. After attending a private school for some time, he took a course in Roanoke College, Virginia, and then devoted his time and attention to the study of medicine, first attending lectures at Nashville, and later at Philadelphia.

Having completed his medical course, Dr. Murray entered upon the practice of his profession in the swamps of Mississippi, and continued there three years. He then came West to Colorado, where he practiced three years, and in 1885, came from there to Butte City. Here he at once established himself in practice, and has since met with eminent success. In 1890, seeing the need of a hospital in Butte City for the care and treatment of the sick, he devoted his energies to the founding of such an institution, the result being the Murray-Freund Hospital, a boon to suffering humanity and a monument to the Doctor's skill and enterprise. This hospital is a fine building, 40x100 feet, four stories high, and fitted and furnished throughout with all the modern conveniences for the comfort and successful treatment of the sick.

While Doctor Murray conducts a general practice, he makes a specialty of surgery in all its departments, and in this specialty has had signal success, his fame as a surgeon extending far and near. Frequently he is called in consultation, both in general practice and in surgery. He is a member of the State and County Medical Societies, the State Board of Medical Examiners, and the Board of Railroad Surgeons, and he is also employed by all the railroad companies having lines running to Butte City.

Dr. Murray was happily married, July 24, 1889, to Miss Margery K. Kellsey, who was born in Ohio and reared and educated in Indianapolis, Indiana. Both the Doctor and his wife have hosts of friends in Butte City.

JOHN A. ROCKWELL, Police Magistrate of the city of Anaconda, Montana, is a native of Albany, New York, born October 12, 1856.

Judge Rockwell's ancestors on his father's side were English people who emigrated to America in 1728, and settled at Weymouth, Massachusetts. His great-grandfather, Justin H. Rockwell, was a veteran of the Revolutionary war. Edmond H. Rockwell, the father of our subject, was born in Salem, Massachusetts, in 1824. When a young man he removed to Albany, New York, where he was subsequently married to Miss Susan McBride, a native of New York city, the date of her birth being 1836. For many years he was a merchant of that city and is now living there, retired from active life. He and his wife have four children, John A. being the youngest, and all occupying honorable and useful positions in life. On his mother's side Mr. Rockwell's ancestry were Irish.

John A. Rockwell received his education in the public schools and the academy at Albany, and in 1876, when on the threshold of manhood, came West to make his own way in the world. His first location was in the Black Hills, where he was engaged in placer mining one year. Then he went to Cheyenne, Wyoming, and clerked three years for the United States Government, and in 1880 he directed his course to Butte City, Montana, where he was engaged in mining up to 1883. At that time he came to Anaconda and aided in the survey of the town. Then for six years he was in the employ of the Anaconda Company, up to the date of the admission of Montana to Statehood in 1889, at which time he received the appointment of Justice of the Peace, and served in that capacity until 1891. That year he was elected Police Magistrate of Anaconda, in which position he is still acting, having been twice re-elected. As a public official he has performed his duty with the strictest fidelity and to the general satisfaction of his constituents.

Judge Rockwell has invested in city property and has erected several buildings, thus doing his part to advance the material interests of the place. Politically, he is identified with the Democratic party. Personally, he is of pleasing address, always courteous and obliging, and is regarded as a man of the highest integrity of character.

that she had in operation at this time 287 miles, costing nearly $1,000,000! The swift excitement attending the discovery and development of Helena and Butte, and also these enormous figures, make us glad to return to simpler pursuits and less exacting estimates.

PART II.

POLITICAL AND MODERN HISTORY.

CHAPTER XIX.

MONTANA TERRITORY—THE FIRST JUDICIAL OFFICER—LAW AND ORDER—THE HIGH SOCIAL ELEMENTS OF THE SUMMIT EMPIRE—POLITICAL HISTORY—FUSING AND MELTING TOGETHER OF MEN.

WE must now leave the miners and turn back and aside for a brief space to the legislative chronicles of Montana; but bear in mind, meantime, that the knights and noblemen of the pick and shovel and sluice-fork are, many of them, preparing to burn their sluice-boxes and descend into the earth, lamp in hand, and, clad in oilskin and rubber, in impetuous pursuit of the retreating gold and silver. Also bear in mind that the plowshare has already made a broad, black mark on the tawny breast of Montana, and the mark is widening, lengthening day by day; also that the lowing of cattle is heard, for some immigrants having turned their bony brutes out to die as winter came on, found them fat as they could roll in the spring. And now also there began to be little snow-storms of sheep on the tawny hill-tops. And also, just about the date of the political birth of Montana, her eyes were turned eagerly to-

HON. W. A CHESSMAN.—American biography has always been considered one of the most fascinating studies, far surpassing in interest the same study in other lands,—the cause of this being the large proportion of self-made men included in our population; and especially is this true in the Western States. Among the successful men of Montana, there are none who have acquired wealth and position more deservedly then has William A. Chessman, president of the Helena Consolidated Water Company.

Mr. Chessman was born in Braintree, Norfolk county, Massachusetts, August 19, 1830. His early education was obtained in the district schools, and when on the threshold of manhood he followed the excitement of the times and went to California. Taking passage by way of Cape Horn, he arrived at San Francisco December 20, 1849, and soon was engaged in mining in El Dorado county. He followed mining in California for fifteen years, with varying success, operating in El Dorado, Yuba and Tuolumne counties until the spring of 1865.

In 1865 Mr. Chessman came to Montana, and has since been identified with the interests of this State. His first location was at Alder Gulch, and subsequently he took up his abode in Helena. He acquired some of the mining ground in Last Chance Gulch, from time to time purchased other claims, and finally obtained possession of a large amount of mining property. These claims he worked for some time to advantage and then sold out the mining privileges for about $34,000, but retained the title to the land. In 1872 he purchased from Messrs. Trutt and Atchison, the ditch for these privileges, the same being then in use, supplying water to miners,—one known as the Helena or Big ditch and the other the Yaw-Yaw ditch,—and in 1875 began the construction of a bedrock flume in Last Chance Gulch. This flume was completed in three years, at a cost of $30,000, and was used for the purpose of working over the old ground and rewashing the tailings from the first workings of the rich Last Chance Gulch. This ground he continued to work until the construction of the ward the East and the all-absorbing topic of a railroad in the old path of Lewis and Clarke was in every mouth. It surely began to look as if the "northwest passage" and commercial road to the Orient was to be a solid fact. Jay Cooke, a Philadelphia banker, had floated the Government bonds with great triumph, with himself at the head of the Northern Pacific Railroad, with splendid audacity. The black horse cavalry of commerce was surely coming; and then the Indian,—the Indian who had come to the mountain-tops on the trail of the white man—must surely go. For he had withheld his bloody hand hardly one single day since the piteous tragedy which we have recited from the journal of James Stuart,—red blotches in the snow and on the brown grasses here and there all the time that we have been with the miners at Alder Creek, Last Chance and Silver Bow.

So, bear all these things in mind; for while we pause a little time with the first legislature they, the plowshares, the sheep, the cattle, the coming railroads, the manufacturers, all are active factors in Montana.

The creative act of Congress, in May, 1864, had given Montana a dowry to begin life with —nearly 100,000,000 acres of land. Backed Montana Central Railroad, the advent of which so enhanced the value of this land that it was worth more for building purposes than for mining. In these operations Mr. Chessman acquired title to some 400 acres of ground lying at the mouth of Last Chance Gulch, much of which is now occupied by the city of Helena for depot grounds and terminal facilities.

After the placer mining was stopped, the water in the ditches was sold to the market gardeners and farmers in the lower portions of the valley for irrigating, and at the time of the organization of the Helena Consolidated Water Company, the interests were sold to this company. Mr. Chessman was one of the originators of the company and subsequently became president of it. This company was incorporated October 1, 1889, the other officers being as follows: vice-president, A. J. Davidson; secretary, J. B. Clayberg; treasurer, S. T. Hauser. The capital stock is a million and a half of dollars. Previous to the organization of the above named company, Mr. Chessman had organized the Eureka Water Company, which furnished water to the lower portions of the city, and which sold out to the Helena Consolidated Water Company when the latter came into existence.

In addition to these interests, Mr. Chessman has been actively engaged in other operations in the State,—notably mining and stock-raising. He is president of the Bald Butte Mining Company, vice-president of the Helena Electric Street Company, and is largely interested in quartz-mining in other parts of the State and in Idaho. For twenty-three years he has been connected with the Helena Fair Association; is a trustee of St. Peter's Hospital, and has been identified with this institution ever since its organization. His various operations have been uniformly successful, and to-day he is rated with the wealthy men of the State. His holdings are directly in the line of appreciation with the natural advance of the country. A large portion of his property is within the resident limits of the city of Helena, and will doubtless grow in value as the country is settled up. The Helena Consolidated Water Company, of which he is the president and a heavy stockholder, will probably control the interests of the necessary commodity for the city of Helena in the future, and with its growth increase in value correspondingly.

As a business man, Mr. Chessman is considered one of the soundest in the State. He is conservative, shrewd and careful, but withal genial and popular, and is still an active participant in the business movements of the State.

Politically, he is a Republican. For five sessions he was a member of the Territorial Legislature, three of which were in the House and two in the Territorial Council. He was also a member of the Constitutional Convention. Fraternally, he is an active Mason, having taken all except the thirty-third degree in that order. He is also a life member of the Society of California Pioneers.

Mr. Chessman is a man of family. He was married February 4, 1875, to Miss Penalope V. Newhall, of Galena, Illinois, and they have had three children, two sons and a daughter. One son is deceased.

CHARLES W. PRICE, a prominent stockman of Fort Benton, arrived in Montana, June 24, 1864.

He was born in Callaway county, Missouri, January 23, 1844. His first American ancestors emigrated from Wales to the colony of Virginia. His grandfather Price served as a soldier in the Revolution. His parents, Cyrus and Adeline (Dixon) Price, were both natives of the Old Dominion State. Charles W. was raised and educated in his native State, and was just twenty years old when he came to Montana, in 1864. He followed placer-mining at Virginia City a year, and at Helena two years, and in the fall of 1867 came to Fort Benton and engaged in trading with the Indians, selling them supplies and receiving in return buffalo robes, wolf-skins and furs. This proving to be a profitable pursuit, he followed it for four years, up to 1871, at which time he turned his attention to stock raising, which he has since continued, in company with the Conrad Brothers. Of this business he has made a great success, having at one time 10,000 head of cattle. In 1880 he built a comfortable and pleasant against the British possessions to the north, what is now the Dakotas to the east, Wyoming and part of the Idaho boundary to the south, and Idaho's mountains to the west of her, she was at once a magnificent world to herself, and the third of all the States or Territories, next to California and Texas.

Sidney Edgarton of Ohio, later the Chief Justice of Idaho, was the first Territorial officer, his commission bearing date June 22, 1864. His secretary, Thomas Francis Meagher, a soldier and orator of Irish birth, and well-known in history, was not appointed till more than a year later,—August, 1865.

And this brings us to the consideration of a third and fourth element in the make-up of social and political Montana. We first saw the gray and toil-worn veteran climbing slowly up the Rocky mountain steeps from under the setting sun, a pick and shovel on his back, a knife and pistol at his side. Then, after he had discovered gold and founded cities on the Great Divide, came the second element, the bright and brisk young men from away toward the sunrise. We have seen that these two elements were contentious, contradictory in training, age, experience and all else that goes to make up Montana; although each had in it the best home at Fort Benton. He is a quiet, unassuming man who gives strict attention to his own business, is a reliable citizen and a good representative of the Montana pioneers of 1864.

October 22, 1880, he married Miss Mollie B. Conrad, a daughter of Colonel James Conrad, formerly of Virginia, and later of Great Falls, Montana, and sister of the Conrad brothers, the partners of Mr. Price. Mr. and Mrs. Price have two sons, both born at Fort Benton.

JOHN E. DAVIS.—Prominent in the business circles of the State of Montana is found the gentleman whose name appears at the head of this sketch. To him belongs the distinction of being the pioneer wholesale groceryman of Butte City. He is a nephew of Andrew Jackson Davis, deceased, a son of John A. Davis, and a brother of A. J. Davis, all prominent in the history of this part of the country, and mention of whom is found elsewhere in this work.

John E. Davis was born in Rockford, Illinois, July 24, 1858, and was reared and educated in Chicago. He began his business career when he was sixteen years of age, and for eight years from that time was connected with the real-estate business of E. A. Cummings & Company. In 1884 he came to Butte City, Montana, and, in partnership with his father, started their wholesale grocery business. The partnership continued until 1888, when John E. purchased his father's interest and became sole owner. He has since continued the business with increasing prosperity. He wholesales to dealers in his own city and does a large business throughout the southern part of the State. During the early years of his residence here he traveled extensively over the State, visiting every little hamlet and mining camp and thus establishing a trade which has since been uninterrupted, many of their earliest customers still dealing with the house. The fact that his old customers stand by him, is the strongest proof of Mr. Davis' honorable dealings and his popularity. He buys his goods for cash in the best markets of the United States and hence obtains the inside price on all goods. The brick building he occupies, at the northeast corner of Arizona and Park streets, was built by the firm and affords ample facilities for his extensive trade.

Mr. Davis was married in 1883 to Miss Tenie B. Irons, a native of Chicago, and the daughter of James Irons, of that city. They have two children,—Aggie and Tenie, both born in their beautiful home in Butte City.

In his political views, Mr. Davis is in harmony with the Democratic party. He is a member of the Silver Bow Club of Butte City.

NARCISSE LEDOUX, the proprietor of a saloon in Melrose, Montana, came to the Territory in the spring of 1862, and is therefore one of her earliest pioneers.

Mr. Ledoux was born in the town of St. Martin's, Lower Canada, January 10, 1833. His remote ancestors were French, but several generations of the family were born in Canada. His parents, John Baptist and Bridget (Marcille) Ledoux, were born and reared near Montreal. They had a family of twenty children, Narcisse being the seventeenth born and one of the twelve who reached adult years. John B. Ledoux was a carpenter and builder. He took many important contracts for work and for many years did a successful business. To him belongs the distinction of having built the trestle work for the great bridge across the St. Lawrence river at Montreal. He died in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and his wife's death occurred a short time before his. Both were devout members of the Catholic Church.

Narcisse Ledoux started out in the world to do for himself when he was twelve years old, and since then his life has been full of varied experiences, a detailed account of which would fill a volume. For three years he worked on a farm; for some time served as office boy in Montreal; in the spring of 1850 landed in Troy, New York, with $3 in his pocket and unable to speak one word of English. As he could get no work in Troy and as he had but little means, he slept out doors on a shed and for a week lived on gingerbread. Then he went to other points and was variously employed for several years, among other places which the East and the West had to give. The crowds did not go in the early days and the weak fell by the way; so that the beginning, like the beginning of Italy, England, Massachusetts, Virginia, all lands famous in history, was great. It was a world's congress, up to which the whole world sent its ablest men.

"Your men must take your horses home with them; they will need them to plow with," said Grant to Lee, the day after the civil war was over. It was done, as the great, good soldier advised, mainly; but many who had worn the gray found themselves far this way from their farms and horses. And thus the third strange new element soon began to pour into Montana. Then came the Northern soldiers, with their pockets stuffed with greenbacks, men who had fought under Meagher, the first secretary, and finally the acting governor of the State.

Oddly enough, these two new elements melted together more readily than the other two. They were prepared to hate and despise each other as heartily as good soldiers can hate and despise opposing good soldiers; but this did not at all result. The sugar-maple man being at Chicago, Joliet and St. Louis. In 1860 we find him accompanying an expedition up the Missouri river, the object of which was to build a quartz mill in Leg Gulch, Colorado, where they landed after a journey of three months. After working there for two months he started out on a prospecting tour. This was the first of a number of prospecting tours he made throughout the West, many of them attended with great hardship and privation. He knows what it is to be snow-bound, sick and without provisions. When Alder Gulch was discovered he and twenty-three others went to that point. There he secured a claim from which he took out about $4,000 in one year and which he then sold for $2,000. Although he was successful in some of his mining operations, they were on the whole unprofitable. After he sold his claim at Alder Gulch he purchased a ranch and ice house, and for some time was in partnership with Mr. Laurin. He was then variously occupied for several years—teaming, butchering, sawmilling, mining, etc; and while he seemed to be successful at times, these enterprises nearly all ended in failure. We may here state that Mr. Ledoux had a brother in Montana with whom he spent several winters.

Finally he engaged in the saloon business at Glendale, where he did a successful business for eight years and from whence he came to his present location at Melrose. Here he has continued in the same occupation. He has purchased buildings and lots in Melrose, has done much toward improving the town, and is regarded as one of its enterprising men. Besides the property he has accumulated here, he owns an interest in the Calumet and Heckla mines, in Silver Bow county, Montana.

In referring to his varied experiences in Montana, Mr. Ledoux stated that on one occasion, while making the journey from Glendale to Melrose by stage, he was sitting up with the driver and they were held up by robbers. The driver was shot. Mr. Ledoux leaned forward, grabbed the lines, and drove to Melrose. The murderer was arrested, convicted and hung.

In his political affiliations, Mr. Ledoux is a Democrat.

JOHN MAGUIRE, Montana's popular theater man, is a native of Cork, Ireland, born December 4, 1840, of Irish parentage. He was educated in his native land, and after graduating at St. Colman's College, in his native county, came direct to this country. In 1861, at San Francisco, he entered the theatrical profession and acquired his knowledge of the dramatic art. He played with the Booths, Edwin Forest, Augusta Dargon, Matilda Heron, James Stark, Lawrence Barrett, John McCullough, and in fact all of that galaxy of theatrical stars that shed such luster on the early history of the California stage. Being a young man of culture and fine talent, he won his way rapidly to the front and was soon a recognized leading man, playing "Armand Duval" to Matilda Heron's "Camille," and "Romeo" to Miss Augusta Dargon's "Juliet." About this time he made a trip to Australia, and there played with Barry Sullivan, Madame Celeste, Charles Mathews and other celebrities, acquiring honor and some wealth in the prosecution of his art. He is a pioneer manager throughout the Pacific coast States, and the second oldest in active management in the United States.

He has for many years been identified with Montana, and in 1888 he built the Maguire Opera House in Butte City, at a cost of $70,000, and in connection with the management of his own theater he also manages one at Helena and one at Great Falls, all being fitted and furnished with every comfort both before and behind the curtain. His travels throughout the West have long ago brought him into great favor with all theater-going people between the Missouri river and the Pacific ocean, and the residents of Montana have reason to congratulate themselves on account of his location among them.

Personally, Mr. Maguire is a man of kind and generous impulses. He is fond of society and has made hosts of friends. In politics he was a Democrat up to the time James G. Blaine ran for the Presidency, and since then he has sympathized with the Republican party. He is a member of the Irish American Club and makes his head and the cotton-seed man really met for the first time, except on the battlefield, in Montana. The man who said "keow" and the man who said "nigger," the man who would have said "cow" but could not, and the man who could have said "negro" but would not,—these elements of the new order of the new empire were face to face now, side by side now, in the "pursuit of happiness" for the first time, and it was not six months before the blue and the gray were the best of friends. Men of all the four elements began to send for their wives and daughters; the four elements intermarried, rounded down their antagonistic corners, reared churches, passed school laws and got ready for the first generation of little Montanese.

This much for the foundation of social life, and we must now get back to the political beginning and growth of the sublime land.

H. L. Hosmer was named for Chief Justice; L. P. Williston, L. E. Munson, associates; E. B. Nealy, United States District Attorney; and S. M. Pinney, United States Marshal.

The first ordered election was on October 24, 1864, and resulted in the election of Samuel McLean as delegate to Congress, and a Democratic legislature, which met at Bannack in quarters in their fine club rooms, where his leisure hours glide pleasantly away in the society of his most highly prized fellow-clubmen of Butte City.

GEORGE F. COWAN, a prominent member of the Montana bar, was born in Columbus, Ohio, February 10, 1842. His ancestors were Scotch-Irish people, were among the early settlers of Canada, and came from that country to New York in 1830. The father of our subject, Ira Cowan, was born in Canada, April 6, 1806, was married about 1830, and immediately came to the United States. He worked at the shoemaker's trade in New York a few years, purchased property and worked at his trade at Worthington, Ohio, until the fall of 1846, and then located at Berlin, Green Lake county, Wisconsin. His death occurred at the latter place, at the age of seventy-six years. His wife is still living, aged eighty-three years. Mr. and Mrs. Cowan had eight children, six of whom grew to years of maturity, and four are now living.

George F., the third child in order of birth, went with his parents to Wisconsin when five years of age, and received his education in the high schools of Berlin. He had been reading law six months when the Civil war broke out, and he responded to the first call of President Lincoln, enlisting April 22, 1861, in Company B, Fourth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry. The company was stationed at Baltimore until February, 1862, and then went with General Butler in his expedition on the Gulf. Mr. Cowan's regiment was the first to enter New Orleans after its capture. They were soon afterward transferred to the Fourth Wisconsin Cavalry, and took part in all the operations of Generals Butler and Banks in that department. While at Vicksburg a rebel ironclad came down the Yazoo river, passed the fleet, and landed at Vicksburg. Mr. Cowan's command went to Baton Rouge, where they were attacked by General Breckenridge with a force of men, but the fleet destroyed the ironclad and they repulsed Breckenridge. Their next campaign was on the Red River expedition, first against Kirby Smith, and then at Port Hudson. General Gardiner sent 25,000 men to work against General Grant, but General Banks came down the river and took the port. Our subject's regiment had then become so reduced in numbers that the subject of this sketch, with others from his regiment, were sent to Wisconsin on recruiting service. After recruiting a full company, Mr. Cowan returned to his regiment at Baton Rouge, immediately afterward went on the second Red River expedition, and his term of service then expired. He had served three years and three months, and was mustered out of service as a Sergeant.

Mr. Cowan remained at his home until the following spring, after which he made a safe journey across the plains to Montana, arriving in Helena in July, 1865. He followed mining in various localities until the fall of 1866; in 1867 received the appointment of Deputy United States Marshal; was afterward made Assistant Assessor of Internal Revenue; and in 1868 was succeeded in that position by Walter Trumbull, the son of Senator Trumbull, of Illinois. During that time our subject had continued his law studies, and was appointed Clerk of the Court at Radersburgh, where he finished his law reading, In July, 1872, he was admitted to the bar, and is now the senior member of the law firm of Cowan & Parker, of Boulder. He is a lawyer of marked ability.

August 25, 1875, Mr. Cowan was united in marriage with Miss Emma J. Carpenter, a native of Wisconsin, and a daughter of Daniel D. Carpenter. After about two years of married life, a most thrilling experience occurred to them. In 1877 they went on an excursion to what is now Yellowstone Park, for the benefit of the wife's health. Their party consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Cowan, her brother and sister, and five gentlemen. They made the journey in safety, but while camped in the lower Geyser Basin early in the morning they were surprised and captured by Chief Joseph's band of Nez Perces Indians. They were obliged to leave their wagon and carriage, and ride their horses. After traveling about ten miles the Indians went into camp for dinner, a council was held, Mr. Cowan being spokesman for his party, and December, and worked along to the end of the session with all the dignity supposed to attend the Solons of the oldest States. The election, it is needless to say, had been orderly, much more so than average elections in older political countries. These men, here in the midst of savages, were mightily in earnest.

The first act of the infant legislature was the repeal of the statute laws of Idaho and the adoption of the English or common law till such times as a certificate of the laws of Montana could be made. It was made unlawful, at this first session, to carry concealed weapons, schools were considered, and the Historical Society of Montana was incorporated. Fourteen towns, or cities, were also incorporated, namely: Alki (the Chinook for bye and bye), Ophir, North Ophir, Prickly Pear, Missoula, Marysville, Willow Creek, Junction City, Virginia City, Brandon, Beaver, Gallatin, East Gallatin, and Jefferson City.

The seal accepted represented an array of mountain peaks under the rising sun, a bison behind a pick, shovel and plow, and the motto was, "Gold and Silver," in Spanish. The seat of government was established at Virginia City, Alder Creek. This first legislature of Montana was made up of seven members in the the chief told of a fight which they had had with the whites, in which many Indians were killed, and they were anxious for revenge. It was proposed that if the party would give up their horses, guns and ammunition, they would be set at liberty, and would be given some worn-out horses to ride. After traveling about half a mile seventy-five Indians overtook them, and they were commanded to return. After going only a short distance, and while in the thick timber, the Indians began shooting at the party. Mr. Cowan was shot through the right thigh, dropped from his horse, and his wife sprang to his assistance. At that time an Indian pointed a large revolver at his head, but the wife placed herself between the husband and Indian, and while the latter was trying to push her aside another savage shot Mr. Cowan near the upper part of the forehead. He remained senseless until about dusk. After regaining consciousness he raised himself by the branch of a fallen tree, and, seeing no one, supposed himself the only survivor of the party. At that time an Indian, who was sitting on his horse a short distance from him, fired at him, the ball passing through his left hip. Mr. Cowan remained there until the following morning, and then crawled on his hands and knees from Friday until Wednesday, without food. After traveling about ten miles in that way, two of General Howard's scouts found him, gave him food, water and a soldier's overcoat, and laid him near the road where he would be found by Howard's command. He was found at noon on the following day, and the ball was extracted from his head. The wife now has the ball set in gold, as a souvenir of their miraculous escape. The latter, with her brother and sister, had been taken as prisoners by the Indians, but were liberated on the following day. She mourned her husband as dead for two weeks. Mr. Cowan has fully recovered from his wounds and the fearful mental and bodily suffering which he endured.

Mr. and Mrs. Cowan have three children, all born in Jefferson county, viz.: Charles Frederick, George F., Jr., and Ethel May.

Mr. Cowan votes with the Republican party, is a prominent member of the G. A. R. Post, is Past Commander of the J. B. McPherson Post, No. 13, and is Past Master of the A. O. U. W. Mr. and Mrs. Cowan are generous and social people, and are highly esteemed by a large circle of friends.

JUDGE FRANK P. STERLING, one of Helena's successful lawyers, was born in Elkhorn, Walworth county, Wisconsin, March 24, 1843, and is of Scotch descent. His grandfather, Ephraim Sterling, came to America in 1780, and after a brief time spent in Pennsylvania he settled at Barre, Vermont. There his son, Henry Harrison Sterling, the father of Frank P., was born, January 11, 1813. October 5, 1834, Henry Harrison Sterling was married to Miss Eliza Perrin, a native of New York. In 1837 they removed to Wisconsin, took claim to Government land in what was then a wilderness, thirty-five miles west of Milwaukee, and there on the frontier developed a valuable farm, on which they resided until 1866. That year he sold out and moved to Iowa, there engaged in mercantile pursuits, and in that State continued to reside up to the time of his death, which occurred August 7, 1878, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. His wife died in 1868, in her fifty-fourth year. In their family of five sons and four daughters, Frank P. was the fifth born and is one of the six survivors.

Frank P. Sterling had just passed his freshman year in college when the great Civil war was inaugurated, and in answer to the President's call for volunteers he dropped his studies and enlisted as a private, September 13, 1861, in Company A, Tenth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry. With his regiment he soon went to the front, their first battle being that of Bowling Green, Kentucky. They served under General George H. Thomas, and participated in the first battle of Nashville and in the engagements that immediately followed, namely: Huntsville, Woodville, Paint Rock Bridge and Stevensville. They then returned to Nashville, and soon after the Union upper house and thirteen in the popular branch.

Some final confusion and a deal of future delay were caused, but no harm done by the body legislative ignoring that part of the organic act which required the first legislature to apportion anew the election districts and also to name the time and place of election and the time when the succeeding legislature should meet. By some chance they left all this just as the governor had fixed it when he called the election of this first body. But, as said before, no harm came of the year or so of delay. Montana had learned to govern herself. Some of the politicians fretted, but the miners would have been content if the next legislature had not met for years.

According to the newspapers of the time, there was ill-will between the governor and this legislature of his own creation; but you can read between the lines that it was all of political growth, the Ohio governor being a little too eager, perhaps, to drag in the war that had been raging so fierce and so far away; while this legislative body, as all can see now, felt that the savage enemy at its own door, its churches, schools, dozens of things, demanded, in the name of common sense, their attention before the far-away war.

I edited a paper at Eugene and founded the one now at Cañon City, Oregon, during those and Confederate armies began their great race northward, each striving to reach Louisville, Kentucky, in advance of the other. The heat was won by the Union forces, and soon after the battles of Perryville and Crab Orchard occurred. In the first of these battles his regiment lost in killed and wounded 148 out of 496 men. These sanguinary contests were followed by the five days' fight at Stone River, after which in rapid succession occurred the battles of Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Burnt Pine, Peach-Tree Creek and Kenesaw Mountain. The 19th and 20th of September, 1863, are memorable as the days on which the bloody battle of Chickamauga was fought. In this engagement his regiment was entirely surrounded by Confederate troops. Their Colonel ordered his men to cut their way through the enemy's line, and with a rousing cheer the command was obeyed; but out of 468 men all except twenty-six were killed or captured. Three of those who escaped were wounded, and Mr. Sterling was one of the three. He had received a shot through the hand. Being the senior officer of the regiment, he took command, which he maintained for some time. At that time he was not twenty-one years old. He took part in all the engagements under Sherman in his march upon the heart of the Confederacy, and it was a common saying that "the bloody Tenth Wisconsin lived on the line of battle." After their term of service expired the regiment remained on duty thirty days longer, during that period taking part in the battles that occurred before Atlanta, they forming a part of the Union forces that in triumph entered the city of Atlanta. Mr. Sterling had been slightly wounded three times, had entered the service when a boy, and when he was mustered out it was with the rank of Sergeant Major.

Soon after his return home from the war Mr. Sterling began the study of law at Shellsburg, Iowa. On account of failing health in 1874, he removed to Montana and settled at Helena. For a year he was engaged in contract lumbering and building here, and after that took charge of the lumber yards of A. M. Holter & Brother. In November, 1876, he was appointed by President Grant as receiver of public moneys in the Helena land office, and the following year was reappointed by President Hayes, serving in that capacity for the full term of four years. While in office he rendered faithful and diligent service and acquired a thorough knowledge of the laws relating to the public lands, and upon his retiring from office he began the practice of law before the Interior Department. That same year he was appointed Public Administrator of Lewis and Clarke county, and in 1882 he was nominated and elected Probate Judge, receiving the largest majority of any candidate on the Republican ticket. Before the expiration of his term as Probate Judge he was admitted to the bar and licensed to practice in all the courts of Montana. He is still engaged in the practice of his profession.

It was only four days after his enlistment in the army that Mr. Sterling was married to Miss Florence L. Rosecrans, a native of Beloit, Wisconsin, and a daughter of John Rosecrans, who was born in Ohio and who afterward became a resident of Wisconsin. Mr. and Mrs. Sterling have two sons. Fred J., the older, has for five years been a bookkeeper in the First National Bank of Helena; is married to Miss Fannie L. Fitz, of Minneapolis. Their other son, Harry H., is assistant teller in the Union National Bank, Kansas City, Missouri.

Mr. Sterling has an enviable record in fraternal circles. He is Past Commander of Woodsworth Post, No. 3, G. A. R.; Department Commander, P. M., I. O. O. F., of Montana; P. G., Excelsior Lodge, No. 5, I. O. O. F.; a member of Rocky Mountain Encampment, No. 5, I. O. O. F.; Morning Star Lodge, No. 5, A. F. & A. M.; Royal Arch Chapter, No. 2, A. F. & A. M.; and in politics is a Republican. He has a comfortable home at No. 544 Fifth avenue in Helena, where he resides with his family, and is ranked as one of Helena's most worthy and honored citizens.

times, and could not but take deep interest in the quarrel which came to me in my Idaho and Oregon exchanges with each mail, for I had known Montana and her men from the first; and I am convinced that this first legislature of Montana was far above the average, anywhere. And this will be the verdict of time. This legislature, following the vile example of earlier Territories, notably Oregon, granted a divorce. The act receives mention merely on account of the fact that it was the first thing of the sort in Montana, and for along time the last.

The governor was also a good man and just, wishing the new land well; for he was no stranger there, as was his secretary, Meagher, but he had Meagher's weakness for preferring, though in a less degree, his party before his people. On his return to the States his secretary became acting governor.

But entirely too much importance has been attached to these and like men in all our early history on this continent. The important man and the useful man is the one who brings in a good breed of horses, cattle or sheep, turns a furrow or fights the savage at his door and saves his little ones. This, in a way, each member of that first legislature was doing or trying to do when the rupture came and the governor, who had labored to call Montana into existence, impatiently went away.

General Horatio Stockton Howell, one of Helena's most prominent citizens, came to the Territory of Montana in September, 1866, and has since been identified with its history.

He was born near Trenton, New Jersey, November 11, 1843. His ancestors came from Wales to this country and settled in New Jersey, where the Howells have resided for 250 years. Among them have been many professional men,—ministers, lawyers and doctors,—and in the affairs of the country they have taken prominent and active parts, being represented in the war for independence. General Howell's grandfather, William Howell, was born at Trenton, and had a family of five sons and one daughter. His son, Samuel, who was our subject's father, was also a native of Trenton, and first saw the light of day in the same house in which several generations of the family had been born, his birth occurring in 1812. He married Miss Harriet Cook, a native of Philadelphia, and they became the parents of five children, of whom only two are living, Horatio S. and Joshua, the latter a resident of the State of Delaware. Samuel Howell was a farmer and a Presbyterian, living himself an honest and upright life and rearing his children in the strictest observance of the Sabbath and of the other commandments. His good wife died in 1849, he surviving her many years, his death occurring in 1881, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

Horatio S. was their second child. He was educated at Woodbury, in the public and private schools, and began life for himself as clerk in a store, being engaged in clerking in 1861, when President Lincoln made his first call for volunteers to defend the old flag. He enlisted in Company F, Fourth Regiment of New Jersey Volunteer Infantry. He was in General Carney's brigade, and the following spring they moved out with the Army of the Potomac and fought the first battle at Gaines' Mills. He and a number of others were captured, and for six weeks he was in Libby Prison. On the 7th of August he was exchanged and returned to the army at Harrison's Landing. He was a participant in all the hard-fought battles and glorious successes of the Army of the Potomac up to the surrender of General Lee. He entered the service as a private, was rapidly promoted for meritorious service, and November 19, 1864, received from Governor Parker the commission of Captain. From that date Captain Howell commanded his company to the close of the war, in a manner most creditable to him and worthy of the great cause in which he had drawn his sword, and while many brave heroes fell by his side, he escaped uninjured.

After the war he spent a short time in Philadelphia, learning telegraphy, and in the summer of 1866 came to Helena, Montana, making the journey by the Powder river route and up the Yellowstone, in company with a party of young men. He first engaged in placer mining, but not meeting with big returns he gave it up and accepted a position with the Wells-Fargo Express Company, who were succeeded in 1879 in the express business by Gilmer, Salisbury & Co., proprietors of the mail and passenger transportation business. In 1880 General Howell received the appointment of general superintendent of all their lines in Montana, in which position he served acceptably for five years, resigning in April, 1885, in order to accept the appointment of Receiver of Public Moneys for the United States Land Office, in which position he served with credit and honor until July 1, 1890. Since that date he has been engaged in the practice of land law, with office in the Power Block at Helena. He was one of the organizers of, and is a stockholder in, the Copper Bell Mining Company, having served as secretary of the company since its organization. He is also interested in ranching in Montana, he and a partner owning a stock ranch of 1,000 acres in Madison county, on which they are raising horses and cattle.

Mr. Howell was married November 20, 1872, to Miss Margaret Conway, a native of Iowa and a daughter of Robert Conway. They have two children, Imogene and Horatio R.

I find it set down so continuously in the histories, letters* and books of travel about Montana that her founders and first legislators were Confederates escaping from the draft, paroled prisoners and such, that it here becomes a plain duty to correct this ossified falsehood.

Now, in the first place, a man running away from danger would hardly have run to Montana —at this date, at least. In the second place, Montana was, as compared with the North, almost inaccessible from the heart of the South; and, I think, few sincere persons will now say that either a Northern man or a Southern man ever ran away from duty or danger as a rule. But concede, for the sake of a case, that they did run away equally, and that Montana was equally accessible to Northern knave or Southern, what then? The North had the numbers in her favor.—two to run away in the North, to where there was one to run away in the South.

Come, let us look further than this for the complexion and spirit of this first legislature of Montana. Mountaineers, as far back as the morning of history, have ever been impatient of dictation and foreign domination. The Greeks, who met millions with hundreds at the pass between the hot springs and the sea, were

*My friend, Colonel McClure, founder of the Philadelphia Times, the bosom friend of Lincoln and an excellent authority on almost anything but politics, attended this first legislature of Montana, and thus speaks of its members and work, in the New York Tribune of that period:

"The Montana legislature met last week. The senate —or council, as it is called--consists of seven, and the house of thirteen members. This county (Madison) elected the lone-star Republican legislator chosen in the entire Territory; and he was ruled out. His majority was not disputed; but they decided that they did not need him, and vacated his place. Both branches are, therefore, unanimously Democratic as they call it East; but the name is not in favor with most of its adherents here. They would much prefer to rally under the name 'Confederate,' and unfurl the flag that would truly symbolize their principles, but for the weak prejudices of their party friends in other northern portions of the Union, where things are called by diplomatic names Senator Davis, of this district,—an ex-rebel officer and a paroled prisoner of war,—was chosen president of the first legislative tribunal of Montana by an unanimous vote. Senator Watson, also of this district, contested the honor of the permanent presidency of the body; but he had been a legislator in Pennsylvania (from Washington county), and he State had furnished 60,000 loyal soldiers, and none to the banners of crime: hence he was not eligible. One of positive rebel proclivities was demanded, and easily [illegible] and he succeeded Davis to one."

All his life the subject of our sketch has been a reliable adherent to the Democratic party. As such he was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory in 1877, and in 1884 represented Madison county in the constitutional convention. He is now (1893) a member of the Board of Aldermen, from the Third ward of the city of Helena. For a number of years he has been an active and efficient member of the G. A. R., having held nearly all the offices in the order. He is also a member of the Loyal Legion. In the early history of Virginia City, before there was any law to authorize it, he formed a company of seventy-five men to act as National Guards, and by them was elected Captain. He served as Captain of this company until it disbanded. In 1883 he received the appointment of Inspector General of the National Guards of Montana, with the rank of Brigadier General, which office he held for two and a half years, until he resigned in 1885. In August, 1891, he received the appointment of Adjutant General of the State, and served until January 2, 1893, when he resigned to give place to the new State administration. He has always been very indefatigable in behalf of the National Guards, has done much for their success and advancement, and has had the pleasure of seeing their growth from one company to twelve companies of well-drilled and thoroughly equipped men, a credit to their State.

General Howell's career has been one of the highest honor. He is still a well-preserved man in the full prime of life, and has secured what is far better than great wealth—a good name. He is richly deserving of the high regard lavished upon him by his host of friends.

DR. WILLIAM CROSBY RIDDELL, physician and surgeon for the Great Elkhorn Mine, also engaged in a general practice in Elkhorn, was born in Vermont, December 14, 1863. His ancestors came from Scotland prior to the Revolutionary war. His father, Henry G. Riddell, was born in Massachusetts in 1836, and is now a retired merchant at Somerville, Massachusetts. He married Miss Emily Crosby, a native of Somerset, Vermont, and they had three sons, all now living.

William Crosby Riddell, the second child in order of birth, received his education in Brattleboro, Vermont, and in the Michigan State University at Ann Arbor, also graduating in the medical department of that university in July, 1886. He was soon afterward appointed by the Government as Physician to the Indian Training School men from the pastoral steeps of Parnassus and like mountains. The Austrian Tyral, the Italian Piedmont, all such remote mountain places, have tolerated but slight interference from the first. The oldest republic in the world, San Marino, that keeps loaded cannon in her towns, and coins money, defied Napoleon when he was in Italy, and he good naturedly sent another cannon. William Tell's people, worried even of their own rulers and dukes and princes, laid down their titles and became commons more than half a dozen centuries ago. If this was disloyalty, it was disloyalty to themselves only. But they were simply falling in line with the march of history and tradition. For as said before mountaineers have ever fretted under interference and despised the nonsense of kings and courts, even though their own. Sweep Montana to-day as clean of residents as the Tyrian rock, and the incoming people from whatever course or whatever cause, will, in a quarter of a century, have the same republican spirit and object to interference and dictation from whatever party or power in Washington, that marked the conduct of Montana from the first.

On the preceding page it is noticed that the first legislature of this State incorporated at Lawrence, Kansas, where he remained until 1889, and then accepted the appointment of surgeon of the Elkhorn Mining Company. The Doctor is still serving in that position. He is also the physician for the C & D Mine and the North Pacific Railroad, and also attends to his general practice in Elkhorn. Dr. Riddell is a member of the State Medical Examining Board, of the State Medical Association, the Lewis and Clarke County Medical Association, the American Medical Association, and of the National Association of Railway Surgeons.

The Doctor was married March 30, 1886, to Miss Nana P. Braden, who graduated at Ann Arbor the same time as her husband. They have two children,—John Plummer and Martha. Dr. Riddell has passed the chairs in the A. O. U. W. and the K. of P., and is Examining Physician for the former order. In political matters he sympathizes with the Democratic party.

H. J. WACKERLIN, the hardware merchant of Fort Benton, was born in Switzerland, March 18, 1848. His father, George Wackerlin, born also in that country, in 1824, married Miss Seomin Rüedey, and in 1852, emigrated to America, settling at St. Joseph, Missouri, where he engaged in the live-stock trade and spent the remainder of his life. His wife died in 1892, and he in 1894. Only three of their eight children are now living.

Hans J., the eldest child, was four years old when his parents came with him to America. He received his education at St. Joseph, and at the age of sixteen years, began the life of a merchant, first working in the drug business two years; next he began to learn the tinsmith and hardware business, working at it until he came to Montana, in 1867. Here he was first employed by Clark, Conrad & Miller a year; then he went to the small mining camp at Blackfoot, where he started in business for himself; and after spending two years there he went with Mr. Miller to Deer Lodge, and worked for him there three years. Then he visited Salt Lake City, returned to St. Joseph, remained there till the spring of 1873, married Miss Charlotte Redig, a native of Rheinfels, and with his bride, went up the Missouri river to Fort Benton. He opened his hardware business here in 1878, in which he has ever since carried a large stock and had a successful trade. In partnership, he has been associated with T. C. Power & Brother and the Conrad Brothers, while he himself has been the active partner, and thus the firm is one of the strongest in the State. They carry on both a wholesale and retail trade, and they have the only store of the kind in the city: and they also have a large and prosperous branch at Neihart.

Mr. and Mrs. Wackerlin have two children: Oscar I., who is now bookkeeper for the firm; and Edith, at home with her parents. Mr. Wackerlin has built a good residence in Fort Benton, where he resides with his family. He is a Republican, and a member of the I. O. O. F., is a thorough business man and an enterprising citizen.

HENRY CHAPPLE, a physician and surgeon of Billings, was born in Bowmanville, Ontario, in 1861, a son of William and Jane (Miller) Chapple, of English ancestry. The father was a farmer by occupation, also followed goldmining for a time in Australia, and his death occurred in 1893. Henry received his education at the Trinity Medical College, of Toronto, Canada, where he graduated in 1889, and in that year came to Billings, Montana. In April, 1889, he began the practice of his profession in this city, and became surgeon for the Northern Pacific Railroad, extending between Livingston and Forsyth.

Dr. Chapple was married in 1889, to Miss Mattie, daughter of Alexander Murphy, who was a merchant by occupation. In his social relations, the Doctor is a member of Ashlar Lodge, No. 29, F. & A. M., also of the Chapter and Commandery of Billings, and of Algeria Temple, at Helena. He holds the position of County Coroner, and is a member of the State Board of Examining Surgeons. In political matters, Dr. Chapple sympathizes with the Republican party.

the Historical Society of Montana. This society, though but miserably supported or provided for by the legislature, stands prominent in importance. Its books are not nearly as numerous, of course, as could be desired; but they are invaluable, and only here can be found entire the story of "The Path to India." Think of a historical society, on the top of the Rocky mountains, having an active correspondent in the veritable Captain Bonneville, United States Army,—the Bonneville of our boyhood! Irving's Bonneville!

I have not quoted generally from his "Adventures" in Montana, and environs, because they are written by Irving from Captain Bonneville's notes, and in Irving's stately language they miss that directness and point which seem to be the province of plain truth. Yet Bonneville was, or rather is, a graduate of West Point, and, like Lewis and Clarke, an officer of that army which never yet produced a liar, rogue or coward; and I dare say, if we could divest his wonderful "Adventures," written fifty years ago, of the garments of romance woven by Washington Irving, we would find only the cold, frozen truth. Yet his letter to the Historical Society of Montana, reaching up from the valley of Arkansas to the "Shining mountains," across a chasm of more than fifty

HON. GEORGE W. STAPLETON, a representative pioneer of Montana and one of the most successful attorneys now residing in Butte City, a native of the State of Indiana is, born on the 28th of November, 1834.

His father, Cyrus S. Stapleton, was born in Kentucky, in 1817, a descendant of an old South Carolina family, and married Miss Margaret Scott, a native of Kentucky and of Scotch ancestry. He was a physician by profession. After his marriage he removed to Indiana and subsequently to Illinois, and still later to Iowa, where he continued to practice his profession till the time of his death, which occurred in 1890, in the seventy-third year of his age. His wife had died at the age of forty-six. They were worthy members of the Christian Church, and by their death left six children, of whom four are still living.

Their son, the subject of this sketch, the eldest of the children, was educated at Fort Madison, Iowa. He read law under the guidance of Joseph M. Casy, in Lancaster, Iowa, and was admitted to the bar in November, 1855. After continuing in practice there till the spring of 1859, he crossed the plains to Colorado and followed his profession there before the miners' courts, and before the circuit courts after they were organized, until 1862, at which time he came to Montana.

In this State, at Grasshopper creek, he discovered the first gold found in paying quantities, and became one of the founders of the town of Bannack, which the miners desired to call Stapleton; but, as they were in the country of the Bannack Indians he gave it the name of that tribe as most appropriate. After engaging in placer-mining there for some time, taking occasionally as much as $20 to the pan from selected dirt, he purchased a claim a mile below, and with a little pine-box rocker took out from $200 to $500 per day! In the spring of 1863 Alder Gulch was discovered and he repaired thither. When he and his comrades had reached the Beaver-Head river, he wrote the laws by which they were to govern themselves at Alder Gulch, and he went in with the first wagon that was ever driven there. In partnership with Colonel McLean he obtained several claims and took out of them vast quantities of gold, but, like most of the early miners, "got rid of it" in one way and another very freely.

He remained at Virginia City until 1865, and then, upon the discovery of Last Chance Gulch, he went to that point and took claims, but practiced law; and, as the latter paid only about $900 a month and that was not sufficient to pay expenses, he proceeded to Ophir Gulch and tried mining there, but without success. Next he went to Argenta, in Beaver-Head county, and for some time tried quartz mining, with varied success, and also practiced law there.

In 1879 he came to Butte City. At that time most of the lawyers lived at Deer Lodge, as that was then the county seat. Here at Butte Mr. Stapleton was first associated in practice with Judge Pratt, and this partnership continued until Mr. Pratt's death, which occurred in 1881, and then the firm of Robinson & Stapleton was formed, which has continued to the present time. Mr. Stapleton's practical experience in mining gave him superior ability as a mining lawyer, and his most profitable practice has been in that direction. His firm is considered one of the best law firms, and they enjoy a very large and lucrative practice. He continues still to be interested in mining, and he has a number of properties which, it is believed, will be very productive.

In his views of national questions Mr. Stapleton has always been Democratic. He was elected to the Territorial Legislature four times, and during his time of service was Speaker of the House and President of the Senate. He was a member of the first code commission, and had much to do with formulating the laws which are now in force in this State; and he was also a member of the convention which framed the present State constitution. But he did not find that the holding years, speaks for itself. It would seem as if it must be from another world; but this is only one of a thousand such things that this society is digging up.

CAPTAIN BONNEVILLE'S LETTER.

"FORT SMITH, ARKANSAS.

"Dear Sir—Reciprocating your very kind and complimentary letter and circular, I would remark with every disposition to assist you in preserving interesting data respecting our far West of early days, after an absence of nearly half a century I must decline to review or attempt any addition to my journal; yet, as you appear to think the explorations of those days were only up to the Platte and down Snake rivers, it may be well for me to correct you a little in this matter. One of my parties was sent through the Crow country and came round by the north, and wintered with me on Salmon river; another party was sent south and wintered on the shores of Salt Lake; another journeyed into the Utes country, farther south, until it met the traders and trappers from New Mexico; another went down Salmon river, to Walla Walla, on the Columbia; another to coast around the Salt Lake; being out of provisions it turned north, upon Marias river,* followed this river down west to the eastern base of the California mountains, where it empties itself into large flat lakes; thence westward, clambering for twenty-three days among the of office was as remunerative as his law practice, and consequently has declined to become a candidate, as he has often been urged, for public office, especially at a time when to be nominated was to be elected.

Mr. Stapleton has been a Mason for a great number of years: was a member of the first lodge in the State, namely, Virginia Lodge, No. 1.

At Argenta, in 1870, he married Miss Cora E. McIntosh, a native of Missouri and a daughter of William L. McIntosh, and of Scottish ancestry. Mr. and Mrs. Stapleton have had three children—one son and two daughters; but only the son survives. Guy W. was born in Bannack, and is now taking the law course at the University of Virginia, Charlotteville, Virginia.

Mr. Stapleton has built a fine residence, where he now resides with his family. By a life of uprightness and strict attention to the cases he has taken in charge, he has established an enviable reputation, and enjoys the respect and good will of all his fellow-citizens.

GEORGE WILBER CRANE, a successful merchant of Fort Benton, came to Montana in 1866.

He was born in Middlebury, Vermont, November 27, 1843, remotely of English ancestry. His American ancestry he traces back to the Mayflower, at Plymouth Rock. His great-grandfather, James Crane, was born in Connecticut, and rendered his country valuable service in the Revolution as a soldier and in the hazardous work of carrying messages, and was the trusted bearer of the death dispatches of Major André. After the Revolution he engaged in the quiet vocation of agriculture, and lived to be ninety-six years of age. It is said that very late in life he could vault into his saddle as actively as in the days of his youth. His son, Ezra Crane, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born in Vermont, on the farm that had for a very long time belonged to the family. He lived on the farm on which he was born until 1854, when he sold his farm and moved to East Greenbush, New York, where he died in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He brought up five children. His son, James Edgar Crane (Mr. Crane's father), was born at the same home, in Vermont, in 1818, and married Miss Eliza B. Corlew, a native of Springfield, Vermont. He also lived on the same farm, and, like his father, reared five children, three sons and two daughters. In 1857 they emigrated to Illinois, and remained there till his death, in his sixty-second year, which occurred in Champaign county, in 1880, resulting from an injury received in a runaway. His wife has attained the ripe age of eighty-two years, residing now with her youngest son, in Jacksonville, Illinois.

The subject of this sketch, the second child, attended school both in Vermont and Illinois, learned telegraphy at sixteen years of age, was employed as operator on the Great Western Railroad, in Illinois, and was attending school again when the news flashed over the country that Fort Sumter had been attacked. To the first call of President Lincoln for volunteers to put down the rebellion he promptly responded, enlisting in the Lyon Guards, an independent rifle company, which was accepted by the United States Government. They organized at St. Louis, and were stationed at several points in Missouri. At the close of the term he was mustered out and returned to his home in Illinois, and at once became engaged in enlisting and forming Company I, of the Twenty-sixth Illinois Infantry Volunteers. With this company he served in the Fifteenth Army Corps, the Army of the Tennessee, and for eighteen months of the time of his service was on detached duty in the Quartermaster's department, and before the close of his service was its chief clerk, and was mustered out of the service July 19, 1865, at Washington, District of Columbia. He was an active participant in the following memorable battles: Island No. 10, New Madrid, Farmington, siege of Corinth, Iuka, the battle of Corinth, October 3d to 5th, siege of Vicksburg, Jackson, difficult passes of this elevated range, before it reached its Western or Pacific slope; thence to Monterey on the coast, where it wintered. In the spring the party going south turned the southern point of these mountains, on its way to the upper Rocky mountains; another party going west, down the waters of Snake river, to the base of the California range, turned southeast, and on the way home kept the divide, as near as practicable, between Marias river (now called Humboldt) and Snake; another party going north, round the Wind River mountains, followed the Po-po az-ze-ah, the Big Horn, and the Yellowstone down to the Missouri.

"The large clear stream in the valley immediately west of the South Pass was called by the Indians and early trappers the Sis-ke-de-az-ze-ah, afterward Green river. I was the first to take wagons through the South Pass and first to recognize Green river as the Colorado of the West.

"I presume most of my men are dead, nor do I know where any one of them can be found, except Mr. David Adams, who was one of my principal men. About two years since, I met him at St. Louis, Missouri. He told me he was preparing a journal of his mountain experiences. I have ever looked upon him as a man of truth. He may give you much valuable information; also the names of any of his companions who may be living. Mr. David Adams was then living on Soulard's addition to the city of St. Louis.

Mississippi, and Missionary Ridge,—in which latter engagement his brigade covered themselves with glory by their gallant charge, which resulted in the capitulation of the rebels on the ridge. During the whole of his services in these hard-fought battles he escaped injury; but exposure seriously affected his health, and he has since been more or less troubled with rheumatism. At the close of the war he was honorably discharged and returned to his home.

For a short time he was employed on a railroad. July 10, 1866, he started for Montana, crossed the plains as far as Fort Kearney, where his party was caused to stop by the soldiers there, on account of the hostilities of the Indians, who had just previously committed dreadful atrocities. Accordingly they wintered there. By spring their numbers had so augmented that it was considered safe to proceed. They reached Virginia City, Montana, September 10, 1867, and proceeded to, and wintered in, the Gallatin valley. For four years he mined in the vicinity of Helena, in a number of gulches and mining camps. He made several raises, but "dropped" it all before abandoning the vocation of mining.

He was next engaged in agricultural pursuits for a time, and in the fall of 1873 began merchandising at Clancy, in Jefferson county, which he continued until March 5, 1889, when he came to Fort Benton, and opened a news and novelty store. As his business increased he enlarged his establishment, and at length opened a general merchandising trade, in which he has since continued, doing a large and successful business. He now owns two residences, one of which he occupies. It is a brick house, with a mansard roof, commodious and handsome, and located opposite the courthouse, on Franklin street.

Since coming to Fort Benton he has taken an active part in public affairs, and is considered an enterprising and liberal citizen. He is a stanch Republican; has been Notary Public since 1873, has been also Justice of the Peace since 1886, City Councilman two terms, and Police Magistrate four years. In 1878, he was nominated by his party as a candidate for the Territorial Council. For fourteen years he has been secretary of the Masonic lodge at Fort Benton. He is also a member of G. K. Warren Post, G. A. R.; is also a K. of P., and Past Chancellor of the order.

February 14, 1877, he married Miss Julia Ione Payne, of Helena, Montana, who was born in New Mexico, the daughter of Rufus and M. E. Payne, of Kentucky, and they have had ten children, of whom five sons and two daughters are yet living, namely: Edgar R., Oliver B., Ezra L., George W., Jr., Julia Ione, Florence Elizabeth and James Payne.

Mr. and Mrs. Crane are charter members of the Episcopalian Church, and have aided in building their house of worship and in all the undertakings of their church. Mr. Crane is a very pleasant business man, enjoying the good will and full confidence of his fellow citizens.

HENRY J. SCHREINER, the leading merchant and Postmaster of Elkhorn, Jefferson county, was born in Ohio, in 1861. His father, John Schreiner, was born in Germany, but came to the United States when a boy, locating in Ohio. In 1882 he came to Montana and engaged in business at Bozeman, but now resides on a farm at Townsend. Mr. Schreiner married Miss Margaret Scharff, a native of Ohio and of German ancestry. They have had eleven children, six daughters and five sons, all of whom are still living.

Henry J. Schreiner, the second child in order of birth, received his education in the public schools of his native place and in the Chickering Institute, at Cincinnati, Ohio. He learned the mercantile business in his father's stores, in Middleport, Ohio, and Montana, and prior to coming to Elkhorn clerked in his store at Wicks. He located in this city in 1888, and immediately purchased the mercantile stock of Theodore Furken, the pioneer merchant of the place. Since that time Mr. Schreiner

"You say I had drifted from these scenes. Certainly not with my consent, for returning to my company of the Seventh United States Infantry, at Fort Gibson, I heard it mentioned the United States (the Government I should say) was not pleased with the treaty made with the Prairie Indians. The Indians had assembled in large numbers, and becoming sickly, they dispersed suddenly, thinking there had been some foul play toward them. Under this belief, thinking my experience might be of some service, I felt it my duty to offer myself to go and bring in any chiefs the Government might wish to confer with, asking for the purpose my company and only the remnant of merchandise, presents, etc., the commissioners had not disposed of. An influential Indian trader on this frontier, learning through his relatives at Washington city of my proposition, applied for the 'job' as he called it, got it, and afterward said to me, 'You do this for honor; I do it for profit.' He sold his goods.

"On another occasion, knowing the lucrative trade carried on over the prairies from St. Louis to Santa Fe, and satisfied the caravans could start from Fort Smith one month earlier, and by following up the Canadian river would find wood and water in full abundance, I started the subject in Arkansas, and explained its advantages through the columns of the Arkansas Gazette. The State becoming deeply interested, the governor, legislature, and senators moving has given his undivided attention to his store, keeps a large and general stock of merchandise, does business on a liberal basis, and has a large and remunerative trade. April 8, 1893, he received the appointment of Postmaster of Elkhorn, under President Cleveland's administration. He purchased a new and tasteful office outfit, and is making an obliging and prompt Postmaster.

In 1881 Mr. Schreiner was united in marriage with Miss Carrie Rickerts, a native of Ohio. She is an efficient helper in their store and office. In political matters, our subject supports the Democratic party; and socially, is a member of the K. of P. and I. O. O. F. He has passed all the chairs in the latter order, and has also represented his lodge in the Grand Lodge.

Hon. Charles R. Middleton, City Attorney for Miles City, was born near Afton, Washington county, Minnesota, January 31, 1853, a son of Samuel and Mary (Colter) Middleton; paternal ancestry, Scotch; maternal, Irish. His father was the first Justice of the Peace in his district, in Washington county, Minnesota, where he had settled in 1849, and where he reared four children,—one son and three daughters.

Charles grew to manhood in his native State, but was educated at the State University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, in the law department of which he graduated in 1881. Soon afterward he began the practice of law, at Stillwater, Minnesota, where he remained until 1884. In July, of that year, he opened a law office in Miles City. In 1885 he was appointed Deputy District Attorney, under Judge Blake, who was at that time District Attorney. He filled that position until 1886, when the office of County Attorney was created. He was elected City Attorney for Miles City, in 1888, and has been continuously re-elected ever since, and holds the position at the present time. He was elected to represent Custer county in the Lower House of the Montana Legislature, in 1889, and the following spring was elected to the State Constitutional Convention. He is a member of the Board of Trustees of the State Reform School, recently established and located at Miles City, appointed to the position by Governor Rickards, and is the only Democrat on the board. He was appointed by Governor Toole as World's Fair Commissioner, succeeding E. H. Johnson, who resigned. He was appointed by S. T. Hauser, president of the Montana Silver Convention; as a delegate to attend the convention held at Chicago, during the World's Fair; and also to go to Washington, District of Columbia, during the extraordinary session of Congress, to intercede in behalf of the silver interests of the silver-producing States. He is a prominent attorney and has a large practice. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and has filled the Master's chair in Miles City Lodge for three years; also filled the position of Deputy District Grand Master in and for Bozeman district, for one year. He has been twice elected General Lecturer by the Masonic Grand Lodge of Montana. He is also a member of the Patriotic Order Sons of America, and was the first president of the Camp at Miles City.

He was married in 1884, to Miss Ida Ruth Castle, daughter of Umpstead and Rosetta Castle, natives of Canada. Her brother, James M. Castle, of Stillwater, Minnesota, represented his county in the State Senate five terms, and was elected to Congress in 1892, although he was a Democrat, in a district usually giving 400 Republican majority.

Mr. Middleton and wife have two sons, Elbert C. and Charles Reginald. Mrs. Middleton is a member of the Episcopalian Church.

Hon. Samuel L. Holliday.—A history of Montana, and especially of Gallatin and Park counties, would fall short of awarding merit did it fail to mention the services and sterling qualities of Samuel L. Holliday. He is an unassuming gentleman,—and when we use the word gentleman we mean it to apply to Mr. Holliday in its fullest sense. He is a calm, forcible reasoner and a man of excellent foresight and judgment in his own business matters as well as in public affairs.

in the matter. I proceeded to the city of Washington, where, with the assistance of Senator Borland, I obtained an order for an escort of fifteen to twenty men, around which, as a nucleus, several traders had agreed to accompany me. I delayed five or six days to explain to traders the preparation necessary for the trip. Upon my arrival at Fort Smith, I found General Arbuckle, the officer commanding this frontier, had assigned Captain Marcy, nephew of the Secretary of War, Governor Marcy, to this duty. Captain Marcy and his escort started.

"My object was to bring this lucrative trade through the valley of the Arkansas, for the benefit of a State I had made my home; also to trace what, in my opinion, is the best and shortest route from the Mississippi to the Pacific, with the advantage that it was practicable the whole year—one I have frequently urged as best for railroad purposes. * * * I was in the Florida war with Taylor, Armistead, and Worth; in the Mexican with Wool, Taylor, and Scott. After the Mexican war, while at Fort Smith and Gibson, my mind naturally turned to the prairies. It was then I urged the Canadian route to the Pacific, now called by any other name than mine. The Gila war was undertaken because of thefts and murders of long duration, to punish the murder of Agent Dodge, which occurred during my temporary command. * * * My regiment was sent to Texas, where I found my junior,

Samuel L. Holliday was born in Hamilton county, Indiana, in 1840, son of John H. and Anna (Garrett) Holliday. The Holliday ancestry is not so well defined as should be. We can only partially trace it. Adam Holliday came from Belfast, Ireland, to the United States and located in Kentucky during its early settlement. From him it is stated the Hollidays in this country have descended. Tradition says that there is a large estate in Ireland due the Hollidays in the United States. Samuel L. Holliday's father was one of the pioneers of Indiana, and was Judge of court there for many years. Our subject was only ten years old when his father died, and four years later the family removed to Winterset, Iowa.

Young Holliday made the best of his opportunities for an education, eagerly studying both in school and out, and by the time he was sixteen years old had acquired sufficient knowledge to enable him to teach, and for two years he was engaged in teaching. After his marriage, which event occurred about the time he reached his majority, he gave his attention to farming, being thus occupied in Iowa for a few years. But he was called from the farm to public life when he was elected Auditor of Madison county, Iowa, in which capacity he served four years. Following this he was for some years engaged in the grocery business, and also operated a meat market in Winterset, being thus occupied up to 1879, when he sought a home in the great West, and located in Bozeman, Montana. In the spring of the following year he brought his family to their new home on the Yellowstone, six miles from Livingston, where he had located valuable land, and where he now owns 1,200 acres. This tract he utilizes for both agricultural and stock purposes. He raises large crops of grain, potatoes, etc., his oats crop alone amounting to 8,000 bushels this season (1893). This land is watered by a fine irrigating system. Mr. Holliday also owns another fine ranch in Park county.

In 1882 he was elected one of the Board of County Commissioners of Gallatin county, which at that time also included the present area of Park county. In 1886 he was elected Senator to represent Gallatin county in the Territorial Legislature, and during the time he was a member of that honorable body he proved himself well worthy the confidence of his constituents. He was an energetic and successful worker. It was his untiring energy that secured support to the bill setting off Park county, which all concede a wise measure, as there is a natural topographical division between Park and Gallatin counties. During his term in the Legislature he was chairman of an important committee and was a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Since retiring from public life he has devoted his whole time to his farm and stock. Indeed, he is one of the leading agriculturalists and stock men of the county, and his sons are also engaged in business with him. Mr. Holliday is a member of Livingston Lodge, No. 32, A. F. & A. M., and is also a member of the Chapter and Commandery. His name is on the list of charter members in both the lodge and chapter, and of the former he is now Senior Warden. From his early manhood he has been a stanch Republican, but now expresses himself as willing to welcome any party that shows capacity and disposition to do more good for the whole people than has the Republican party. He and his wife are members of the Congregational Church.

Mr. Holliday was married in 1861 to Miss Maria Dabney, daughter of Henry Dabney, formerly a resident of the State of Virginia, but at the time of their marriage living in Iowa. Mr. and Mrs. Holliday have four children, two sons and two daughters: John, Orion S., Florence and Nellie. Florence is now the wife of C. S. Hefferlin, a resident of Livingston and an enterprising and successful business man who has done much to advance the interests of this place. The sons reside with their parents; and Nellie was married in May, 1894, to John W. Hefferlin, a member of the firm of Hefferlin Brothers, merchants of Livingston, Montana.

Colonel Robert E. Lee, in command — a very clever officer and gentleman, but being my junior, hence my petition. General Twiggs was then sent to relieve Colonel Lee, and while under orders to be relieved, McCulloch grabbed San Antonio and stores of the department. Colonel Waite, the officer assigned to relieve General Twiggs, found the department in rebel hands. He was my junior. I had been dangerously sick, had applied for sick leave; this I received as Colonel Waite arrived. I wrote to him that if he did not recognize the surrender, I would remain and assist him; he replied that he would carry out the arrangement made by General Twiggs. Then I told him I accepted my sick-leave. I proceeded to St. Louis, Missouri. Shortly after, ordered to Washington, before the retiring board, and by the board retired. Again put on duty, in command of Benton barracks, and mustering and disbursing officer. When the law passed removing all retired officers from duty, I came here, and opened a farm, on lands I purchased from the United States in 1837, where I am now, in my old age, a farmer, my family with me. * * *

HON. GEORGE WILLIS REEVES, Missoula, is a prominent member of the Montana bar. He was born on his father's farm in Ballard county, Kentucky, February 10, 1847, and is a descendant of early settlers of both Virginia and Kentucky. His father, William Harrison Reeves, was born in Culpeper county, Virginia, in November, 1812, while the mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Penelope B. White, was a native of Kentucky. Her father, Rev. Willis White, a native of Tennessee, was a missionary Baptist minister and was one of the earliest settlers of Kentucky, he having located on what was then known as the Jackson purchase. William H. Reeves and his wife ended their days in Kentucky, she passing away at the age of fifty-five and he at seventy-five. They reared a family of eight children, all of whom are living except one.

Judge Reeves, the subject of our sketch, was the second born in this family. He was reared on his father's farm in western Kentucky and his early education was received in the common schools of the county. In 1865 he began the study of law in the office of his uncle, Judge James D. White, of Ballard county, and was admitted to practice in November, 1867. He entered upon his professional career in Ballard and McCracken counties, spending much of his time at Paducah, and continuing thus occupied up to 1878. Previous to his admission to the bar he had served three years as Deputy Clerk of the court of the county. In 1878 he was elected to represent the Second Senatorial District in the State Senate of Kentucky, and served in the sessions of 1879 to 1882 inclusive. Then he was elected Clerk of the Senate for the session of 1883–4.

After the expiration of his clerkship in 1884, Judge Reeves came to Missoula, Montana, taking up his abode here in May of that year. The following September he was tendered by the Democratic party the nomination for Probate Judge of the county, and was elected by a majority of 300 votes. At the close of his term he was re-elected, and served until 1887, at which time he resigned in order to give his attention to the practice of law. Since that date he has conducted a lucrative and successful law practice.

Judge Reeves was married December 1, 1870, to Miss Mary E. Marshall, a native of Kentucky and a daughter of Judge Charles S. Marshall. She died on the last day of November, 1889, and was buried on the nineteenth anniversary of their wedding day. She left three daughters,—Emily Marshall, Alice White and Katie, all natives of Kentucky.

Judge Reeves is a member of the Masonic fraternity, is Past Master of the blue lodge, Past High Priest of the chapter, and is also a Scottish-Rite Mason. He has passed all the chairs in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is a member of Friendship Lodge, No. 61, A. O. U. W., of Paducah, Kentucky. He belongs to the Christian Church, of which his wife was also a member. Up to 1892 he was a stanch Democrat, but the position of that party on the free coinage of silver not being in accordance with his views, he became a Populist. By the latter party he was nominated for Judge of the Fourth Judicial District, and in 1894 was nominated by his party for Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of Montana and was opposed by regular Democratic and Republican nominees; he was defeated by the Republican nominee by a small plurality, the Democratic nominee being a poor third in the race. He canvassed the district, making a very strong campaign and doing efficient work for his party, and at the election ran far ahead of his ticket. The Judge is a man of fine mental equipoise and of genial disposition, and has made hosts of friends since coming to Montana. He built and resides in one of the handsome residences of Missoula.

JOHN S. DOUGHERTY, an expert metallurgist, is now superintendent of the famous Anaconda Smelting Plant, the largest works of the kind in the world. Mr. Dougherty was for many years connected with the noted Consolidated and other mines in the State of Michigan, the Yellowstone; also one higher up. Mr. Tullock, I think, was in charge of that up the Yellowstone. Half a century is a long time to look back, and I do so doubting myself.

CHAPTER XX.

SECOND CHAPTER ON THE BENCH AND BAR, BY JUDGE DECIUS S. WADE—THE JUDICIAL VESTMENT OF THE ORGANIC ACT FOR THE NEW TERRITORY—JUDICIAL DISTRICTS AND THE FIRST JUDGES TO SIT ON THE BENCH—MONTANA WELL SUPPLIED WITH ABLE JURISTS—TERM OF OFFICE—THE BANNACK STATUTES THAT SET THE MACHINERY OF LAW IN MOTION—STRENGTH OF THE BAR—OLD LAWYERS AND NEW LAWS—MINING LAWS AND WATER RIGHTS—THE FOUNDATIONS OF A TEMPLE TO ENDURE—NAMES OF SOME PROMINENT LAWYERS—SECOND, THIRD AND FOURTH LEGISLATURES—THE CALIFORNIA PRACTICE ACT—THE NEW CHIEF JUSTICE—ASSOCIATES—FIRST VOLUME MONTANA REPORTS—FIRST GREAT QUESTION IN COURT.

FROM 1864 TO 1870.

IN 1864, upon the organization of the Territory, other judges came to enforce the miners' rules and regulations, to start the machinery of the criminal law, and to carry into effect the provisions of the organic act.

This act vested the judicial power of the Territory in a supreme court, consisting of a chief justice and two associate justices, district courts, probate courts, and in justices of the peace; and provided that the Territory should be divided into three judicial districts, in which district court should be held by one of the justices of the supreme court, at such times and places as might be prescribed by law. These district courts were of general jurisdiction, and besides had the same jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States as is vested in where he had charge of the concentrating department. He became so proficient in this work and so favorably known that when the famous copper magnate, Marcus Daly, proprietor of the Anaconda mines, at Butte, erected the largest smelting plant in the world, now in operation at Anaconda, Mr. Dougherty was sought for and engaged to take charge of the concentrating department of these great works. A minute description of them cannot be given in this personal sketch, but some idea of their immensity can be gained when it is stated that their daily capacity is about 7,000 tons of ore, 350 tons of coal being used in the process each day. Mr. Dougherty has been in charge here since 1886.

He was born in 1852, and when twenty-seven years of age, was married to Elizabeth A. McDowell, daughter of James McDowell, assistant master mechanic of the Cleveland Iron Mining Company, Cleveland, Ohio. They have had six children, five of whom are living, named respectively, Ambrose, John, Bernard, May and Alice.

Politically, Mr. Dougherty is independent, and favors free coinage of silver. He is a member of the A. O. U. W.

HIRAM R. MARCYES is the leading general merchant at Forsyth, Custer county, Montana. His ancestry on paternal side was English and on maternal side Scotch. He was born in the State of Maine, in 1844, son of Lambert and Vienna (Bartlett) Marcyes. His father was a the circuit and district courts of the United States. Never were any courts organized by Congress or by any State government that had so extensive jurisdiction as the Territorial courts. They possessed at once the jurisdiction of the State and United States courts.

Appeals went up from the district courts to the supreme court of the Territory, and from thence directly to the supreme Court of the United States in all cases involving the sum of $5,000. One criticism of the Territorial system is that the trial courts and the appellate court were composed of the same judges, and hence it was sometimes said that the justices of the supreme court confirmed their own errors as judges of the district courts. But the criticism was hardly just, for a reference to the Reports will show that the decisions of the district courts were often reversed, and that the decisions of the Territorial Supreme Court were in a large majority of cases affirmed on appeal to the United States Supreme Court. Subsequently, and not long before Montana became a State, the Supreme Court was provided with an additional justice, and the justice who tried the case below did not take part in the decision on appeal to the Supreme Court. This was a better arrangement and gave satisfaction alike sailor in his younger days and for a time captain of a vessel. The Bartletts were noted sea men. Captain James Bartlett, of Boston, was prominent as a sea captain. Hiram's parents with their children moved from Penobscot county, Maine, near Bangor, where he was born, to Minnesota in 1854, where he grew to manhood on a farm, attending the public schools.

In 1861, then in his seventeenth year, he enlisted in the Fourth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, Company I, in Rice county, Minnesota, was drilling during the early part of that year, and later mustered into service at Fort Snelling as a musician. He participated in the battles of Corinth, Iuka, campaigns ending with the surrender of Vicksburg, Grand Gulf, Raymond, Jackson, Champion Hills, Mississippi, etc. After the surrender of Vicksburg his command marched to and wintered at Huntsville, Alabama, were in the battle of Missionary Ridge, November 24 and 25, 1863, then with General Sherman along the Western & Atlantic Railroad, and with General Corse at the famous battle of Alatoona, Georgia. He was sitting in front of the house which was the headquarters of the Minnesota troops on the east side of the railroad cut at Alatoona, where the rebels' first cannon-shot passed through the building, after which it knocked over a stump near Mr. Marcyes and his comrade, Leonard Seibert.

After the battle of Alatoona they went to Rome, Georgia; thence to Atlanta, where they again joined General Sherman and participated in all the battles, privations and thrilling incidents of that famous march from Atlanta to the sea, culminating in the surrender of Johnston in North Carolina, and putting an end to the war. Although a musician and the leader of a band, Mr. Marcyes never missed a battle, always entering an engagement with a gun and doing good work. He never missed a battle and never attended a sick call during the war. He served from beginning to the end and participated in the grand review at Washington, District of Columbia, which was a day of rejoicing for the boys who were the blue and had proven themselves patriots tried and true. The most severe part of their campaign in the South after reaching the sea at Savannah, was through the Carolinas.

After the war he returned to Minnesota, stopping in Lyon county, where he constructed and operated a large flour mill, and also owned and carried on a farm, also taught music until 1881, when he made a trip to Montana and looked the country over with a view of availing himself of such opportunity as might offer to do a profitable business. Deciding that Forsyth, then a station on the Northern Pacific Railroad, was a promising point, in April, 1882, he located there with his family, and at once opened the first stock of general merchandise at that place. He has made a wonderful success and has an immense trade, which has been made by his persistent industry and just dealing, and he is widely and favorably known. His fine brick residence, erected in 1890, is one of the best in the Yellowstone valley and a credit to any city. In 1887 he erected his fine brick store building. All his improvements are of the best and an ornament to the town.

He was married in 1876 to Miss Louise Loffelmaker, of Minnesota, whose parents are deceased. When she was a little girl her parents and her family barely escaped butchery at the hands of the Sioux Indians, who had surrounded the fort at Ridgely, Minnesota, and were prowling over the county, killing the inhabitants. They took their children after night, passing through an opening left by the Indians in forming their lines around the fort, eluding the savages, and reaching the fort unobserved were saved. Mr. Marcyes and wife have five children, one son and four daughters: Claude, Ida, Eva, Grace and Ollie.

He is a member of the Masonic fraternity at Miles City, also of the A. O. U. W. at Forsyth. He has taken an active part in educational matters at Forsyth, serving as a Trustee of the school, also as Justice of the Peace. While in camp at Huntsville, Alabama, and his time of enlistment near expiring, he re-enlisted for the term of to the judges and the lawyers. After all, there ought not to be much pride of opinion in reversing or affirming any case, for there may be found precedents upon the opposite side of almost every question, and no doubt, if there were still higher courts to which appeals might be taken, the process of reversing and affirming would still go on. That which makes a court of last resort important is the fact that from its decisions there is no appeal.

Montana having received a name and a Territorial organization on the 26th day of May, 1864, President Lincoln, in June, of that year, appointed Hezekiah L. Hosmer, of Ohio, Chief Justice, and Lorenzo P. Williston, of Pennsylvania, and Ammi Giddings, of Connecticut, Associate Justices of the Supreme Court. Giddings declined the appointment, and in March, 1865, Lyman E. Munson, of Connecticut, was appointed Associate Justice. Hosmer lived at Virginia City and presided in the district courts of the First, Williston at Deer Lodge and presided in the district courts of the Second, and Munson at Helena and presided in the district courts of the Third. Judicial District. Probate courts were established in each county, and every settlement and mining camp was provided with a justice of the peace and constable.

DUDLEY C. BASS, a Montana pioneer of 1864, and one of the proprietors of Pine Grove Fruit Farm in the Bitter Root valley, two miles northwest of the town of Stevensville, was born in Clarendon Springs, Vermont, August 10, 1842. His ancestors were among the early settlers of Vermont and New York, and his father, William B. Bass, was born in the latter State in 1811. He married Miss Ruth Childs, a native of Vermont. After marriage they resided thirteen years in Glens Falls, New York, in 1855, removed to Chicago, and in 1858 to Jefferson City, Missouri, where Mrs. Bass died, in 1861, leaving three sons and one daughter. In 1871 the father came to Montana to reside with his son Dudley C., where he was afterward engaged in the wood business for several years, and his death occurred March 24, 1893, at the age of eighty-two years.

Dudley C., the third child in order of birth, was thirteen years of age when he removed with his father to the West, and was raised in Chicago and Jefferson City, Missouri. After attaining his majority he became interested with his brother, William E., in the hotel business, first at Sedalia, and later in Clinton. In 1864 they crossed the plains with mule teams to Alder Gulch, Montana, where they mined for a time, but, not meeting with the desired success, decided to turn their attention to agricultural pursuits. They then located on their present farm, where they first engaged in raising hay, grain and vegetables, and for which they found a ready sale at paying prices in the mining camps. The brothers were prosperous in all their undertakings, and from time to time added to their land until they now have 800 acres, which contains a good frame residence, and all necessary buildings. The place is beautifully situated at the side of the Bitter Root mountains, is surrounded by fine groves of pine, from which the farm derived its name, and the dwelling is not only embowered with a natural grove, but also by trees of their own planting.

The Bass Brothers were among the first to discover that their section was adapted to fruit-raising, and to that branch of industry they are now giving their almost entire attention. Their first planting was in 1871, and at that time the venture was looked upon by most people with the greatest of doubt and distrust; but time has proven the wisdom of their efforts. The brothers are now among the leading fruit men in the State, have erected large packing houses, and have taken orders as far East as New York city. They are also largely engaged in raising vegetables, and many of their cabbage heads have reached the weight of forty pounds. In addition to their other interests, the Bass Brothers are raising a fine grade of Durham cattle and Norman-Percheron horses, were interested in the saw and flouring mill business, and have taken railroad contracts. They built twenty-five miles of the Northern Pacific road eastward from Missoula, and also furnished ties for sixty miles of the Bitter Root branch of the same road.

The Bass Brothers married the daughters of L. S. and Eva Emmett, of Windsor, Missouri. W. E. Bass was married in 1862, to Miss Jennie, and in 1874 D. C. Bass was united in marriage with her sister, Miss Etta. To the latter union has been born one son, Lee E. William E. Bass has served a number of terms in both the Territorial Assembly and in the Council, and has the honor of being elected Speaker of the Council. The brothers are identified with the Democratic party. D. C. Bass has recently taken charge of the ranch and is now the manager, while W. E. Bass is engaged in other business. He is an active, intelligent business man, and is richly entitled to the wonderful success which he has accomplished on his Pine Grove fruit farm.

Chris Nissler

Y. Lovell, Theo. Muffly, Cornelius Hedges, Sidney Edgerton (first governor of the Territory), Elanson C. Moore, John P. Bruce, R. H. Robertson, Edward Sheffield, Jerry Cook, John C. Turk and William L. McMath are among the lawyers who arrived in the country about the time of, or shortly after, the organization of the Territory, and commenced the practice of their profession.

And so Montana came to be well supplied with judges, courts and lawyers; the miners' courts gradually fade away and disappear, their thrilling scenes and incidents pass into history, their rules and regulations enter into the structure and body of the law, their judges and presidents lose their authority and jurisdiction, but retain their titles; the period of government without law has passed away. It had been a period of peril and hardship, of unconquerable energy and courage, but during its existence the seeds of an imperishable commonwealth had taken root.

The organic act did not do much more than to furnish the framework for a Territorial government, and from its date until the enactment of what are known as the Bannack Statutes, in

CHRIS NISSLER, the Silver Bow brewer, dates his arrival in Montana in 1865, and is therefore classed with the pioneers of the State. A brief sketch of his life is herewith presented:

Chris Nissler was born in Germany in 1836, and the first sixteen years of his life were spent in his native land. Then he emigrated to the United States. He located in Philadelphia and there spent four years in learning the trade of baker and confectioner, and in 1856 made the passage to San Francisco, via the isthmus, arriving there on the 14th of March. In Sacramento county he worked three years at his trade, and then for three years more carried on a prosperous business for himself. After that he prospected for gold in California, Oregon and Idaho, and finally located in Virginia City, Nevada, where for three years he was employed in a brewery, and learned the business thoroughly. In 1864-'65 he was engaged in the laudable business of supplying families with good water, drawing it from place to place with a horse and cart, and doing a successful business.

In 1865, as above stated, Mr. Nissler came to Montana, the date of his arrival in Virginia City being April 28. From Nevada to Salt Lake City he traveled by stage, the passage costing $120, and from the latter place to Montana he journeyed with a pack-horse and was twenty days on the road, camping at night by the roadside and with no protection save his blanket. He purchased a placer-mining claim at German Gulch, and after working there a month without any success he tried his luck in California Gulch. There, too, he met with failure. Then he went back to German Gulch and worked for wages a few months, or until winter set in. The following winter, and in fact a whole year, he was employed in a baker shop in Helena. Then came the Salmon river "stampede," and with what money he had saved he started with others for the diggings in that region. After an absence of three months he returned to Montana, ready to begin life anew, he having lost all his savings. Securing a placer claim in Bear Gulch, he went to work and in six months got out $2,000 worth of gold. This claim was then practically exhausted, and he returned to German Gulch. There he purchased an interest in a brewery, paying $3,000 for it, and, in partnership with Alfred Mohler, he was engaged in the manufacture of beer for about two years. In this enterprise he lost money, by reason of the miners seeking richer fields of labor and the camp going down.

In 1871 Mr. Nissler came to his present location at Silver Bow. He purchased a log building that was located on Main street in Butte City, where the First National Bank now stands, and this building he took down and hauled to Silver Bow. It served his purpose as a brewery until 1886, at which time he built his present store and brick brewery. He was the first to establish a beer depot at Butte City and also at Anaconda. His beer being a choice article and being known far and near for its excellency, he has a ready sale for all he can manufacture.

In 1878 Mr. Nissler was married to Miss Christiana Koncelman, a native of Germany, and they have six children, namely: Louisa, Christiana, Mable, Chris, Grover and Doris,—all born at their home in Silver Bow.

Mr. Nissler became a member of the I. O. O. F. in 1860, in California, and he is also identified with the A. O. U. W. Politically, he is a Democrat. He has ever shown a deep interest in the public affairs of his town, and especially in its educational advancement. For a number of years he has served as School Trustee. Mr. Nissler has the thrift and energy so characteristic of his countrymen, and, like many a poor German who has come to this country with no capital save a strong arm and a determination to succeed, he has by perseverance won his way to the front; indeed, the success he has attained far has been far beyond his most sanguine expectations.

JOEL J. BOND, County Superintendent of Schools of Ravalli county, Montana, was born in Jefferson City, Cole county, Missouri, February 1, 1841. His grandfather, Joel Bond, was a native of Scotland, emigrated to America in 1806 and settled in the South. He was an honest January, 1865, by the first legislative assembly, though there were judges and courts, there was no law to set the machinery in motion.

Upon the enactment of the Bannack Statutes the legitimate reign of the bench and bar begins. These are controlling forces in every civilization. The interpretation and application of the law to the complicated and complex affairs of human life, and the administration of equal and even-handed justice, are among the highest and noblest employments of the human mind. The task is always difficult, even when experience has added precedents and decisions to point the way; but in a new country, surrounded by such conditions as required a reconstruction or departure from the principles and precedents of the common law, inhabited by resolute, enterprising men from all the States and from almost every land, who brought with them different and conflicting ideas of what system of law and practice should prevail, and how rights should be adjudicated and enforced, the task of starting the wheels of government, of protecting life and property and adjudicating rights became more difficult still.

and industrious farmer, and lived to the age of sixty-two years. He reared five children, one of whom, William M. Bond, born in Kentucky, in 1817, was the father of Joel J. He removed to Missouri and settled on a farm, where he passed the residue of his life. His wife, nee Sarah M. Sullans, was also a native of Kentucky. They had a family of four sons and one daughter, of whom our subject was the second son.

Professor Bond received his early education in the public schools, and later attended the State University of Missouri at Columbia. Previous to his entering the University he had taught school two years, and after his graduation he taught twelve successive years in Missouri. His health then failed and he was advised by his physician to seek a change of climate. April 14, 1881, he landed in Stevensville, Montana. Here he soon recovered his health, and again engaged in the profession, teaching at Stevensville and at Victor for a number of terms. Meanwhile he has invested considerable in real estate. He owns a farm six miles southwest of Victor, has several lots in Victor, and on one of these lots he has built a nice home.

Professor Bond was married in 1868 to Miss Elizabeth Baker, a native of Boone county, Missouri, and the daughter of Rev. Barnabas Baker, a Baptist minister. They have five children: Anna J., Jessie H., Hattie L., Judson B. and Daisy S. Their oldest daughter, Anna J., is a popular and successful teacher in the Stevensville schools, and the second, Jessie H., is a music teacher.

The Professor and his family are members of the Baptist Church at Stevensville. He is identified with the A. O. U. W., and has for a number of years been financier of the lodge. His political views are in harmony with the principles advocated by the Democratic party, which he has supported all his life. He has several times served as Justice of the Peace, and when the new county of Ravalli was organized the Legislature of Montana selected him as the most suitable person for County Superintendent of Schools. He accepted the appointment, and is now serving in that capacity. He has thirty-one schools under his supervision. His long experience as a teacher and his thorough acquaintance with the most advanced ideas on educational matters, together with his enthusiastic love for work, eminently fit him for the position he occupies.

JAMES M. JOHNSON, the leading merchant of Hamilton, Montana, was born in Marion county, Missouri, December 12, 1841.

His ancestors were among the early settlers of New York, where his father, William Johnson, was born, in 1818. When a young man he removed to Missouri, where he was married, in March, 1841, to Miss Nancy R. Sharp, a native of Kentucky and a descendant of an old Virginia family. Her grandfather, Richard Sharp, was a soldier in the Colonial army during the Revolutionary war, and was killed in the battle of Yorktown. William Johnson learned the carpenter's trade in New York, but in Missouri engaged in farming. He was a devout Christian and a worthy man. He died from pneumonia, in October, 1846. His wife is still living, aged seventy-two years. They had two daughters and one son.

James M., the subject of this sketch, remained in Missouri until sixteen years of age, and then drove an ox team across the plains to Pike's Peak, arriving in that wild mining country without money or friends. He employed himself in mining and other occupations until the spring of 1861, when he retraced his steps back to Palmyra, Missouri.

On the 10th day of June in that year he enlisted as a private soldier in the army of the Southern Confederacy, and did honorable service in Company D, commanded by Jeptha Fagan, of the First Missouri Infantry Regiment, commanded by Colonel John S. Bowen, until the memorable fall of Vicksburg. After this surrender—at which place he was made prisoner of war—young Johnson consented to take the oath of allegiance and returned to Missouri.

In the spring of 1866 Mr. Johnson returned to Colorado and opened a small store at Cañon City. Being an active worker and possessed of the highest integrity, his trade increased rapidly, and he became one of the leading

The cumbersome machinery of the district courts, which required them to exercise jurisdiction in a double or triple capacity, and to act as United States circuit and district courts for causes arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, with separate officers, grand and trial juries, processes and forms of practice and procedure, and at the same time to hold Territorial district courts with separate officers, grand and trial juries, processes and forms of practice and procedure, for causes arising under the laws of the Territory, rendered the situation complicated and required time, study and patience to produce efficient action.

The term of office of the justices of the supreme court was four years, unless sooner removed for cause by the president. The governor, secretary, marshal, United States district attorney, surveyor general, collector of internal revenue and of customs, and of register and receiver of the land office, were appointed by the same authority, and held for the same term and by the same tenure.

It was always a subject of complaint, and a cause of discontent in the Territories, that the people were not given the privilege of electing officers from their own numbers, and this feeling increased in intensity as the Territories increased in population and wealth. It was business men of the town. In 1882 he returned to Missouri, purchased a farm, and also engaged in merchandising at Monroe City, until 1887, in which year he came to Montana and purchased a ranch in Bitter Root valley, near the present site of the town of Hamilton. He resided in the city of Helena two years. In the spring of 1890 he built the first storehouse and opened a general merchandise business in the now thriving and busy town of Hamilton, which has grown to a population of more than 1,000 souls. Mr. Johnson has built up a large business here, the trade of the town extending over a vast area. His goods are purchased at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and San Francisco. In addition to his mercantile interests, Mr. Johnson owns valuable real estate at Hamilton, Stevensville, Missoula, Helena and other places, and loans some money.

In political matters he has been a life-long Democrat, and has had the honor of being elected as County Commissioner of Missoula county, an office which requires good executive and financial ability. When the county of Missoula was segregated and the county of Ravalli created, Mr. Johnson was named in the enabling act of the Legislative Assembly as one of three commissioners eminently fitted to settle the business between the parent county and the new one. After getting the machinery of the new county thoroughly in working order, as chairman of the Board of County Commissioners, desiring now to give his undivided attention to his own business interests, he resigned the office.

In 1865 Mr. Johnson was married to Miss Judith E. Rogers, a native of Virginia and a daughter of Stephen Rogers, of Marion county, Missouri, and they have had one son, named James M., who is a young business man of ability and now employed as bookkeeper for his father.

In his social relations Mr. Johnson has passed all the chairs in the Odd Fellows' order. As a citizen and business man he has made an excellent record, and since coming to Montana has taken deep interest in all that pertains to her development and welfare.

On the 15th of September, 1894, at the Democratic county convention, Mr. Johnson was nominated by acclamation as a candidate for State Senator of Ravalli county, Montana. The election will take place November 6, and as there are three tickets in the field it is impossible at the time of writing to predict the result; but Mr. Johnson is a strong candidate and will carry more than the strength of his party.

FERDINAND KENNETT, president of the Western Montana National Bank, of Missoula, came to Montana in 1867, and has been identified with Missoula since 1873. A few of the facts in regard to his life are as follows:

Ferdinand Kennett was born in St. Louis, Missouri, May 31, 1840, and claims both the Scotch and the Irish as his ancestors, his forefathers having settled in this country during the Colonial period and having participated in the great struggle with the mother country for independence. His father, Mortimer Kennett, was born in Falmouth, Kentucky, January 22, 1809; his mother, nee Mary H. Beebe, a native of Connecticut, was born October 18, 1813. They were the parents of ten children, four of whom died in infancy, and five of whom are still living, Ferdinand being the fourth born. During their early married life Mortimer Kennett and his wife moved to St. Louis, where they reared their family and where they spent the residue of their lives. He was a steamboat captain on the river for many years, and during his long residence in St. Louis he made many friends.

In St. Louis Ferdinand Kennett spent the first sixteen years of his life. At the age of sixteen he went to Helena, Illinois, where he accepted a position as errand boy in a store, receiving $100 the first year. He continued to work for the same firm until 1862, being promoted from time to time until he occupied the responsible position of charged, and probably with considerable truth, that these offices were kept within the gift of the president to be bestowed as rewards for political service, and so it happened that though the people of the Territories had no voice in the election of a president, they were really more interested in his election than the people of the States, for the reason that he appointed for the Territories all the officers, which in the States were elected by the people.

There was also serious objection on the part of the people of the Territories, that these offices were filled by the appointment of non-residents from the States. These officers, coming from the far East or South, were looked upon as intruding strangers—"carpet-baggers"—men who came to reap the emoluments of office while it lasted and then to leave the country, having no interest in it. This was unjust to the person appointed in most instances, but it had the effect of making the people of the Territory deeply interested in national politics.

This precarious tenure of office was injurious to the building up of institutions, and was especially detrimental to a harmonious and symmetrical system of decisions by the courts. Montana was favored in this respect, one of its bookkeeper. This was the old and well-known house of Foster & Stahl. The civil war coming on, he resigned his duties at the desk, and in September, 1862, enlisted in Company I, Twenty-ninth Missouri Infantry, and was with the forces that operated along the Mississippi river. February 24, 1863, he received from the Secretary of War the appointment of Paymaster's Clerk. This appointment was signed by Adjutant General Thomas. In compliance with his orders he was mustered out of the service and entered upon the duties of his office, in which he continued until the close of the war.

After the war Mr. Kennett went to Peshtigo, Wisconsin, and was there for two years, engaged in lumbering. In 1867 he came up the Missouri river to Montana, making the trip on the Octavia, which was commanded by Captain Le Barge, the pioneer steamboat captain on that river. They were thirty-two days in making the voyage. Mr. Kennett went to Phillipsburgh and was for four years in the employ of the St. Louis & Montana Mining Company. In 1871 he went to Helena to accept the position of bookkeeper in the First National Bank of Helena, and in that position he remained until 1873. In 1873 he came to Missoula as cashier of the Missoula National Bank, the bank being started at that time. This position he filled in a most efficient and acceptable manner for fifteen years, until by close confinement his health became impaired and he was forced to resign. After that he made a trip to Europe. Upon his return to Montana the following year, his health being greatly improved, he resumed business at Missoula. In May, 1889, he became one of the organizers of the Western Montana National Bank, was elected its president, and is still serving in that capacity.

In 1875, at Galena, Illinois, Mr. Kennett was married to Miss Helene A. Wierich, a native of that place, and a daughter of Dr. Augustus Wierich, who was born in Germany. Mr. and Mrs. Kennett have had four children, three of whom are living, namely: George H., Helen A. and Sarah A.

Ever since coming to Montana Mr. Kennett has taken a deep interest in its affairs, both as a Territory and a State, and with Missoula he has been prominently identified, giving his support to all measures intended to advance its interests. He has all along affiliated with the Republican party, but by no means is he a politician. At one time he was elected Mayor of Missoula, but while thankful for the honor conferred upon him by his fellow-townsmen, he declined to serve. He and his wife aided in the organization of the first Presbyterian Church at Missoula, they being two of its eight charter members. He was elected one of the Elders, and still holds that position. In 1868, at Phillipsburg, he was made a Mason, and on coming to Missoula he put his membership in Missoula Lodge, No. 13, and with this lodge he is still connected, being now its Treasurer. Mr. Kennett began life at the bottom of the ladder, and by honest industry and economy worked his way up to prosperity. In 1883 he built one of the fine residences of Missoula, and here he resides with his family, surrounded by all that goes to make life happy.

JOHN WILHART, a well-known stock dealer of the Beaver Head valley and a resident of Twin Bridges, has been in Montana since 1863.

Mr. Wilhart was born in Germany, September 28, 1838, the son of German parents, and was reared and educated in his native land. When he was sixteen he started out in life on his own account and emigrated to America, landing in New York city friendless and alone. His first work in this country was on a farm in New York State, for which he received his board and $6 per month. In this way he worked for two years. He had brought some money with him and with this and the earnings he had saved he in 1856 went to Illinois. Two years later he made a trip through Kansas and other parts of the West and in 1859 went back to Illinois. The following spring he crossed the plains to Pike's Peak with a mule team, after which he prospected from Denver to New Mexico, hauling his provisions with an ox team and him-chief justices holding office for more than six teen years, one associate justice for eleven, and another for nearly nine years, while one Governor continued in office for twelve years.

Montana was also favored by the fact that members of the bar who practiced in the miners' courts and in the early days of Territorial existence, and who became eminent in their profession and foremost in building up the law, continued to practice through the Territorial period, and are still in the practice, and who, being familiar with every phase of its legal history, have taught the judges how to make their decisions correct and harmonious. Practice for a quarter of a century by eminent lawyers at the same bar could not fail to produce uniformity of decision and harmony in the structure of the law. The Montana Reports have always been well thought of by the profession both at home and abroad, and one of the reasons is the strength of the bar behind them. Valuable reports are as much the work of the bar as of the bench.

The first term of the supreme court was held at Virginia City, then the seat of government of the Territory, in May, 1865, Chief Justice Hosmer presiding, with Williston and Munson associate justices. It is unfortunate that these self walking most of the distance. He finally traded his oxen for a pack horse with which he returned, walking all the way, a distance of 300 miles. He spent the winter at Golden and in the spring engaged in gardening on Rallston creek, raising vegetables and selling them for a good price to the miners. He continued this business until 1862, the last year proving an unsuccessful one for him. Then, in company with Mr. Leslie Harlling, he secured an outfit of ox teams and provisions and together they started for Idaho. Although the Indians were troublesome that year and robbed and murdered many of the emigrants, Mr. Wilhart and his companion made the journey in safety and landed at Bannack about the middle of May, 1863. He secured a claim and mined there about two weeks, during which time he was very successful, at times taking out as high as $500 in a day; but on hearing of the discovery of Alder Gulch, he left Bannack and went to that point where about 500 miners had already congregated. He secured a claim in the gulch, which, however, he soon traded off for a horse. After prospecting for a while and not meeting with any success, he worked some at whipsawing. In December, 1863, he came to Jefferson valley and spent the winter in hunting and trapping. In the spring of the following year he and a Mr. Thomas Sours were engaged with two yoke of oxen plowing a piece of land on which they intended to plant vegetables. One morning before they had yoked up the cattle a man came along and attempted to confiscate their oxen, and when they objected the man shot Mr. Sours in the mouth. Mr. Sours returned the fire, his shot taking effect in the hips of his adversary who was afterward taken to Nevada and there died of his wounds. After this Mr. Wilhart and his partner spent considerable time in prospecting. They located Prairie Gulch and many other claims which afterward turned out to be very valuable.

In 1866 Mr. Wilhart engaged in the dairy business, at which he continued until 1873, selling butter at $1.50 per pound, and in 1873 he turned his attention to stock-raising. In 1881 he purchased his present place and in 1886 built the fine residence he now occupies. His ranch contains 650 acres of valuable land adjoining the town of Twin Bridges, and on his broad acres he keeps an average of 1,000 head of cattle and as many horses, his cattle being chiefly Durham stock, which he thinks is best adapted to this country. He has one fine Norman-Percheron horse, but the most of his horses are Clydesdale. He still has an interest in some valuable mining prospects.

Mr. Wilhart was married May 2, 1886, to Mrs. J. H. Drehner, nee Malvina Henney, a native of Illinois. Her father, Daniel Henney, is a resident of Nebraska. She has two daughters, Pearl May and Flora E., both by her first husband.

In politics, Mr. Wilhart is a Democrat. He is an active worker in the temperance cause, a member of the Good Templars, and is a prominent Granger, he having helped to organize the grange at Twin Bridges. Public-spirited and generous, he has done much to advance the interests of the town.

He gave twenty-eight acres of his land to the Montana State Orphans' Asylum, of which institution he is a Trustee. Few men in Twin Bridges are more highly respected than is John Wilhart.

CHRISTIAN DARNUTZER, one of the representative farmers and stockmen of the Beaver Head valley, dates his arrival in Montana in 1865.

Mr. Darnutzer was born in Switzerland, November 19, 1829, and until he was thirteen remained in his native land, receiving his early education there. Then he came to America, joined his brother in Iowa, and spent the home with him until 1850. In 1850 he went to California. On the overland journey he drove a team of five yoke of oxen, leaving Omaha, Nebraska, on the 1st of May, and after four months of travel, landed safe in the Golden State. The only misfortune that happened on the jourjustices, during their period of office, delivered no opinions in writing, for thereby their valuable services to the Territory and to the profession have, to a great extent, been lost. They did not seem to comprehend that they were laying the foundation of a great structure, to endure for all time. We know from the records of the district courts and of the supreme court that the litigation of that period was extensive and important, and that it related chiefly to placer claims, to water for mining and irrigating purposes, and to possessory rights in public lands.

The doctrine of the prior appropriation of water for the purpose of placer mining; that the first appropriator thereof for such use became entitled thereto as against subsequent appropriators—first in time first in right—had taken root in the pre-Territorial days under the rules and regulations of the miners, and under the provisions of the Bannack Statues of 1865, and the act of Congress of July 26, 1866, the doctrine was extended and made to apply to water for agriculture or any useful purpose. The application of this doctrine, which had arisen in California, and was born of the necessities of placer mining and the arid condition of the country, and which overturned that of ney was the drowning of one of his party while they were crossing the Humboldt river. For four years he was engaged in mining in El Dorado county, and while he was successful at times, taking out $1,700 in ten months, he invested his money in an unsuccessful enterprise, and lost all he had. After this he kept a miners' supply store and boarding house, and while he was thus engaged, there came a great freshet which obliged the miners to quit work and go elsewhere, and thus many of the bills due him were never paid.

In 1859 he returned to Iowa, and was there when the war broke out. In the spring of 1861, when the first call for volunteers was made, he enlisted in Company E, Fourteenth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and served in the Western Department, in the Sixteenth Army Corps, under General Sherman. The first winter he spent with his regiment in St. Louis; in the spring they were ordered to Cairo, Illinois, and their first fight was at Fort Henry, whence they proceeded to Fort Donelson and captured the fort. During that engagement a ball cut his canteen strap from his shoulder. In the battle of Shiloh a ball passed through his hat. At the latter place he and a part of his regiment were captured, were taken to several Southern points, and finally to Libby prison, where he was confined seven months. At the time he entered the prison he was strong and well, and while there he became so weak from want of proper fook that he was unable to walk. During the greater part of the time he was a prisoner he was detailed to issue rations to 100 men, their food being corn meal,—ground cob and all,—each man cooking his allowance in a tin cup and without salt. Occasionally they had rank bacon. At last they were paroled, and as soon as they were strong enough to travel, went to St. Louis to be reorganized, About this time Mr. Darnutzer took a severe cold, was sent to the hospital, and his sickness resulted in the loss of sight in his left eye, When he left the hospital he was honorably discharged, his term of service having expired.

In the spring of 1865 he and a number of others organized an emigrant train, composed of 105 men and eighty-five wagons, to cross the plains to Montana, and of this train he was elected captain. After a journey of two months they arrived safe at Virginia City, on the 8th of July, 1865. His brother, Nicholas, had preceded him to Montana, and was engaged in mining here. He shared his mine with his newly arrived brother; who at once went to work, and from July until November took out $4,000 worth of gold. Then our subject returned East by stage coach, the fare being $500, and the next season he conducted an emigrant train of 105 wagons across the plains. That year the Indians were so troublesome that the emigrants had to have a permit from the Government before starting. At the Big Horn they were attacked by the Indians, but their only loss was some of their cattle. Two of the Indians were killed, one being shot by Mr. Darnutzer. On this second trip to Montana Mr. Darnutzer brought with him forty cows, with which to establish a dairy, and came at once to his present location in Beaver Head valley. Here he purchased 480 acres of land, which he has since developed into one of the finest stock ranches in the valley, having improved it with good buildings, etc. In the stock business he has met with success from the first, and at times has had as high as 400 head of cattle.

Mr. Darnutzer was married May 17, 1871, to Miss Augusta Carpenter, a native of Iowa, and a daughter of John Carpenter, who moved to Iowa from Ohio. They have four children; Augusta V., John C., Carl N. and James P. Both Mr. and Mrs. Darnutzer are charter members of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Blaine, have been useful members of the church since its organization, and he is now serving as one of its Stewards.

Mr. Darnutzer cast his first presidential vote for Stephen A. Douglas, but when the war was inaugurated he became a Republican, and has ever since given his support to that party. He is a member of the G. A. R.

riparian rights as known to the common law, and the adjustment of controversies and rights consequent thereon, and questions growing out of the possessory rights in the public lands, and of practice, occupied largely the attention of the justices of the first period.

The prominent lawyers of that period, in addition to those already named, were: Henry N. Blake, Alex. M. Woolfolk, Thomas R. Edwards, Green Clay Smith, L. G. Sharpe, John H. Shoper, John C. Robinson, R. E. Arick, Henry Burdick, Joseph J. Williams, Thomas J. Lowry, Walter F. Chadwick, Sample Orr and A. G. P. George. *

The second and third legislative assemblies met before the close of the year 1886 and enacted statutes, all of which were abrogated by Congress,—for one reason, among others, that the law providing for representation districts had lapsed, and the members therefore had not been legally elected. The legislative assembly again met, in the year 1867, and enacted what has been known as the California Practice Act, and other statutes. The Bannack Statutes were crude and uncertain, and were not printed until some time in the year 1866, and those of the session of 1867 were not printed until the summer of 1868. This dearth of statutes during

ALEX DOW, post trader and dealer in general merchandise, Arlee, Montana, was born in Salt Lake City, Utah, March 2, 1862, and is a son of Alex and Ellen Harris Dow, the former a native of Beauharnois, Canada, and the latter of Herfordshire, England, who when a child came with her parents to America and settled in Nauvoo, Illinois; they subsequently removed to Salt Lake City.

The parents of Alex Dow, Sr., lived and died in Canada. At the age of eleven years young Alex ran away from home and went to St. Louis, where he lived until the breaking out of the Mexican war, when he enlisted and marched and fought with the victorious armies of our country during that struggle, Chapultepec being the last battle in which he participated. He was discharged near Fort Bridger and soon after began riding the pony express, which he followed for several years. In 1861 he was married to Ella Harris and three years later moved to Virginia City, Montana, and engaged in placer mining, meeting with only moderate success. During the winter of 1864–5 he settled in Deer Lodge and in the spring located near Frenchtown, and engaged in farming until 1881, when he moved to the Bitter Root valley, residing there until 1890, when he joined his son Alex at Arlee, where he remained until his death, January 17, 1891, at the age of sixty-nine years.

Mrs. Dow, the mother, is still living and resides with her son. Of five children all but Alex are deceased. He was but two years old when his parents located in Virginia City, and but four when they settled near Frenchtown. Here in the primitive schools, he obtained a rudimentary education. Schools were few and far between, scholars were few and scarce, young Alex and his sister sometimes representing the numerical status of their school. Subsequently he was privileged to attend a night school and thus terminated his school days. At the age of nineteen years he began herding cattle and assisted in driving herds to the railroads for shipment. Early in 1883, he opened a grocery store in Frenchtown, during the construction of the railroad at that place, but the business not proving congenial he disposed of it. His next venture was in horses. In the spring of 1884 he [illegible] a band into Canada on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, this trip being successful and occupying his time for two years. In the spring of 1886 he settled in Thompson Falls, engaging in the butchering business and handling cattle until 1889, in the spring of which year he purchased A. L. Demars trading post at Arlee, where he has since done a profitable business.

*One of the earliest and ablest lawyers in Montana was W. Lair Hill, although he devoted his attention to fine stock and quartz mines rather than the practice of law, and remained but a short time. In 1884 he began, and in 1887 completed, a recodification of the laws of Oregon from the earliest settlement down to date, with annotations from the decisions of the Supreme Court of that State, of the sister States, and of the United States, upon questions arising under those and similar statutes. This work was in two volumes, entitled "Hill's Annotated Laws of Oregon." His annotations, I think, were more extensive and complete than those in any similar work published in any State down to that time.

In 1890–1–2 he did a similar work upon the laws of the State of Washington, but pushing the codification more into detail and extending the annotations still further than in the Oregon books. This is in two volumes, ent tled "Hill's Statutes and Codes of Washington."

The Oregon books were started as a private enterprise, but before completion were taken up and authorized by the legislature of the State. The Washington books were undertaken under an act previously passed by the legislature appointing him a commissioner for that purpose.

In 1892 a second edition of the Oregon books was issued with the annotations brought down to date. He is the most modest of men and avoids all mention of himself, although he is in his way the ablest counselor west of the Rocky mountains.

the first judicial period, the lack of courthouses and places for keeping records, the widely-scattered population and the distances for the judges, litigants, lawyers, jurors and witnesses to travel to the county seats and to the capital, made the courts expensive, and surrounded the administration of justice with great difficulties and delays. Perhaps the justices of the first period, as most of the people of that time did, thought that the occupation of Montana by white people would only continue while the placers were being worked out, and that records and decisions were hardly worth preserving in a country so soon to become again an uninhabited wilderness. At that time the stock industry had not been dreamed of, the agricultural capacity of the country was unknown, and the exceeding richness in gold and silver quartz, lead, coal and copper was yet to be found out.

The first justices of the supreme court were now near the end of their term (1868). Hosmer, after he retired from office, soon removed with his family to California, where he engaged in literary pursuits. He was a writer of ability. He wrote "The Octoroon," which was famous in its day and brought fame to its author. He also wrote "Shakespeare in his Sonnets," which has been extensively read and

On August 25, 1890, he was united in marriage to Mrs. Mary B. Smith, daughter of J. W. Wiedin, from which union there is one daughter, Mary.

By her first husband, Mrs. Dow had two children, Joseph W. and May Smith. Mrs. Dow died June 29, 1893, at the age of twenty-seven years. Mr. Dow is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having become a member of the Lone Star Lodge, No. 33, at Thompson Falls in 1888. Subsequently by demit he joined Covenant Lodge, No. 7, at Missoula, and is also a member of Encampment No. 5, at the same place; is a member of Union Lodge, A. O. U. W. No. 3, and is a member of the Select Knights.

Mr. Dow is an affable gentleman, a good entertainer, and of incorruptible business integrity. He has a host of warm and true friends, and will doubtless continue as one of the most successful merchants of this section.

M. S. PARKER, a resident of Great Falls, Montana, has acquired a national reputation as a civil engineer. He was the pioneer in the development of the water power of the Missouri river, at Great Falls, he having built the dam at the Black Eagle falls. Thus it may be said that he put in motion the wheels which have had so much to do with the phenomenal growth of the city of Great Falls.

Maurice Stiles Parker was born in Groveland, near Haverhill, Massachusetts, December 3, 1851. Both his paternal and maternal ancestors settled in Essex county, Massachusetts, during colonial days. His great-grandfather, Joshua Harnden, served with distinction as a Colonel in the Revolutionary army. The Parkers have for generations been a family of farmers and manufacturers in the East. Niles G. Parker, the father of our subject, was born in Massachusetts, January 26, 1827. He married Miss Nancy Jones, a native of Haverhill, who died in 1864, at the age of thirty-nine years, leaving a family of two children, one of whom died in infancy. The father died April 7, 1883, at the age of sixty-seven, and thus M. S. Parker is the only survivor of the family. Niles G. Parker served as a Colonel in the Union army, during the civil war.

The subject of our sketch received his early training in the public schools of his native place. In 1869 he entered West Point, where he remained two years. Then he went to Berlin, Germany, and took a four-years' course in civil engineering in the Gebewebe Academy. Upon his return to America, in 1875, he engaged in general engineering, chiefly in railroad work. He was with the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad five years, and was afterward with the Burlingtou & Great Northern. He located over 500 miles of road for the Great Northern alone, which is more than the average railroad engineer locates in a lifetime, and he estimates that he has located in all about 1,000 miles of railroad. In this particular his record undoubtedly surpasses that of any other engineer. He first came to Great Falls with the the Great Northern when it was constructing its road, and in 1890 he came with Mr. Hill to the town to become the engineer of the Great Falls Water Power & Town Site Company, and took charge of the water power development at the Black Eagle falls. Be it said to his credit that it is conceded in engineering and hydraulic circles that at no other place in the world is water power better laid out and the construction more substantial than at this place. Since coming here Mr. Parker has also engineered the construction of the massive iron bridges which span the Missouri river at Great Falls, and among other work he has engineered may be mentioned the First National Bank building and many other fine blocks of the city.

Mr. Parker was married in 1875 to Miss Minnie Burns, a native of La Crosse, Wisconsin, and they have one daughter, Helen C.

Fraternally, Mr. Parker is identified with the Order of Elks, the A. O. U. W., and the American Society of Civil Engineers. In his political views he is independent.

admired. He died in California in 1892. Williston and Munson resumed the practice of their profession in the States whence they came. They were men of distinction before and after their official terms in Montana. Williston died in Pennsylvania, in 1893.

The coming of Henry L. Warren as Chief Justice, appointed from the State of Illinois, successor to Hosmer, and of Hiram Knowles as Associate Justice, appointed from the State of Iowa, successor to Williston, in July, 1868, was the beginning of a new era in the judicial history of the Territory. They were experienced lawyers of unusual ability, in the prime of life, energetic and ambitious, and of high, unblemished character. They at once commanded the respect and confidence of the people and of the bar. Knowles had known something of life in the mining camps of the far West, having previously lived in Nevada, where he had practiced law and been prosecuting attorney. They organized order out of the chaos of the courts. By an amendment to the organic act, the justices of the supreme court were clothed with authority to define the judicial districts of the Territory, to assign the justices to their respective districts and to fix the time and place of holding the district courts.

CAPT. WILLDEN PINKHAM, a representative business man and an influential citizen of Butte City, Montana, forms the subject of this article.

Captain Pinkham was born in Booth Bay Harbor, Lincoln county, Maine, May 4, 1839, a descendant of English and Scotch ancestors who came to America previous to the war of the Revolution. His grandfather, Nathaniel Pinkham, served as a soldier in that war and also in the war of 1812. He lived to be ninety-four years of age. His wife, whose maiden name was Elizabeth McFarland, was of Scotch descent, and she, too, lived to an advanced age, being eighty-nine at the time of her death. They reared a family of thirteen children. In both the McFarland and Pinkham families have been many seafaring men,—ship owners and captains.

Our subject's father, Captain Jason Pinkham, was born in Booth Bay Harbor, Maine, in 1811. He married Abigail Tibbets. The Tibbets family were of English origin, while on her mother's side—her mother being a Louis—there was a mixture of French and Welsh blood. They had five children, of whom only two are living. The mother died in 1893, in her eightieth year, and the father is still living, now at the age of eighty-three. She was a Baptist. The Pinkhams have long been prominent members of the Congregational Church.

Captain Willden Pinkham was the first born in his father's family. He was educated in his native town. At the age of fourteen he went to sea as a cabin boy, and he followed the sea in the West India trade for ten years, having during that time risen from the position of cabin boy to that of captain of the vessel. When the great Civil war burst upon the country he retired from the sea and enlisted his services in the Union cause, becoming a member of Company E, Fourth Maine Volunteer Infantry.

In the fall of 1864 Captain Pinkham went to Boston, where he was engaged in the package express business until 1870. He then came West as far as Ottawa, Kansas, and turned his attention to contracting and building, in which he was engaged for five years. From 1875 to 1880 he was engaged in the same business in Wyoming. When the Utah & Northern railroad was built he was the boss carpenter of the line and erected all the bridges on the road as far as Dillon. In the spring of 1881 he came to Butte City and on the ninth of March laid the first railroad tie laid in Montana, from which he now has a cabinet made; and at Monida he drove the first railroad spike—a silver one. It was not long after this that he became associated with Mr. White—now ex-Governor White of Dillon—and others in the purchase of the town site of Dillon. They formed a syndicate, paid $10,500 for the tract of land and laid it out in town lots, and made an auction sale, selling $14,000 worth of lots. They still own a considerable portion of the town.

In April, 1881, Captain Pinkham, becoming convinced that Butte City had before it an era of great prosperity, came hither and cast his lot among its citizens. For a few months he carried on his contracting and building business, and then he and a partner opened a furniture establishment in which he was interested until 1893. That year he and others organized the Butte Auction & Commission Company, of which Captain Pinkham is president and Isaac Genzberger secretary and treasurer, and other members of the firm being Segmond Genzberger and Samuel Kolberg. They are doing an auction or commission business, although that was a part of their intentions when the company was organized, but they keep an extensive stock of general merchandise, including all kinds of novelties, gentlemen's furnishing goods, books, etc., and occupy two floors, each 22 x 100 feet, their place of business being at No. 22 West Park street.

Since coming to Butte City, Captain Pinkham has invested largely in property here. Besides his own beautiful and attractive home, he has erected a number of business blocks and residences.

They did not lack for power and they exercised it to promote the orderly administration of justice. They adopted rules for the supreme court similar to those of the supreme courts of the States, pointed out how transcripts on appeal should be made, provided for the filing and service of briefs, and required every decision of the court to be in writing and filed with the clerk.

The first volume of the Montana Supreme Court Reports begins with the first term of that court after the advent of Justices Warren and Knowles, which term began in the month of December, 1868. The eighteen decisions rendered in important cases and reduced to writing by them at that term bespeak their learning and energy. (See 1 Montana pp. 1-110.)

Justice Munson does not appear to have been in the Territory after the arrival of Justices Warren and Knowles, and in April, 1869, George G. Symes, of Kentucky, formerly of Iowa, was appointed Associate Justice to succeed him. Symes had served with distinction in the Union army during the war of the Rebellion, and though not a lawyer of large experience, he was a good student and very ambitious. He resided at Helena, Knowles at Deer Lodge, and Warren at Virginia City.

Questions of practice, to a great extent, occupied the attention of the court at its December

He was married in September, 1863, to Miss Francis H. Ransdell, a native of Pembroke, Maine, and a daughter of Captain George W. Ransdell. After twenty-six years of married life, she was called to her last home, her death being a source of great bereavement to her family and host of friends. She was a graduate of the Massachusetts State Normal School and was a lady of more than ordinary intellect and amiability. She left two children—Etta, now the wife of E. S. Boothe, one of Butte City's promising young lawyers; and Jason William Pinkham, of Butte City. Captain Pinkham's second marriage occurred in September, 1892, the lady of his choice being Alice Matherly.

In politics, he has been a Republican since that party was organized, his first presidential vote being cast for Abraham Lincoln, and for many years he has been an active and efficient worker for his party. He has served as Chairman of the Republican County Central Committee, is now serving his fourth term as Chairman of the Republican City Central Committee, was Sanitary Officer of the city one year, and has served three terms as one of the City Aldermen.

Fraternally, he is a member of the I. O. O. F., and is an active worker therein. He has been Grand Patriarch of the State of Montana, has been Grand Representative to the Sovereign Grand Lodge, and was first Captain of the Patriarchs Militant. He is the first Past President of the P. O. S. of A., and he is now President of Camp No. 18, and Grand Master of Forms of the State Camp of Montana.

The Captain's many estimable qualities and his geniality and cordiality make hima general favorite wherever he goes.

DR. HENRY WESTON STEPHENS, of Anaconda, Montana, was born in St. Joseph, Missouri, March 17, 1862. His father, Peter Stephens, was born in the State of Kentucky in the year 1832, a descendant of Scotch-Irish ancestry. He married Miss Pernina Crank, a native of Ohio, her people being of English origin. When the great Civil war burst upon the country, Peter Stephens volunteered his services, and, as Captain of Company B of one of the Missouri Volunteer Regiments, he served with distinction until the close of that sanguinary struggle. After the war he settled down to farming in Missouri and was engaged in agricultural pursuits there until 1882, when he came with his family to Montana. They have since been residents of Anaconda and he is now retired from active life. Their two children are Anna, wife of Charles Graham, and the subject of this sketch.

Dr. Stephens received his early education in the public schools of his native State. He began the study of medicine in the office of Dr. C. F. Knight, and subsequently entered Ellingsworth Medical College, where he graduated in 1882. Previous to his coming to Montana, he was for two years engaged in the practice of his profession at St. Joseph, Missouri, and since 1884 he has been indentified with Anaconda, doing a general practice which has increased with the growth of the town. And while he conducts a general practice, he makes a specialty of the diseases of women, in the treatment of which he has met with eminent success.

Dr. Stephens was married in 1888, on the first of January, to Miss Catharine Knight, a native of San Francisco and a daughter of Olcut Knight of California. They have three children—Lucinda, Ruth P. and Anna. The Doctor built and owns the comfortable and attractive cottage he and his family occupy.

Fraternally, he is indentified with the A. O. U. W., the K. of P., Woodmen and National Union, and for all these societies he is Medical Examiner. His political affiliations are with the Republican party, but he is liberal and independent in his views. As a skilled physician and worthy citizen, he is held in high esteem at Anaconda.

term in 1868. At the session of August, 1869, a question of vital importance arose, which involved a consideration of the nature and jurisdiction of the Territorial district courts under the organic act, and as to what distinction, if any, should be made in the trial of actions at law and causes of equity. The case was that of Kleinschmidt et al. vs. Dunphy (1 Montana 118), which was a creditor's bill to set aside a mortgage as fraudulent and to subject the property conveyed thereby in the hands of the defendant to the payment of the judgments of the plaintiffs.

In 1867, the Legislative Assembly had enacted a civil practice act, which provided that "there shall be in this Territory but one form of civil action for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress or prevention of private wrongs," and that "an issue of fact shall be tried by a jury unless a jury trial is waived." But the organic act gave to the district courts chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction, and the question was, whether the distinctions in the trial of an action at law and a suit in equity had been abolished. The case was tried as an action at law and special issues were submitted to the jury. The respective parties were ably represented,—Chumasero & Chadwick, Shober & Lowry, Word & Spratt, and W. F. Sanders appearing for the plaintiffs, and Woolfolk & Toole and Davis & Thoroughman for the defendant. The jury (three-fourths of the

WILLIAM MORRIS, cashier of the Henry Elling Bank and Mayor of Virginia City, dates his arrival in Montana in 1865. During his long residence here he has gained a wide acquaintance throughout Madison and adjoining counties, and is said to be better posted on the financial affairs of this part of the country than any other man. A resume of his life will be of interest to many, and is as follows:

William Morris was born, at Northborough, England, March 2, 1842, son of John and Anna (Fox) Morris, both of England, the former born in 1814 and the latter in 1819. In 1852 the father came to America and two years later, in 1854, his wife and four children joined him here, and they settled on a farm near Tiffin, Ohio. There, the father died in 1889, in his seventy-fifth year, his wife having preceded him two years, her death occurring when she was sixty-eight. Their whole lives were characterized by honesty, simplicity and industry, and by their many amiable qualities they won hosts of friends. Religiously, they were Episcopalians. After they came to America five other children were born to them, and seven of their family are still living.

William was their first born, and was twelve years old when they came to this country. Until he was eighteen, his summers were spent in farm work and his winters in attendance at public schools. Then he started out to make his own way in the world. He hired out by the month to do farm work, at first receiving $13 and board per month. In this way he continued for five years. Then he crossed the plains to Montana, driving an ox team and walking all the way. This trip was made in a train composed of about thirty wagons, and there were also other trains near theirs. At Pale creek they were attacked by Indians, who captured one of their wagons. Aside from this Mr. Morris's party met with no misfortune. They had left Omaha in June, rested three weeks at Salt Lake City, and reached Virginia City in November.

Upon his arrival in Virginia City, Mr. Morris accepted a clerkship in the Delevan House, and remained there six months. Then he purchased four yoke of oxen and a wagon and engaged in freighting, making numerous trips in every direction all over the Territory. In 1869 he went to Willow Creek and purchased a squatter's right to 240 acres of land and the stock on it, paying for the same in cash and cattle $1,400. For four years he ran this farm himself, and to his original purchase he added until he become the owner of 600 acres, which he still owns. In 1873, after having improved this farm to a considerable extent, with buildings, fences, etc., he left it and moved into Virginia City to accept the position of Under-Sheriff of Madison county, under T. J. Farrell. In this capacity Mr. Morris served acceptably for two years, after which he was for two years engaged in the livery business and followed other pursuits up to 1879. In 1879 he became cashier of the Henry Elling Bank, in in which position he has since served, meeting with the most satisfactory success as a business man.

In 1878 Mr. Morris returned East to the scenes of his youth, and while there, January 31, 1878, was married to Miss Abigail Burnside, a native of Tiffin, Ohio, and a schoolmate of his. They have six children, viz.: Clyde B., Florence A., William P., Anna V., Harry E. and Ernest R., all born in Virginia City.

Ever since he came to Montana Mr. Morris has taken a deep interest in public affairs and has affiliated with the Democratic party. For six years he served as County Commissioner of Madison county; has been Mayor of Virginia City since April, 1893. Fraternally, he is identified with the I. O. O. F. Mrs. Morris is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

number) answered the special issues in favor of the plaintiffs, and judgment was rendered accordingly for the plaintiffs, subjecting the property to sale and providing for a deficiency judgment. From this judgment the defendant appealed to the supreme court of the Territory, where the judgment was affirmed, Warren, C. J., rendering the opinion, Knowles and Symes, JJ., concurring,—in which it was held that the Legistative Assembly of the Territory, under the organic act, had authority to provide that cases in equity as well as actions at law must be tried by a jury. On appeal to the supreme court of the United States (11 Wall.), the judgment was reversed, the court holding that the Territorial legislature had no authority to deprive the district courts of the Territory of their chancery jurisdiction, and that in the exercise of this jurisdiction the chancellor, and not a jury, is responsible for the decree, and that this was a chancery case, tried by a jury, as would have been an action at law.

But in the case of Toombs vs. Hornbuckle et al. (1 Montana, 286), which was an action for damages and for equitable relief, on appeal from the Montana supreme court to the supreme court of the United States, the only errors assigned being based upon the intermingling of legal and equitable remedies in one form of action, the court in effect reversed its decision in the Kleinschmidt-Dunphy case, and other cases to the same effect, or at least a majority of the THOMAS MCTAGUE, one of the prominent citizens of Deer Lodge county and for a long time connected with the able management of the Montana State Penitentiary, is a native of the city of Philadelphia, born July 24, 1853.

Mr. McTague is a descendant of Irish ancestors. His father, Thomas McTague, was born in Castlebar, county Mayo, Ireland, in 1832, and was reared on his native isle. When a young man he emigrated to America and settled in Philadelphia, where he was married to Miss Mary Jordan, also a native of Ireland. They had two children: a daughter, who died when four years old, and Thomas, the subject of this sketch. The senior Mr. McTague was a contractor and builder and a man of the highest integrity of character. Both he and his wife were devout members of the Catholic Church. Some years after his death his widow became the wife of Mr. Patrick Cahalin, and is now a resident of Deer Lodge, well known and highly esteemed.

At the time of his father's death our subject was only seven months old. His early boyhood days were spent in Philidelphia, attending the public schools, and when in his eleventh year he was appointed a Congressional page and served during the session. In the fall of that year he came to Montana, making the journey by rail to Utah and thence by stage to Helena. After his arrival in Montana he was employed at herding horses in Flint creek for Patrick Dooly, for which he was paid $75 per month, and continued thus employed about a year. After that he engaged in placer mining, working for wages, in Bear Gulch, and later being employed in the quartz mines at Phillipsburg. While at the latter place he was elected Constable. He filled that office most efficiently and afterward was appointed deputy Sheriff. That was not long before the county was divided and Silver Bow county created, and after its division he was appointed Under Sheriff, in which capacity he served two terms, until the first election of President Cleveland.

Under President Cleveland's administration Mr. McTague was appointed Warden of the State Penitentiary, in which position he served acceptably until the election of Mr. Harrison to the presidency, when he resigned. Eleven months after his resignation, Mr. McTague and his partner were employed by the State Board to take charge of the prison, and so faithfully have they performed their duties in this position that they have rendered the highest satisfaction to the State Board and also to all concerned, and have been retained up to the present time. The Montana Penitentiary is to-day one of the best managed institutions of the kind in the United States.

Mr. McTague has made investments in various industries, among which are mining and ranching. He was one of the locaters of the Nevada Creek mines, and he and his partner are largely interested in both placer and quartz mines in the Champion and Oro Fino districts. They are also prominent ranchers, owning a valuable tract of land, 3,500 acres in extent, and having several valuable water rights. The ranch is named after the brand they use on their horses, "The Circle Bar." As a raiser of thoroughbred race horses, Mr. McTague has gained a wide and enviable reputation. At the last State fair, held at Helena, his stock took a foremost place in the races, his colts receiving both first and second premiums. The Montana Newspapers spoke of that day as the "McTague day at the Fair."

Mr. McTague is a stanch Democrat and an active politician. He is President of the National Association of the Democratic Club of Montana, and is ever ready to advance the success of Democracy. He is Past Grand Master at Arms of the Knights of Pythias and a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

judges declared that they were not satisfied with these decisions, and held that the practice, pleadings and forms and modes of procedure in the Territorial courts, as well as their respective jurisdictions, were intended to be left to the legislative action of the Territorial assemblies, and to such rules and regulations as the courts might adopt (18 Wall. 652).

There does not seem to have been any occasion for disturbing the decision in Kleinschmidt vs. Dunphy in that of Toombs vs. Hornbuckle. One was a clear case of equity jurisdiction, a creditor's bill, filed to reach property which the debtor had fraudulently conveyed, which had been tried as an action at law, before a jury, while the other was a case to recover damages for the past diversion of water, and for an injunction to prevent its future diversion, and the question in the latter case was whether there could be an intermingling of legal and equitable remedies in one action.

The decision in the case of Gallagher vs. Basey (1 Montana 457), however, tried on appeal from the supreme court of the Territory to the supreme court of the United States, the next year, which was a case in equity for an injunction, shows that no shadow of doubt ever ought to have been cast by that court upon the decision in Kleinschmidt vs. Dunphy. Justice Field wrote the opinion of the court and with his accustomed clearness said: "If the remedy sought to be a legal one, a jury is essential, un-

March 19, 1889, Mr. McTague was married to Miss Emma Wickham, a native of Wisconsin and a descendant of German ancestry. They own and occupy one of the elegant homes in Deer Lodge.

JUDGE WILLIAM J. STEPHENS, of Missoula, came to Montana in 1866 and has since been a prominent member of her bar. A resumé of his life is as follows:

William J. Stephens was born in Kingstown, county Dublin, Ireland, May 31, 1834, and is of Irish ancestry. In 1847, when thirteen years old, went to sea, and while a sailor boy reached San Francisco from Baltimore in July, 1850. The voyage was made around Cape Horn in a Baltimore merchant ship. He was then sixteen years old. He remained a week in San Francisco and went direct to the gold mines in Tuolumne county, California, and after a mining experience of ten days accepted a clerkship in a general merchandise store at Indian Bar, on the Tuolumne river, where he remained thus occupied for eighteen months. Then he spent a year in mining in that county, during which time he accumulated about $2,000. With this capital he embarked in the grocery business at the town of Poverty Hill, a mining town, and did a successful business for six years. Then he disposed of his store, went to San Francisco, and studied law. From there he went to Virginia City, Nevada, where he continued his studies in the office of Quint & Hardy. About a year after going to Virginia City he was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court and entered upon the active practice of his profession. In 1865 he went to Idaho, practiced until the following spring, and at that time came to Deer Lodge City, Montana. From that date up to the present time, as above stated, he has been engaged in the practice of law in Montana. He remained in Deer Lodge City three years. The second year he was elected District Attorney of the Second judicial district, comprising the counties of Beaver Head, Deer Lodge and Missoula. At this time there were many criminal cases, and during a term of court in Deer Lodge City, Deer Lodge county, he succeeded in making the first conviction for murder in the first degree in the Territory. It was the case of the People vs. Sullivan Mullen and Baggs, for the murder of John Smoot at McClelland Gulch. In December, 1870, he removed to Missoula, which was then a small place, but was the trading center for a large mining district, and in it there was a great deal of legal business over land and mining claims. Criminal cases, too, were not infrequent. From his arrival in this place Judge Stephens enjoyed a large and remunerative practice, by which he accumulated a sufficient competence to retire from active practice, which he did in September, 1890.

He held the following offices during their regular terms: Probate Judge and ex officio County Clerk and Recorder two terms; District Attorney of the Second Judicial District of the Territory of Montana, comprising Deer Lodge, Beaver Head and Missoula counties, one term, and member from Missoula county of the first Constitutional Convention for the State of Montana. Since September, 1890, his various property interests have engaged his attention to the entire exclusion of any attempt at the practice of law.

He was married in July, 1869, to Miss Emma H. Tebeau, a native of St. Louis, Missouri. A record of their children, all natives of Montana, is as follows: H. A., now a clerk in C. P. Higgins' Western Bank, married; Laura A., wife of William Buckley, resides in Seattle; Alexander H.; Lawrence E., lives at their parents, home in Missoula; Eleanor Frances, wife of Fred W. Strang, lives in Missoula; Adaline A.; Eva R., now at the Clinton Liberal Institute, Fort Plain, New York; and Alice M., now living temporarily with her mother at Seattle, Washington.

less waived by the stipulation of the parties; but if the remedies sought be equitable, the court is not bound to call a jury; and if it does call one, it is only for the purpose of enlightening its conscience, and not to control its judgment. The decree which it must render upon the law and the facts must proceed from its own judgment respecting them, and not from the judgment of others. Sometimes in the same action both legal and equitable relief may be sought: as, for example, where damages are claimed for a past diversion of water and an injunction is prayed against its diversion in future. Upon the question of damages, a jury would be required; but upon the propriety of an injunction, the action of the court alone could be invoked. The formal distinctions in the pleadings and modes of procedure are abolished, but the essential distinctions between law and equity is not changed." (20 Wall. 680.)

This case settled the vexed question, though before the decision was announced there had been several decisions by the Supreme Court of the Territory, in a supposed following of the decision in Kleinschmidt vs. Dunphy, holding that legal and equitable relief could not be sought in the same action, and that there could not be an equitable defence to a legal cause of action. (See Creighton vs. Hershfield, 1 Montana, 639; Woolman vs. Garringer, id., 540; Mochon vs. Sullivan, id., 470; Simonton vs. Kelly, id., 483.)

Judge Stephens is a member of the A. O. U. W., and his political views have always been in harmony with the principles advocated by the Democratic party.

JOHN C. SEIDENSTICKER, a prominent rancher of Montana, residing at the confluence of Big Hole and Beaver Head rivers, came to Montana in 1868, and by his own efforts has secured a competency.

Mr. Seidensticker was born in Holstein, Germany, January 19, 1847, the son of honest and respected German parents, and third in a family of six children. Frederick G. Seidensticker, his father, was by occupation a thatcher. In 1874, after the death of his wife, he came to America and settled in Chicago. He died in Illinois, in the seventy-third year of his age.

John C. preceded his father to this country, landing at Castle Garden in 1865. He was then eighteen years of age, was friendless and alone, and was unable to speak a word of the English language. Soon, however, he secured employment and received $5 a week for cutting willows on the banks of the Delaware river, for a basket manufacturer. Later he was employed in the factory, but factory work did not agree with him and he was taken sick. Then he came west to Iowa and worked for a farmer at $130 per year, afterward was variously employed for a year at Boonesboro, Iowa, and following that he spent one year in railroad work in Nebraska. In 1868 he came to Montana, landing in Helena on the 3d of July. From there he went to Crow creek, and thence to Gallatin valley. In Pleasant valley he cut hay for the stage horses, receiving $6 per ton for cutting and cocking it. But he was not then satisfied with life in Montana, and his ambitious spirit led him still further west. He had made the journey on foot to Montana, and from here he walked to Portland, Oregon. There he spent one winter in chopping wood. In the spring, however, he returned to Montana and to his former occupation of making hay. At the same place where he had worked before he and two other men cut 108 tons of hay, and after this he was given charge of the stage horses. That position he had for three years. Then he went to Camp creek and engaged in mining two years, taking out $1,300 the first year and $900 the second.

After these years of roving and unsettled life he located permanently on his present ranch. Here he purchased 160 acres of land and fifty-five head of cattle, paying $1,000 for the farm and stock. He continued in the cattle business until 1883, since which time he has given his attention more especially to sheep, to-day being ranked with the prominent and successful mutton and wool growers. He has had as high as 300 head of cattle and 4,000 sheep. At this writing his flock numbers 3,000. To his original tract of land he has from time to time added until now he is the owner of 600 acres of rich bottom land. He annually cuts about 250 tons of hay, all of which he feeds to his own stock. He was one of the original promoters of the Madison county fair, and at present is one of the principal stockholders.

Mr. Seidensticker was married March 12, 1882, to Miss Sarah Maddox, a native of Missouri and a daughter of Samuel Maddox, now of Gallatin, Montana. Mr. and Mrs. Seidensticker have three children: Frederick, Nettie and John.

He was reared in the Lutheran faith, and in politics is a Republican. An intelligent, honest, hard-working man, he is richly entitled to the prosperity that has attended his efforts in Montana.

ALVA J. NOYES, County Assessor of Beaver Head county, Montana, residing at Dillon, is a native of the State of Minnesota, born in Minneapolis, December 2, 1855.

But in the case of Mantle vs. Noyes (5 Montana, 284) the doctrine as announced in Gallagher vs. Basey was followed, and the court, by Wade, C. J., says: "This is a suit in equity to quiet title. The decree emanates from the judge sitting as a chancelor, and he is responsible for the decree. In actions of this character the judge may try the case without a jury or he may submit special issues to the jury, but their findings of fact are not binding upon the chancellor. He may adopt or disregard the findings of the jury or make findings of fact of his own, and render a decree thereon." (See Beck vs. Beck, 6 Montana, 318.)

CHAPTER XXI.

THE FIRST PATRIOT AS GOVERNOR OF MONTANA—ILLEGAL LEGISLATURES—CONTENTIOUS CONVENTIONS—COLONIAL WARS WITHIN AND AT THE GATES OF MONTANA—A USEFUL CONVENTION—PASTORAL AND AGRICULTURAL PROGRESS.

1866 TO 1868.

THE impetuous Meagher, true to his race and record, set Montana on fire in less time than it takes to write his strange life and long deeds of endeavor and achievement. He had not been a year at the head of affairs as executive till you might have thought all Ireland had been plucked up out of the sea and dropped down against the British line on the top of the Rocky mountains. He had received his commission from a party and a period having nothing at all in common with the old wine in the new bottle: no comprehension at all of the Montanese. When Meagher saw the nobleness and lofty nature of the men he had been sent to govern without their will or choice, he tried to cut loose in some sort from his party and make friends with his peers, the pioneers whom he had believed to be only a little above the savage

His ancestors emigrated from England to this country with the Massachusetts Colony in 1634, and his great-great-grandfather Noyes participated in the French and Indian war. Grandfather Noyes, while serving his country in the war of 1812, was captured and was held in the military prison at Halifax until the close of the war. His wife was a Kelly, of Irish descent. He died in the eighty-fifth year of his age, leaving a family of eleven children, of whom one, George R., was the father of our subject. George R. Noyes was born in Machias, Washington county, Maine, in 1830, and married Miss Amy Standfield, a native of the same town, her birth having occurred in 1836. They were married in Minneapolis, Minnesota, in 1854. In 1861 he crossed the plains to Idaho, where he was engaged in mining and blacksmithing until 1864, when he came to Montana. In 1865 he was in Argenta and Bannack, and in the fall of 1866 his wife and children joined him at the latter place, they having made the journey across the plains with ox teams in a train commanded by Captain James Fisk, their trip being a pleasant one and covering a period of four months. They resided at Bannack until 1868, when they removed to Silver Star, Jefferson valley. There, in March, 1869, the good wife and mother died. After this sad event the children were taken by their maternal grandmother back to Minneapolis, where they remained five years. In 1874 they returned to Silver Bow county. The father was for several years engaged in buying and selling cattle, and both made and lost large sums of money. In 1876 they removed to Butte City, where the family resided until the father's death, which occurred August 22, 1886. He had married a second wife and by her had two sons and a daughter—William, Earnest and Annie. The daughter who crossed the plains became the wife of William Armetage, and resides in Big Hole basin. The parents had early in life united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and to the religious faith of that denomination they continued to adhere.

Alva J. Noyes was ten years old when he came with his mother to Montana. After his mother's death, as above stated, he spent five years in Minneapolis, where he received his education. After his return to Montana, before he came among them. This was bitterly resented by his own party. Meetings were called, conventions held, and resolutions of condemnation passed,—such resolutions as shall not find place in these pages, because of the coarse and bitter abuse of a man who had at one time at least deserved well of the country. Of course Meagher was about the last man in the land to be at the head of offices in Montana; he was utterly unsuited for such an office. His appointment is only another witness to the fact that Congress and the administration had neither sympathy with or knowledge of Montana. Meagher seemed only fitted to fight, and as if there was not already fighting enough within and without Montana, with savages journeying in at her four doors and butchering the farmers, herders, prospectors and immigrants; he made political pandemonium in every mining camp that had men enough in it to make two sides. It seemed clear that there could be no legal legislation without a re-enabling act. Yet he held elections and went right along.*

The second legislature, which the writers of that time called the "Meagher mob," met at Virginia city, March 5, 1865. But you search the records in vain for any sort of misrule or madness. Attention is called to one important he, in 1882, took up a ranch and became the owner of 765 acres of land in the Big Hole basin. He erected buildings and otherwise improved his land, and soon found himself successfully engaged in stock-raising. In 1893 he sold this property. While residing on the farm he held acceptably the office of Justice of the Peace and Notary Public, and in 1892 was elected Assessor of Beaver Head county, in which official capacity he is now serving. At this writing the assessment of the county is $3,700,000. The rate is thirteen mills on the dollar, and the highest tax paid in the county is $750.

Mr. Noyes was married April 6, 1882, to Miss Hattie M. Buck, daughter of C. M. Buck, of Butte City. They have two sons and two daughters, three of them born in Butte City and the other in Dillon, their names being as follows: Edna, Raymond, Royden and Edith.

Mr. Noyes is a member of the A. O. U. W. In politics he has always been a Republican, and is an intelligent and energetic citizen and a capable and reliable public officer.

HON. JOSEPH H. RINEHART, of Billings, Yellowstone county, was born in Cincinnati, in 1849, a son of William M. and Roxcinda (LaRue) Rinehart. His father graduated at Heidelberg College, Germany, and at the University of Virginia, and afterward became a merchant and capitalist in Cincinnati. His ancestors are traceable through four generations in Virginia.

Joseph H., our subject, graduated at St. Xavier College, in Cincinnati, in 1868. In 1864 he enlisted as a drummer in the Second Battalion, Thirteenth United States Infantry, in which he served until 1867, and during that time did much clerical work. He was also connected with the medical department, and after returning to Cincinnati graduated in medicine in 1873. During that year Dr. Rinehart began practice in the United States Army in Dakota and Montana, but in 1884 resigned his position and located in Billings, where he applied himself to general practice, and has wonderful success. In 1890 he was appointed County Coroner, served one term as Superintendent of Schools, was appointed on the first Medical Examining Board of the State by Governor Leslie, has served as County Physician for the past four years; was Surgeon for the Northern Pacific Railroad many years, also City Physician, and was Physician for the County Board of Health. Dr. Rinehart was appointed Mayor of Billings in 1890, but resigned that and other positions to move to the growing city of Seattle, Washington, where he was elected Mayor of Ballard, a suburban town. He practiced his profession in the former city two and a half years, and his ability, congenial manner and personal magnetism soon brought him to the front. The citizens of King county elected Mr. Rinehart to represent them in the lower house of their State Legislature in 1892, and he still holds that position. His business interests demanding his return to Billings, he proposed resigning the office, but was requested not to do so as the body might be called together before he lost his right in that capacity.

In 1870 our subject was united in marriage with Mary Waugh, a native of Ireland. They had four children,—Charles L., William, Mary Frances and George Albert. The wife and mother died in February, 1889. In 1890 Dr. Rinehart married Jennie F. Mackeller, a daughter of Alexander and Margaret Mackeller. The father was a capitalist, and her brother, John Mackeller, has served in the Canadian Parliament and as Mayor of Tiverton, Ontario. Dr. and Mrs. Rinehart have had three children, viz.: Joseph H., Jennie Frances and Jessie R.: the latter died in infancy. The Doctor is Past Grand in the I. O. O. F., is Past Master Workman in the A. O. U. W., and is also a member of the Grand Lodge of that Order. In political matters, he is a stanch Republican, and is aggressive as a debater.

act, at least. A State convention was provided for, to be held at Helena. This convention met, as enacted, early in April, and did, perhaps, the best and wisest thing that had yet been attempted for the young Territory. A memorial was addressed to Congress calling attention to the fact that Montana was a pastoral and agricultural country.

Fortunes had been already made by sheep-growers and "cattle kings." Travelers from abroad were amazed at the remarkable grasses and the richness of Montana meats. Members of geological surveys, as well as our West Point officers, had reported marvelous things about wheat, potatoes, in fact cereals, fruits and roots of all sorts. Evidence was accumulating which finally culminated in the declaration by the head of the Geological Survey (Hayden, p. 269), that "without doubt Montana is the best grazing country in all the great Rocky mountain region."

Nothing in all the fine eloquence of Thomas Francis Meagher, nothing in all the grave and learned charges of Judge Hosmer, nothing that had yet been said or done by the bright newspapers of Montana, was nearly so fruitful of good or gave such satisfaction to those in the East wanting new homes.

The next important thing for the good of Montana transpired, when the legislature, December, 1867, adopted to some extent the Cali-

MASSENA BULLARD, one of Montana's representative lawyers and pioneers, is a native of the State of Missouri, born in La Fayette county, October 7, 1850.

William L. Bullard, his father was born in the State of Virginia, July 26, 1812, and in the Old Dominion he was reared and married, the lady of his choice being Miss Annie F. Burruss, whose birth occurred there March 26, 1815. Mr. Bullard emigrated with his family to Missouri, in 1838, and in La Fayette county he engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements. To him belongs the distinction of having established the first foundry in Kansas City. He continued to reside in Kansas City until 1860, when he removed to Buchanan county, same State. From 1861 to 1863, inclusive, he was engaged in freighting between St. Joseph, Missouri, and the Black Hills. In 1864, he removed with a part of his family to Montana, his family at that time consisting of his wife and four sons, Oscar M., Walter S., William F. and Massena. Oscar, his oldest son, was then in the Black Hills. This journey was made in one of their freight trains, the wagons being loaded with merchandise and drawn by oxen. They reached Virginia City in September, and remained there until Christmas, he in the meantime continuing his freighting between that point and Salt Lake City. The family spent some time in the Gallatin and Prickly Pear valleys, camping in the latter valley in April, 1865. During the winter of 1864-5, Mr. Bullard had the misfortune to lose all of his freight oxen, except one, they having been snowed in on the Snake river, and died there. He then settled down on a farm, and while he continued freighting his good wife did what she could on the farm. Produce of every kind was high She purchased $69 worth of potatoes, at thirty-three and a third cents per pound; cut the eyes from them for seed, and then sold the hearts for seventy-five cents per pound, and made a profit of $40, on the transaction; she planted the seed and raised a crop that brought her $1,500. One particularly fine potatoe sold for $1. Every hill of this potatoe crop was like so much pure gold to them. Mr. Bullard continued freighting up to the time of his death, which occurred December 24, 1868. His wife still survives him, being now in her eightieth year. She is a faithful member of the Christian Church, as also was her worthy husband, he having had the honor of freighting into the county, free of charge, the first Protestant church bell. Of their family of seven children, only three are now living. Oscar, the oldest, is now a resident of Missouri. William F. is a stock dealer in Montana. And to the history of the other son, Massena, we now turn.

Massena Bullard was in his fourteenth year when his parents removed to Montana, and when he was only twelve he drove one of the ox teams in his father's freight train across the plains. He was educated in Helena, and studied law here under the instructions of Woolfolk & Toole, being admitted to the bar in Helena, August 16, 1871. Immediately he entered upon the practice of his profession in this city. His abilities were soon recognized, and he grew into prominence, and to-day he is ranked with the leading lawyers of the State. He has been connected with many important cases, is attorney for many of the large mining corporations, has held in trust much valuable real estate of the city, and he enjoys the highest confidence of all for whom he has done business. For years he held himself independent in politics, but being a strong temperance man, he has recently identified himself with the Prohibition party. For twenty years he was Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars, and is recognized as one of the most prominent leaders in temperance cause in this State. He has also the honor of being Past Grand Master of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of the State of Montana. He is a charter member of the Christian Church, at Helena, in which he is serving as Elder. He was one of the first persons ever immersed in Montana. For ten years he was secretary fornia code of civil law. True this code of practice had come all the way from New York to begin with; but during its long halt in California it had been enlarged by "an act to amend an act," and all that sort of verbal circumlocution, till it embraced many sorts of mining laws, water rights, and so on.

With the adoption of the California code, men began to feel secure in their mining property and water rights. Capital had more confidence now, and everything went on widening and brightening and growing better all the time.

There now began to surge a steady and strong tidal wave of prosperity, especially in a pastoral and agricultural way.

Says Col. A. K. McClure, Tribune, in 1866: "After climbing another long and most tedious divide, made up of miles of successive prairie-hills, I at last reached an abrupt descent into the celebrated Gallatin valley, and the river was visible for twenty miles down the valley by the luxuriant growth of timber that lines its banks. Where I entered it, its breadth is about twenty miles; it continues down for thirty miles, ranging from three to twenty miles in breadth, and extends southeast or up the river, probably ten miles; but there are few settlers along the Bozeman route. It is the most magnificent valley I have seen in the Rocky mountains. It is one vast meadow, almost level, of the Montana Christian Association, and at this writing is President of the Montana Bible Society. Mr. Bullard has served as City Attorney of Helena, for several years, under both Republican and Democratic rule, and in connection with his lodge work, it should be further stated, that this year, 1894, he is a representative to the Sovereign Grand Lodge of I. O. O. F., which meets at Chattanooga.

June 3, 1876, he married Miss Laura E. Bywaters, a native of Missouri, and they have three children, Clara, Oscar and Percy. They reside in one of the attractive homes of Helena.

W. M. SMITH, a prominent stock farmer of the Beaver Head valley, dates his arrival in Montana in 1866. Of his life we make mention as follows:

W. M. Smith was born in Guernsey county, Ohio, June 24, 1832, a descendant of an old American family. His father, John Smith, was born in the State of Pennsylvania in 1797. He married Elizabeth Edwards, who was also a descendant of one of the old Colonial families. They had a family of nine children, of whom three sons and two daughters are still living. Removing to Ohio, they settled on a farm, and there the parents spent the rest of their lives and died, the father in 1878, in the eighty-first year of his age; the mother in her seventieth year. They had been consistent members of the Methodist Church for many years, and their pure Christian lives won for them the respect and esteem of all who knew them.

W. M. Smith was the sixth born in this family. He was reared on his father's farm in Ohio, early in life being inured to hard work as were most farmer boys, and each winter he had the privilege of attending school about six weeks in the little log schoolhouse hard by. When he reached his majority he began life on his own account. His first employment was in a steam sawmill. Later he purchased a half interest in this mill. The enterprise, however, proved a failure, and he lost his money. Then he borrowed $200 with which to make the journey to California. He had been married on the 11th of September, 1857, to Miss Hannah Rourk, a native of Ohio and a daughter of Edward Rourk, of that State. They had two children, Mary Elizabeth and Delana. With his wife and these children he, in 1860, made the voyage to California, settled at Yreka, and there for six years he was engaged in ranching, meeting with a fair degree of success.

In 1866, he started overland with his family for Montana, coming in company with Messrs. Poindexter and Orr, and bringing a drove of cattle with him. They were three months on the way, and upon their arrival here settled first at Argenta, in Beaver Head county, where he engaged in teaming and also in dairying. Prosperity attended his efforts, and he remained there until 1879, at which time he traded his property for the 160 acres of land where he now resides. He still continues the stock business, making a specialty of Shorthorn cattle and Clydesdale horses, and is rated as one of the best farmers in the county. From time to time he has purchased other lands, and is now the owner of 720 acres. He also owns a residence in Dillon. In 1891 he built the beautiful home on his farm, where he and his family are now surrounded with all the comforts of life.

During their sojourn in California, two children—Edward C. and John B.—were born to them, and after they came to Montana they had two more children, Emma and William Elsie. Their eldest daughter, Mary Elizabeth, married Mr. Philip Johnson. She died, leaving six children, three of whom are being reared by Grandpa and Grandma Smith, their names being: Burt, Grace E. and Delana B. The second daughter, Delana, married Thomas Porch, and they have a family of six children. Mr. Porch occupies a farm near Mr. Smith. Edward is married and lives on a farm adjoining that of his father.

Mr. and Mrs. Smith are useful and influential members dotted with green lines along its numerous tributaries to the river, and its soil is as productive as any in the world. I crossed almost its entire breadth to Bozeman city, and saw its most bountiful crops of wheat, oats, barley and buckwheat, and its tempting vegetables. The spring wheat is just in blossom, and the winter wheat is about ready for the reaper. Until two years ago the settlers sowed spring wheat entirely; but a trial of winter wheat gave such satisfactory results that last fall all that was in the valley sold for $25 per bushel in gold, for seed. This season about one-tenth the harvest is winter wheat, and the whole crop will be sold at $5 per bushel for seed again. I cannot question the evidence that establishes the raising of eighty bushels of winter wheat on an acre of ground in the valley. Even spring wheat usually yields forty bushels to the acre. I saw winter wheat on Saturday that is expected to yield seventy bushels to the acre; and I do not think the calculation an unreasonable one. This valley is so well watered, so easily irrigated, and so universally productive that it is being rapidly settled by men who mean to follow farming as their calling." * * *

of the Methodist Church. Indeed, it may be said of them that they are among the pillars of the church at Dillon. He is one of its Trustees, and for the past ten years has been a Class-leader. Fraternally, he is a Master Mason; politically, a Republican.

WILLIAM WARREN, who is ranked with the well-to-do farmers in the Prickly Pear valley, near Helena, has been identified with this locality for two decades.

Mr. Warren is a native of England. He was born May 12, 1844, and when a lad of sixteen years came to America to make his own way in the world. His first work in this country was in a coal mine in Rhode Island. From there he went to the Lake Superior mines, where he worked about six years. In 1867 he landed in Colorado, and in that State mined three years, first contracting, and later having the position of foreman on several rich leads. While there, November 19, 1869, he married Miss Lucinda Hardesty, a native of Boone county, Kentucky, born July 22, 1834. She had gone to Colorado in the spring of 1863 with her mother and brother, and in the fall of the following year, with her mother, niece and nephew, she returned to Kentucky. In Kentucky, August 10, 1865, her mother died, and they buried her at Big Bone church, which was on the corner of her father's farm Their farm had previously been occupied by Grandfather Patrick Wallace, an Irish gentleman who was one of the pioneers of Boone county, Kentucky. Jacob Hardesty, Mrs. Warren's father, spent his whole life on that farm, and died there in 1862, in the seventy-first year of his age. In 1867 Mrs. Warren again made the journey to Colorado, and two years later, as above stated, was married there.

It was in 1871 that Mr. and Mrs. Warren came to Montana, and to their present home near the city of Helena. Here they have developed a fine farm. Mr. Warren built the commodious residence they occupy, and the trees, whose friendly branches furnish ample shade, were planted by them soon after their arrival here. Recently they sold 140 acres of their land, at $120 per acre, this land having cost them $4 an acre in 1871. They reserved the building and the rest of the farm, the land they have now being devoted to small fruits.

Mr. and Mrs. Warren have four children, two sons and two daughters. Their daughter, Fannie Lu, is the wife of William Shean, and the other children, Charles Edward, John Wallace and Rosa Belle, are at home.

Mr. Warren is a member of the I. O. O. F., has passed all the chairs in both its branches, and is also a member of the A. O. U. W. In politics he is a Democrat, and has served as Trustee of his school district. He and his good wife and children are highly respected in the community in which they have so long resided.

CAPT. JOHN H. DAVIS, the oldest and most prominent hotel man of Virginia City, came to Montana in 1866, just after having served his country faithfully and well in the great Civil war.

Captain Davis is a native of Kentucky, born near Sterling, August 28, 1829. His father, Job Davis, was born in Ireland, and when a boy came to America and settled in Kentucky, where he was married to Miss Eliza Rama, a native of Virginia, and a member of one of the old families of that State. They became the parents of eleven children, all of whom are still living. He was a Kentucky farmer and Methodist preacher, spent the whole of his life in that State, and died in 1886, in the eighty-third year of his age.

Captain Davis is the oldest of the family. He was reared and educated in his native State, and remained there until he was twenty-three years of age, when he emigrated to Illinois, then a new country, and with a warrant given him by his father, took claim to a tract of land near Taylorville, which he improved, and on which he resided until the spring of 1858. In 1858 he sold out, and with a mule team crossed the plains to Colorado. Denver was then in its infancy, and this whole western crop of loose boulders to impede our progress. The grass there, as elsewhere on the undulating lands, was parched almost white, but innumerable herds of the finest stock grazed upon it, and were fat and sleek as our Eastern stall-fed bullocks. An Eastern stock-grower, used only to the green fields of Pennsylvania, would at first sight pronounce these prairies unfit for pasturage; but in no place in the world will stock thrive better than on this same seemingly burnt-up grass. Although the stock and blades are dead, they are still nutritious; but the chief sustenance of horses and cattle is in the "bunch grass," to be found on all elevated lands in the mountains, which never looses its freshness at the roots. In the dryest seasons of summer, and the coldest winters, it preserves its perpetual greenness near the roots, and is succulent and most nourishing. No amount of hay or grain fed to cattle in the winter will bring them out in the spring in as good order as grazing on the bunch grass, if the snows do not fall so deep as to prevent them from reaching the roots; and no other feed will make the beef so sweet, juicy and tender.

"Of the agricultural settlements of Montana, the Gallatin and Missoula valleys are the most favored in climate,—the eastern and western extremes of the Territory. I learn that the Missoula grows the earliest and finest vegetables country was wild and unsettled. Obtaining a mining claim, he went to work and continued there successfully until the spring of 1861, when he returned to Kentucky on a visit to friends.

It was while he was visiting in Kentucky that Fort Sumter was fired upon. The whole country was in the highest degree of excitement. He returned to Illinois and enlisted in Company A, Eighth Illinois Infantry, for a term of three months, and after that term had expired he again enlisted, this time in Company B, Forty-first Illinois Volunteer Infantry. Of this company he was elected First Lieutenant, and was with it in all the engagements in which it participated. At the capture of Fort Donelson he had command of the company, and at the battle of Shiloh he received a musket ball in his shoulder. This ball he still carries. At the battle of Vicksburg he was wounded in the thigh by a shell, from the effects of which he is slightly lame, and from which he still suffers. For gallant service at Vicksburg he was promoted to the captaincy. He was at the capture of Atlanta and was in command of a pioneer corps that went in advance of Sherman's forces in the memorable march to the sea. In the grand review at Washington Captain Davis and his men were assigned to lead the line in order next to the generals.

The war over, he went to Chicago, from whence, in 1866, he came with his private conveyance to Montana, and selected Virginia City as a place of location. For five years he was engaged in mining, meeting with the usual reverses and successes of the miner. During his best year in the mines he took out $6,000. The last claim he worked became flooded with water, and after abandoning it he leased some stock and a ranch on the Upper Ruby. This stock ranch he ran for about five years, raising a great many cattle, but finally selling them on a declining market. Then he again turned his attention to mining, and still owns mining interests. In 1880 he engaged in the hotel business at Puller Springs. In 1888 he returned to Virginia City and took charge of the Madison House, which he conducted successfully five years, and since 1893 he has been proprietor of the Easton House. His generous and genial nature especially fit him for this business. He knows how to run a hotel in a way to gain the good will and patronage of the traveling public, and such has been his life in Montana that he enjoys the esteem and confidence of all who know him.

Captain Davis was married in Kentucky, in 1850, to Miss Jane Bolton, a native of his own town. She died in Illinois in 1857, in the twenty-seventh year of her age, leaving two children, Thomas W. and Viola, both now residents of Kansas, the latter being the wife of Jesse Cox. In December, 1866, he married Miss Minerva Tuller, a native of Indiana. They had five children, namely: Blanch, wife of James Cowan; Jessie, wife of Robert Cowan; Olive, wife of Amos Wiles; and John Arthur,—all residents of Montana. The mother of this family died in 1884, and in 1888 Captain Davis married Mrs. Amelia North, sister of his second wife, and widow of Robert North, who lost his life in the Union army.

The Captain and his wife are charter members of the Christian Church, in Virginia City, and he is one of the Elders of the church. Both have done much toward building up and sustaining it, and, in fact, all the moral and religious interests of the town have their liberal aid.

When the Republican party was organized in Illinois, he attended the first convention held in his county and there became identified with it and helped to organize it and has since been a faithful adherent to Republican principles. He has been honored by his party in Madison county with the nomination for Treasurer of the county, and is now serving as City Justice and Police Judge of Virginia City. While in Illinois he served as Justice of the Peace for a number of years.

raised in the mountains, although it is the least accessible of all the agricultural districts as yet. It is the northwestern county of the Territory, and is flanked by the Bitter Root range. So favorable has the climate been since the settlers have been there that the more hardy fruits are planted, with entire confidence that they can be grown successfully. The whole Territory is made up of alternate mountains and valleys,—the one studded with the precious metals, and the other teeming with the most bountiful crops I have ever seen. In four years, with trackless mountains and hostile savages to confront the pioneer, this Territory has been settled for nearly two hundred miles in every direction from Helena, the central city, and, with not over forty thousand people, it is second only to California in the production of gold and silver, and rivals that State in the growth of wheat to the acre. It has been cursed with adventurers in both business and politics, as has been the experience of all new Territories; but its future will make romance pale before the swift march of progress."

Montana, as we have seen far back, before gold was discovered here, was entirely agricultural, horticultural and pastoral. From time immemorial till Lewis and Clarke came to "spy out the land," the Indian woman had attended her fields of corn, beans, squashes and pumpkins along the alluvial banks of the Missouri and Yellowstone; and when the good fathers

WILLIAM B. RALEIGH, one of Helena's most prominent and successful dry-goods merchants, is a member of the well-known firm of Raleigh & Clarke. A resumé of his life is herewith presented.

William B. Raleigh was born near Dover, Tennessee, October 27, 1846. Some of his ancestors emigrated from England to this country at an early day and settled in Maryland, where James Raleigh, the father of William B., was born. James Raleigh married Miss Margaret W. Bailey, a native of Tennessee. He was engaged in steamboating, and made his home in Tennessee up to the time of his death, which occurred in 1848. Besides a widow, he left three daughters and one son. This son, William B., was then two years old. His mother reared her family and lived to a good old age, her death occurring in 1888.

In 1866 Mr. Raleigh began his mercantile career as a clerk in a store, at St. Joseph, Missouri. In 1869 he became a member of the firm of Bailey, Kay & Company (afterward Bailey, Townsend & Company), wholesale dry-goods dealers, with which he was connected for nine years, and during that time became thoroughly acquainted with the quality and cost of goods and all the details of the dry-goods business. Disposing of his interest in that establishment, he and a partner opened five retail stores in different localities, every one of which proved a success. In 1878 he sold out and came to Helena, and it was soon after his arrival here that the firm of Raleigh & Clarke opened up the largest dry-goods establishment in the city of Helena. During all these years, from 1878 up to the present time, it has held its leading position as the best house of the kind in the State of Montana. Their large store is well filled with choice goods, and an air of neatness prevades the whole establishment. They do both a wholesale and retail business, and an important feature of their store is their mail order department, goods being sent to parties in distant towns.

Mr. Raleigh's mercantile enterprises are not confined to Helena alone. He is president of the Gallatin Valley Mercantile Company, which has a fine store and stock at Bozeman, Montana. He is also prominently connected with the leading dry-goods house at Great Falls, the firm name being W. B. Raleigh & Company. And, like many other successful business men in Montana, he has wisely invested in mines and mining. He is the principal owner of the large amount of property held by the Nevada Creek Placer Mining Company, of which he is president. They have a hydraulic mine which they have operated for eight years. Their land on Nevada creek comprises 1,200 acres, and is supplied with an abundance of water. Besides this mine, they also have claims covering 300 acres in Buffalo and California gulches, and a valuable water-right there also. All these mines are operated by the latest and most improved methods and return steady and profitable income.

Mr. Raleigh was married in St. Louis, Missouri, November 1, 1871, to Miss Medora T. Clarke, daughter of Albert G. Clarke, one of Helena's most respected pioneer merchants, and the senior member of the firm of Clarke & Curtin. Mr. and Mrs. Raleigh have four children, Susie B., Albert C., Margaret E. and Walter W. Mr. Raleigh has just completed a handsome brick residence, on South Rodney street, where he resides with his family.

He is a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Elks, and his political affiliations have all along been with the Democratic party. He is well known throughout Montana, and wherever he is known has the reputation of being a man of the highest integrity, as well as one of the best informed dry goods merchants in business in the State.

came they were far from discouraging this gentle mode of life. From far back toward the beginning the Indian warrior had watched his black herds feed brisket deep on plain and valley, and the passing trader did not discourage his rude form of half pastoral pursuit, for he wanted the robes.

So we see by these natural gardens and natural corn-fields and natural pasture lands, which were found here more than half a century before we discovered gold, Montana was, from the first and by nature, a land of homes. Exactly when she began to turn seriously to these great resources it is hard to say. I found gardens in Deer Lodge managed mainly by Canadian half-breeds, the road builders and military camps their market, and I saw haystacks in the upper Yellowstone country the same year. The discovery of gold on the west side did not discourage these first adventurers in these unsettled regions. They knew that people would come now, if only to feed their horses and themselves on their way to the new mines in the farther West, and no doubt each new year brought higher haystacks and broader gardens till the time when products of the farm could be brought to the gold fields by farmers from regions with a more favorable climate down the natural slopes on either side. Yet those huge, round-shouldered and seemingly

HON. ROBERT B. SMITH, senior member of the firm of Smith & Word, a prominent law firm of Helena, is a native of Kentucky, born in Hickman county, December 29, 1814. His grandfather, Eli Smith, a native of New York, removed early in life to western Kentucky and engaged in farming, in which he continued during the rest of his life. His son, De Witt Clinton Smith, was born in Kentucky in 1832, and now resides in Graves county, that State. De Witt C. Smith married Miss Eliza Hughs, also a native of Kentucky, and a daughter of Lewis Hughs, her father being one of the five men who first settled in Ohio in 1789, from whence he subsequently removed to Kentucky. Robert B. Smith is the oldest in the family of nine children of this worthy couple, all of whom, parents and children, are still living.

The subject of our sketch received his education in the public schools and the academy at Milburn, Kentucky, and studied law at Mayfield, in the office of Colonel Edward Crossland. At Mayfield, in October, 1877, he was admitted to the bar and was there engaged in the practice of his profession for three years and a half. It was in 1882 that he came to Montana. For seven years he practiced law at Dillon, and in 1889 came to Helena to form a law partnership with Hon. Samuel Word, the latter's son, Robert Lee Word, afterward becoming a member of the firm. Upon the retirement of the senior Mr. Word in 1892 the firm name became Smith & Word. They have a large and successful practice, and a wide reputation as one of the most prominent law firms in the State.

Mr. Smith is strongly Democratic in his political views, and during the national campaigns is one of his party's most effective stump speakers. In 1884 he was a member of the Constitutional Convention, and in 1885 received the appointment of United States District Attorney for Montana, being appointed as such by President Cleveland. In this capacity he rendered good service until March 4, 1889, at which time he telegraphed his resignation, not wishing to hold office under an administration which he did not help to elect. But he is not in accord with the views of the present administration or the results of the legislation of the present Congress. He openly expressed this dissatisfaction, and on June 25, 1894, he was nominated by the People's party in Montana for Representative in Congress from Montana. In 1890 he was appointed City Attorney, and served one year.

He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and of the Bar Association of Montana.

Mr. Smith was married in 1878, to Miss Catherine Crossland, a native of Kentucky and a daughter of Colonel Edward Crossland, under whom he had studied law. Mr. and Mrs. Smith have two children, Mary H. and Edward C.

HON. JOSEPH R. MCKAY, Representative to the Legislature from Custer county, was elected on the Republican ticket in the autumn of 1892.

He was born near Ottawa, Ontario, Canada, in the town of Morewood, in 1850, a son of Alexander and Elizabeth (Robinson) McKay, his father an extensive lumberman. In the family were five children, four sons and one daughter. James, one of the sons, is a prominent physician in the State of New York; another son holds a prominent Government position in the Indian Department.

Joseph, of this sketch, grew to manhood in business with his father, attending an educational institution at Ottawa, and graduated at a business college in that city. When of age he engaged in the lumber trade and in mercantile business, at River Desert, in the province of Quebec, having previously started in business in his native town. Later he engaged with the largest and best known lumber firm in the dominion,—the Hamilton Brothers, whose mills were at Hawkesbury, and yards at Quebec, and was with them ten years. Then he made a tour through Canada northwestward, and through the endless brown hills of Montana do not average nearly so high as those of Wyoming, Idaho and Colorado, being about two hundred feet lower.

A miner is generally loath to leave off the fascinating and exciting employment of gold and silver seeking; but from the first old Californians saw that the placer mines must, in the course of time, lose their importance, as had such mines in other places; and much sooner, too, since improved methods and experience had made it possible to handle more pay dirt now in a single day than in a week's hard toil in the former times. And so, at a comparatively early stage in the gradual falling off of the placer product, he began to shift his "claim" upon another's shoulders and look out for a "ranch." We cannot fix the date of this any more than we can fix the date of the falling of the first eucalyptus leaf which finally carries with it all the leaves of the year, one at a time and all unseen; but we know that in 1867 imported Durham, Holstein, and some hornless little black cattle from Scotland, bought by Mr. Blackmoor, of Saulsbury, England, were feeding where only buffalo and grizzly bears roamed and fed but a few days before. In the thicket where Captain Clarke killed his hugest bear, a corral for nightly protection of fine stock had been built of the timber found there west and northwest Territories of the United States, seeking a favorable locality for settlement, and decided finally that the Yellowstone valley offered the greatest inducements.

Selecting a fine tract of land on Tongue river, twenty miles from Miles City, he engaged in raising live-stock, in 1885, the stock consisting of cattle and horses, and among the latter a number of fine Shetland ponies from England, besides saddle and trotting horses.

Having had experience in many features of trade, he decided that the protective system offered the best opportunity for labor to receive nearest a just reward. Accordingly he allied himself with the Republican party.

Mr. McKay was elected a member of the Board of County Commissioners of Custer county, in 1889, and was chairman of the Board one year, during which time that body made a fine record. He is a member of Yellowstone Lodge, No. 26, A. F. & A. M., at Miles City, also of the Miles City Social Club. He is a gentleman well qualified to fill any position, and is courteous and entertaining in conversation.

In 1893 he married Miss Mary Southmayd, daughter of O. A. Southmayd, of Helena, Montana, who is extensively engaged in mining interests. Mr. McKay and wife, in society, are prominent in Miles City and Custer county.

HARVEY BLISS.—This enterprising young business man came to Montana during the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad, as bridge foreman for Winston Brothers, bridge contractors and builders of Minneapolis, Minnesota. With that firm he remained five years. In 1884 he began business for himself at Big Timber, and from that time up to the present has been successful and has steadily accumulated property. He constructed a wagon bridge across the Yellowstone river, near Big Timber. In March, 1892, he purchased the large lumber interests of the Gordon Brothers' Lumber Company, at Big Timber, and has since been handling all kinds of building material in connection with his contracting and building. Many of the best buildings of the town have been erected by him. He owns three completed buildings, and has a residence now on the way that when finished will be the best in the town. He also deals in hay, grain and agricultural implements. As agent for the Hecht Brothers Wool Company, he shipped for them during the season of 1893 five hundred thousand pounds of wool.

Harvey Bliss was born at Stevens' Point, Wisconsin, December 31, 1856, son of Nathaniel F. Bliss, a land speculator. While he has received only a common-school education, he has an unusual amount of natural ability, tact and enterprise, and these have enabled him to make the wonderful success he has attained since coming to Montana. Politically, he is a Democrat, and is an active worker in the ranks of his party, always attending county and State conventions. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias.

LUCIEN ALBERT KING, is one of the first men who engaged in business in Anaconda, he having established himself here soon after the town site was located. The following sketch of his life is therefore appropriate in this work.

Mr. King was born in Omaha, Nebraska, December 7, 1855, oldest of the seven children—five sons and two daughters—of Jacob and Christine Caroline Christiansen King. His ancestors were among the early settlers in the American colonies, the Kings coming from Germany and the Christiansens from Denmark. Grandfather King served in the Colonial army in the war for American independence. All of Mr. King's brothers and sisters are living except one brother.

Mr. King grew up in Omaha, which at that time was a small place, and there received a high-school education, and served an apprenticeship of six years to the dru-by the importers of fine cattle; and but for the ever-restless Indians, this same sort of thing might have been found almost anywhere from the top of the Rockies down to the joining of the two great rivers flowing toward the east. And now the tops of the Rocky mountains were found to be not only favorable to stock-raising, but as fertile even as the alluvial valleys.

Montana is and must remain till her glorious grass-set mountains melt into chaos, the tawny lion of the North. Looking out and up toward Canada as you climb and climb for the summit, you see such a riot of color, such a continuity of mountain set on mountain! All grass-set, mind you, and pine-set,—simply a park, pushed up into the heavens, banked up against the borders of Canada. And all cast on such a colossal scale!

There are cattle among the pines along the little brooks that come traveling down from out the clouds toward Canada; there are sheep all along as far as you can see; always a shepherd, with dogs. For here the big buffalo wolf as well as the coyote abound. Some herders have as many as five thousand sheep; but a cattle king at my side tells me that half that number is all that any one man can safely keep from the wolves that constantly lie in wait. There is constant business. The drug business, however, was too confining for him, and he accordingly sought other occupation. Entering the employ of the Union Pacific Railroad Company in the capacity of civil engineer, he was thus engaged during the construction of the Oregon short line as well as many other branches of that great railroad system. He remained with that company until 1885. That year he helped to run the lines for tracks connecting the Upper and Lower Smelting Works at Anaconda. These smelting works are said to the be the largest of the kind in the world. It was also during that same year that he, in connection with John J. Crockett, purchased the drug, stationery and other business connected therewith, from a party who had begun business in a tent near the creek. He and Mr. Crockett located in the large, brick building on Main street, December 10, 1886, where the business is still conducted. In 1890 Mr. Crockett sold his interest in the establishment to Mr. Frank Kennedy, a Louisiana gentleman, since which time the firm name has been King & Kennedy. They now deal in books, stationery, tobacco and cigars and all kinds of notions, and also handle daily papers from all the important cities in the United States.

Mr. King is a Republican in politics but has never been an office seeker, and the only public position he ever held was that of Clerk of the Board of Education, in which he officiated for several years. He is a member of Acacia Lodge, No. 33, F. & A. M., at Anaconda, of which he was Worshipful Master during the year of 1893, and is also indentified with the order of Elks, being Esteemed Lecturing Knight of the last named organization.

January 28, 1887, he married Miss Maude Mary Hobson, daughter of Col. William Hobson, of Boston, Massachusetts. Mr. and Mrs. King have two daughters, Ruth and Olive Hobson. He and his wife are both active members of the Episcopal Church. He is now one of the County Commissioners of Deer Lodge county, and is also the member of the State Republican central committee from Deer Lodge county.

GORDON C. VINEYARD, a Montana pioneer of 1864, now residing in Anaconda, was born in Missouri, March 13, 1836.

Mr. Vineyard is of German descent. His grandfather, George Vineyard, was a Virginian and a soldier in the Revolutionary war, enduring all the hardships of that memorable winter at Valley Forge. His wife was of Scotch descent, and in their family were eleven children. John, their oldest son and our subject's father, was born in Virginia, November 22, 1791. He married Miss Melinda Witt, also a native of Virginia, the date of her birth being March 16, 1808, and in 1833 they removed to Missouri and located near Booneville, Cooper county, where they owned and operated a farm. Later they removed to Tipton, Moniteau county, that State, where they spent the residue of their lives and died, his death occurring in 1855 and hers in 1858. Both were members of the Methodist Church, and by their daily lives showed they were Christians of the truest type. They had eight children, of whom four are living.

Gordon C. was their sixth child. He received his education in Missouri, residing there to his twenty-eighth year. He was interested in a store and was under sheriff of Moniteau county from 1859 until 1862. The latter year he entered the Confederate service, as a member of Captain Wallace W. Williams' company, but was soon taken prisoner and was paroled, after which he came to Montana. His journey hither was made up the Missouri river on the steamer Welcome as far as Milk river, and from there on the Fort Benton to Fort Benton, arriving at the latter place July 2, 1864. He engaged in mining at Alder Gulch and at Last Chance for one season.

Mr. Vineyard had been married January 17, 1861, to Miss Thursa A. Finley, a native of Missouri and a daughter of William Finley, who was born in Tennessee; and when he decided to remain in Montana, she came here to join him, bringing with her their little son Walter. This son is still living and is their only child. In June, 1865, Mr. Vineyard, with two other men, went to Fort Benenmity between the cattle men and sheep men.

"Montana is being ruined," says the cattle king.

"Why, what is the matter?"

"Sheepéd!"

Instead of telling me that the glorious Grampian hills on which Norval's sire feeds his fleecy flocks, are being denuded of native verdure by these innumerable woolly folds, the great cattle king and the king of laconics simply says, "Sheepéd."

Two tremendous engines groan with their work here—as when we crossed the Oregon Sierras—and here also is a tunnel; not a notably long one, but enough to tell you that these lofty pasture-lands are not quite so smooth and level as they look.

Down, down, down, goes the stage! You twist and turn and cork-screw around mountains that have been half washed away by the hydraulics of former gold-hunters. Hundreds of old cabins, covered with earth, dust, and ashes on their heads as they stoop under the weight of years, dot the roadsides and mountain tops. All the way, up and down, to right and to left, you see shafts and tunnels, with tons and hundreds of tons of quartz—white quartz and yellow quartz—at their mouths. The miner is not nearly done with Montana yet.

In an incredibly short time we cross the Missouri river. He is striking out direct for Canada, with all the yellow dust of both his banks.

ton with teams to join their families. About that time an Indian had been killed by some white men, and his body had floated down the river and lodged on a bar near the fort. Mr. Vineyard helped to pull him out of the water. Excitement ran high, the Indians being greatly exasperated over the murder of one of their number. Their families not having arrived, Mr. Vineyard and his friends and some freighters, nineteen in all, proceeded down the river to the mouth of the Marias, where they met with an adventure that will never be forgotten by any of the party. The Burris party were down in that vicinity getting out logs with which to build a warehouse, when they were attacked by the Blackfoot Indians and all killed—eleven in number. Mr. Vineyard and his company heard the firing and went to their relief, but arrived too late to be of any service, the red men having gone and the whites all being horribly butchered. All they could do was to bury the bodies, which they did. That night they camped at the mouth of the Marias. Fearing an attack from the Indians, they prepared to sell their lives as dearly as possible. They, however, were not molested; but that night some Indians came to their camp, and, although professing to be friendly, caused the white men great uneasiness. Soon after this Mrs. Vineyard and the rest of the party arrived, and they made their journey back to Helena in safety.

For a number of years Mr. Vineyard continued mining, operating in the following camps: Grizzly Gulch, Tucker Gulch and Big Indian, and had a claim of his own in the last named camp. He was also one of the discoverers of Mitchell Gulch, where he mined one year, meeting with fair success; but built a ditch there in which he sank all he had made. After this he again mined at Big Indian, with success, remaining there until the fall of 1870, when he again went to Helena. In 1871 we find him in the Race Track diggings, and later at Warm Spring, and the following year he turned his attention to farming near where Anaconda is now located, and had the misfortune to have his crop destroyed by crickets. He was not discouraged, however, and his next venture was to purchase a squatter's claim of Mr. Huskill. Again he broke ground and planted a crop, and again his crop was destroyed in a like manner. At this juncture he was obliged to leave his wife and child on the land he had purchased and go and work in the mines for their support. Later, he homesteaded 160 acres of land east of and adjoining the town site of Anaconda. Here he was successful, raising excellent crops of potatoes and oats, and selling his product for good prices, continuing here until 1874. At that time he and a partner built another ditch, which, however, proved a failure. They then removed to Phillipsburg, where he mined and cut wood, and where they remained three years, at the end of that time moving back to the ranch. This was in 1877, after the Nez Perces war. He continued farming until 1882, his efforts being attended with success. In 1883 he sold his farm to the Anaconda Town Company for $3,000, and the [illegible] to the Anaconda Smelter are now built upon a portion of it, the property, of course, having greatly increased in value. After selling his farm Mr. Vineyard went to Butte City and [illegible] mines for three years. He then returned to Anaconda and purchased property, and he and his family have since resided here, where they are well known and highly respected, being ranked with the leading pioneers of the place.

Mr. Vineyard and his wife are members of the Christian Church. He is a Master Mason and an active member of Acacia Lodge, No. 33, of Anaconda. Politically, he is a Democrat. Twice he was elected to serve as County Commissioner of Jefferson county, and he has served one term in the same office in Deer Lodge county.

"I should like to know how the country looks between here and Canada; a wilderness, I reckon, of wild animals and impenetrable woods."

The cattle king unhooked his left leg from the corner of a seat before us and set it down.

"I'll give you a pointer," old man," he began, almost savagely. "This country is settled up from here to Canada, and for hundreds of miles further on, and it is settled up on the other side of this road from here to Salt Lake and from Salt Lake on down to Mexico. Yes, sir! You can get on a horse and ride from here to Mexico and put up at a house every night: same way to the north, sir. Will you go with me out to my ranch? Only a few miles out; carriage waiting for me at the next stage station. Come; will send you back in the morning, if you like."

And I went. The country I found to be much the same as that we had crossed; the same majestic, grassy hills, only not so badly "sheepéd." The same herds of cattle; scattering pines, pleasant brooks; birds innumerable, wild berries, wild flowers; the wild roses were in full bloom and the banks of some streams were red; the air redolent of wild roses.

The great pass through which the first explorers made their way to the head waters of the Columbia was found to be a very sultry and MICHAEL J. CONNELL, Butte, Montana.—Success is the watchword of the man of affairs, and when that is achieved, it is evidence that it is not all of life to live. The rapid development of the frontier and mining settlements in a most forbidden and unsightly location, far remote from established centers of travel and civilization, into a great city, is one of the most remarkable evolutions which awaken one's interest in the agencies that have contributed to so wonderful a result, and especially in the personality of those who have witnessed the foundation-laying of a commercial metropolis. The men who have made Butte the commercial center of a large territory are all possessed of that peculiar character and pluck which the world admires. These men possess hearts in which nature has kindled its living flame, and before whose irresistible force obstacles fade.

Michael J. Connell, whose appearance indicates marked ability and unquestioned force, a man of strong character, clear, active mind, has, from a modest beginning, made his way to the front in the business life of Montana, by broad, honorable business methods and an unconquerable determination to succeed. He was born in Ireland, in September, 1854, at Knock-alohert, a lovely spot in that picturesque section embraced in the Barony of Duhallow. Adjoining Knock-alohert stands the Green-Hall school, in which his father and grandfather had always taken such a lively interest, and in which he received his early education. The boy was fortunate in having excellent parents of culture and high standing in the community, his father, John Connell, being the leader of thought and advancement in that section of country and whose calm, sound advice has been as a guiding star during the agitation and strife of recent years.

Early in life, Mr. Connell evinced a restless nature and a desire to travel, and so, at the age of sixteen, he came to New York and soon after secured employment in the dry-goods house of C. F. Hovey & Company, Boston, where he remained for five years, during which time he acquired a thorough knowledge of the business methods employed by that sterling old house.

Again growing restless and believing the opportunities for ambition were better in the Western cities than the East, he came to Montana, arriving at Deer Lodge in July, 1875, where he had secured a position with E. L. Bonner & Company. When he first came to Deer Lodge, he engaged a room at the McBurney Hotel, thinking the charges were somewhat similar to equal accommodations in the East. To his astonishment he found that he was charged $4 per day for room only, and that his living expenses were about thirty per cent more than his earnings. After that he accommodated himself with sleeping quarters in the store. His first year with the Deer Lodge firm proved his business ability to such an extent that he was given charge of the business with one-third interest in the profits. Soon after, Butte City began to demand the attention of the mining world, and lay bare its great ledges of silver and copper, convincing him that it would be a more desirable point for business than the easy-going town of Deer Lodge. A branch was soon started under the Deer Lodge firm name, which under Mr. Connell's management in a few years far exceeded the business of the main store. Mr. Connell is a firm believer in the corporate system of conducting business, and the Bonner Mercantile Company, which absorbed the above concern, was about the first business incorporation in Montana, which continued until 1891, at which time he purchased his partner's interest, and the M. J. Connell Company was organized. Better facilities being needed, electric lights, elevators, steam heat, modern precaution against fire, were added with other improvements, which make the M. J. Connell block the finest and best equipped business building west of Chicago. Too much credit cannot be given the M. J. Connell Company for the enterprise displayed in the conception and dusty road in summer and passable for pack-trains and teams during the entire winter, as a rule. In truth, Montana proved to be a land quite as temperate, taking her from top to bottom, as the most favored State in the North, far more temperate than most of them; and it is a fact that more people perished from the snow in the city of New York in the year when Senator Roscoe Conkling lost his life there than ever yet perished in the snows of Montana, all told.

In the three years of Montana's existence a man was seen sitting under a shade-tree on a bank of mid-summer snow with his baby romping about in the melon patch, from which the wife had brought a luscious reminder of Georgia. The brown-faced farmer, who had worn the gray, cut the melon, as he sat on some grass which he had tossed on the hard-snow bank, and shared it with wife and baby.

At last the real and enduring prosperity of Montana was beginning.

A year later there were to be seen fruit trees laden with the most delicious fruit, standing not two hundred feet below a bank of snow that would, perhaps, remain there for years, and erection of this magnificent business house in this Western metropolis. Business is conducted as in the large establishments of the East, skilled buyers being in charge of each department, and such has been the success of the business that at present 120 persons are employed and every express moving in Montana brings orders and carries goods for the M. J. Connell Company.

Nor does Mr. Connell's talents and business enterprise stop with the dry-goods business, to which he devoted his early life. His strong character pushed on and during the midst of the recent panic, when financial shipwreck and ruin seemed in the very air, and when every man you met appeared discouraged and ready to succumb to the approaching universal commercial disaster, he stood by his friends with material aid and gave confidence to the community by erecting a large lumber-manufacturing plant in the heart of the city, and locating beside it the yards and business of the Miners' Lumber Company, of which he is owner. He is also president and a heavy stockholder in the Kenyon-Connell Commercial Company, which does the largest hardware business in the State; and, like most of Montana's prominent citizens interested in her growth and development, he has become largely and profitably engaged in mining enterprises; and he liberally aids with his money and influence all public enterprises intended to benefit the State. He has always taken a deep interest in religious and charitable works and has given his full aid to every institution in the city, knowing no creed or bounds in his charity. Many young people far distant from Montana, as well as here, are being encouraged and aided by him in obtaining the educational training which he considers the first necessity for any body ambitious to make a successful career.

Mr. Connell, although still a very young man, is head and front of the largest enterprises in the State, all thoroughly organized and equipped, and, as he puts it, "I am ready for any new enterprise that promises good returns, as I have plenty of idle time which should be occupied."

In personal appearance, Mr. Connell is tall, clean-cut and quite dark. He makes a decidedly favorable impression, which, coupled with an irresistible cordiality, makes strangers feel at ease in his company. He is public-spirited and liberal to a degree, and is much admired by all who know him for his sterling qualities. He is constantly in the ascendancy, seeing from the standpoint of his own indomitable courage and hopeful nature, the possibilities of next year from this, next month from the present month, and to-morrow from to-day. He trusts his own instinct fully and has the courage of his convictions to a remarkable degree. His ambition is to stand high in the commercial world, and by nobly pursuing a legitimate business he has attained the highest mark for the strictest integrity, and is recognized as one of the brightest, most enterprising and sagacious men in the Northwest. His business principles are of the soundest, and during his twenty years in Montana he has never overlooked his profound regard for the great elements of right and wrong.

A prominent feature of Mr. Connell's character is his faculty for making himself popular with his employees. Though a man of few words, his just treatment of those whom he employs, and frequent proof of his interest in them, wins him their respect and best efforts. Some of his employees, who have been in his service many years, say that they have never known him to exhibit an ill-tempered spirit, no matter what may have been the provocation.

His life has been closely identified with Montana, of which he is very proud, and his personal history is a vital part of that of the State, connecting the present with the past.

He is in politics a Democrat, and has always taken a deep interest in the affairs of his party, but he is too much engaged with his large business to be induced further into public position by accepting any office that his party may honor him with.

In 1880, Mr. Connell married a Boston lady, Mary Agnes Keane, and although they have since spent much may have been there, some of it, for centuries. In fact, the fruit trees were greatly indebted to this bank, not only for protection from frost and storm, but also for nourishment.

As noted before, fine stock, fine farming implements and all else that adds to the enduring prosperity of a great State, had been brought to Montana right along, notwithstanding the desperate character of the savages. There seems to be a sort of tonic in peril for the men of Montana, and they take it as men of older lands take to leisure and luxury.

The wheat crop of Montana in 1868, so far as was reported to the auditor, reached 850,000 bushels, barley, 540,000; oats, 650,000; potatoes, 770,000. There was also reported 43,216 head of stock, valued at $1,582,418. At that time there were also in the State two tanneries, one foundry, seven planing-mills, seventeen saw-mills, fifteen distilleries and breweries, and four furniture factories, besides plow and wagon, boot and shoe shops, and all sorts of leather-consuming factories to use hides, which were not profitable to import before the era of railroads.

I here append a table covering three years of agricultural and pastoral progress in Montana, compiled by S. P. Bassett and Joseph Magee, for the Montana Publishing Company. It is the oldest table I have been able to procure. It is not official, but entirely reliable.

of their time in traveling in this country and Europe they have one of the most delightful homes in the city, to which they always fondly turn and where they are loved and welcomed.

SAMUEL H. BOSWORTH, proprietor of the American Hotel at Forsyth, Montana, was born in the State of Maine, in 1835, a son of Daniel and May (Huckins) Bosworth; his parents were pioneer settlers in the eastern portion of that State. His great grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812, and his father was a farmer and ship-builder.

Soon after attaining his growth to manhood, Mr. Bosworth of this sketch emigrated to the great West, where he has had a wonderful experience, in the Rocky mountain region, during the settlement of the various Territories and the subjugation of the many tribes of Indians. In 1879 he settled in Wyoming, at the summit of the Rocky mountains (Sherman), where he conducted a hotel for three years, after which he engaged in livery business

CHAPTER XXII.

THE INDIAN WARS OF MONTANA—THE TREACHERY OF INDIANS TOWARD THEIR FRIENDS—MEANNESS AND IMBECILITY OF CONGRESS IN DEALING WITH MONTANA—GRANT'S WISDOM—1868 TO 1872.

I MUST now turn, and very reluctantly, to the Indian wars of Montana; they were terrible, persistant, almost continuous, as said before, from the date of the discoveries of gold; and yet they could hardly be called wars, for on the one side there was nothing of the rules or ammunitions of war, simply butcheries. It is a safe assertion that more white men fell before the Indians here; more good, true blood drenched the mountains and plains of Montana, than all the other States or Territories since the birth of the Republic. The marvel is that the country did not become emptied of the Saxon, and, indeed, it probably would have been had it not been for the continual coming of like daring men in quest of lands and fortune.

It is conceded by all authorities and insisted on by many that the Flathead Indians were the best or "least bad" of all the Montana or neighboring Indians from first to last; yet the young braves of that tribe, as well as those of other tribes, all born to battle, and taught in the trade of war from generations before, the tribe could not be restrained when other tribes went on the war-path. At such times the reservation was strangely empty of Indians. They had gone out hunting; most of them, by permission of the agent, who meant well enough, but knew no in Denver, Colorado, until the winter of 1882-83, when he came to Forsyth and entered upon his present business. In 1890 he was manager of the Grand Hotel at Billings, and has since been the proprietor of the American Hotel. He is widely and favorably known as a genial, first-class landlord. In 1855, in Maine, he married Miss Mattie Bailey, a daughter of Thomas Bailey, who was a prominent lumberman of that State. By this marriage there have been one son and a daughter.

George Bosworth, the son, was born in 1856, in the State of Maine, where he grew to manhood, receiving a common-school education. At the age of twenty-two years he entered upon a railroad business, on the Union Pacific Railroad between Cheyenne and Laramie. Working his way up, he first became conductor in 1880, on the South Park Railroad, running between Denver and Leadville. He has been connected with the Union Pacific Railroad ever since 1883, as conductor between Glendive and Billings.

He is a fine specimen of manhood and a genial gentleman. His sister, Katie, is the wife of W. S. Becker, assistant superintendent of the North Dakota branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad. Mr. Bosworth is a member of Ashlar Lodge, No. 29, A. F. & A. M., at Billings, and also of Chapter No. 6, R. A. M. Besides, he also belongs to the order of Railway Conductors. He owns stock in Castle silver mines, in Meagher county, also in Cook City mines in Park county. In his political sympathies he is a Democrat.

DAVID COHEN, SR., figures prominently as one of the respected citizens and early and successful business men of Anaconda, and is ranked with the Montana pioneers of 1864.

Mr. Cohen was born in Exin, Prussia, February 16, 1839. He received his early education in his native country, and when sixteen years of age emigrated to America, landing in New York city and there securing a clerkship at $15 per month. He remained in New York two years. Then he went to Chicago and clerked in a general merchandise store in that city. In 1861 we find him in Vicksburg. From there he went to New Orleans and thence to Philadelphia, and from the latter place started for Pike's Peak, stopping for a short time in Kansas. Before reaching his destination, however, he met a party returning from that place who brought a bad report of the country, and this news caused him to return to Leavenworth, Kansas. A little later, becoming convinced of the great opportunities offered for trade in Montana, he, in partnership with a Mr. Phillips, fitted out a train of merchandise and miners' supplies and started across the better. General Crook more than once drew the attention of the Indian department to this recurrence in the case of all Indians; whenever an Indian war was on, little matter how far away, these weak-minded and war-loving Ishmaelites went out on hunting expeditions from all or nearly all the reservations up and down the land. When the war was on, or when, as in most cases, the army got well in the field, the Indians melted away from before them like snow, and one by one reported to the agent at the reservation for back rations and ammunition. General Howard, than whom there never was a kindlier-disposed officer toward the Indians, continually reported in line with General Crook's complaint, about having to fight Indians who were fed and cared for by the Government.* In his war with the semi-civilized Indians of Oregon, Indians that had been born and bred along with white children and in sight of schoolhouses and churches, went on the war-path and betrayed those who had been their schoolmates, even those who were members of the same church, under the direction of their dreamer as a duty to their race. They simply cannot overcome, in one or two generations at least, this love of blood and plunder if reasonably tempted to take the field. Let us, in plains on the 5th of April, 1864. They were three months on the way, their journey being fraught with many privations, and on the 22d of June they landed in Virginia City.

Upon their arrival in Montana, Mr. Cohen and his partner opened up their stock in Nevada City (near Virginia City) and at once began selling goods. He was there during the flour riot. His stock of flour consisted of 100 sacks, all of which the committee took, allowing him cost for it. He was also there through the exciting times of the "Vigilants," and saw Slater hung. In the spring of 1865 he removed to Helena, sold out his stock soon afterward, and returned to Denver, being there at the time of the killing of the men at Julesburg. Martial law was declared in Denver, and such was the excitement throughout the West that it was considered unsafe to attempt to return to the States; so he concluded to fit out an ox train at Denver, which he did, and started back to Montana about the last of August. His return trip was attended with many difficulties, the Indians being hostile, the cold weather setting in, and half of their oxen dying, but with the aid of cattle they hired they finally reached Virginia City in November. Again Mr. Cohen opened up in business in Nevada City, and prospered greatly. He had a mining claim in the gulch, which he operated and which also proved a success. A year later he returned to Leavenworth, and attended the wedding of his sister Austina, who married Mr. Copenis, and after this event he set sail for Paris. He spent some time on the Continent, visiting his old home and friends, and the Paris Exposition in 1867, and in 1870 was married in Berlin to Miss Rosalie Engel, a native of that place.

Soon after his marriage Mr. Cohen returned with his bride to America, and again took up his abode in Montana. He opened a store at Deer Lodge and was doing a prosperous business, when, a year and a half later, he and others were visited by a disastrous fire, in which he lost all his accumulations. This was a severe blow to him, but with courage undaunted he soon started up in business again, he and his brother, Alec Cohen, being partners and doing a successful business there until 1877, at which time he removed to Butte City. In 1880 he bought out his brother's interest and continued in the business alone.

In 1883, when Anaconda was started Mr. Cohen was, through the influence of Marcus Daly, induced to come to this place, and with his characteristic push and energy he established the first business house in the town. This store was located on lot 9 and block 7, on the west side of Main street. He conducted a prosperous business here until 1889, when he retired, and until November, 1891, he

*From the few prisoners taken the story was confirmed that some Klamaths and several Columbia river Indians had already joined the Bannacks and Pi-Utes; and that a body of Umatillas had come southward, perhaps fifty or sixty miles from their reservation, and gone into camp. They were evidently in sympathy with the hostiles.

After examining all sources of information, I concluded that our enemies under Egan after their fight and brief subsequent halt had turned northward, following up Silver creek, and were making for the south fork of John Day river. They would certainly follow this fork as far as possible, and then go up Grand or Bridge creek to join the Umatillas, or Cayuse Indians, as we named them, who had come southward to meet them. This was a new move, and like a snowball, the rolling mass certainly increasing in size.—Gen. O. O. Howard in Overland Magazine, San Francisco, August, 1887.

Still it is next to impossible for a commander successfully to follow Indian raiders or locate Indian camps without Indian scouts. We sought earnestly to obtain them in this war; first from the celebrated Captain Smith, the agent of the Warm Spring tribe. They were offered the privilege of furnishing their own horses, twenty-five of them, and they were to meet us en route at the Dalles, charity to these red children, see what they have to fight with in their own fierce natures, and then we will understand what we must do in the way of protecting them from themselves. Let us take this same Flathead tribe the traditional, kindly and gentle Indian; certainly, as said before, the most gentle savage of all the Montanese. Here is one picture drawn by Ross Cox, an English gentleman of culture and versatility, who came to what is now Montana by way of the Columbia, after the fall of Astoria. He, being at the head of the fur-trading company, brought with him quite a force of Canadians and Kanakas, arms, ammunition and supplies, not to mention fifteen gallons of rum, and thus equipped, sat down to spend the first Christmas (1813) ever reported by any white man in Montana, if we except Lewis and Clarke hovering about the mouth of the Yellowstone nearly a decade earlier. He says:

"We spent a comparatively happy Christmas, and by the side of a blazing fire in a warm room forgot the sufferings we endured in our dreary progress through the woods. There was, however, in the midst of our festivities a great drawback from the pleasure we should otherwise have enjoyed. I allude to the unfortunate Blackfeet who had been cap-was not engaged in any active business. Then he and his son-in-law, Mr. Katzenstein, formed a partnership and opened a large clothing and gents' furnishing goods house at the corner of Cherry and Commercial streets, where they keep an elegant stock of goods and have an extensive trade.

During the whole of his residence in Montana Mr. Cohen has been more or less interested in mining operations. He now has large mining interests, is president of the North Cross Company, and is ranked with the capitalists of the State. He is also largely interested in Anaconda real estate, has erected a number of buildings here, and has done much to advance the growth and prosperity of the town.

Mr. and Mrs. Cohen have had six children, four of whom are living, namely: Anna, wife of Mr. Katzenstein; Oswald D., Charles C. and Jessie.

With fraternal organizations Mr. Cohen is prominently identified. He is Past Chief Patriarch of the Encampment, I. O. O. F.; Grand Master of the Exchequer, K. of P., for the State of Montana; Past Master Workman of the A. O. U. W., and has served as a delegate to the Grand Lodge a number of times; and served as the First Treasurer of the National Union. Politically, he has been a Republican all his life. While he has frequently been requested to accept nominations for positions of trust in city and county, he has always declined such honor, preferring to devote his time to his own private interests.

Such is a brief sketch of the life of one of Montana's enterprising and successful business men.

HON. H. R. COMLY, a Montana pioneer of 1865, and for almost a third of a century prominent in her affairs, both as a lawyer and a statesman, is a native of Pennsylvania, born in Philadelphia, March 12, 1841.

Henry Comly, the progenitor of the Comly family in America, was an English Quaker who settled in Philadelphia in 1681, and in that city all the generations of the family were born and resided up to the subject of this sketch. His great-grandfather, Joseph Comly, fought on the Colonial side in the Revolution, and because of this was turned out of the Quaker meeting; and later, while bearing dispatches from Philadelphia to Long Island, was captured and shot by the Tories. James M. Comly, the father of our subject, was born in Philadelphia, March 22, 1805; married Miss Sarah L. Retzer, also a native of Philadelphia, and a descendant of a German family who settled there in 1750. They had five children, three of whom are still living. The mother died in her thirty-sixth year, and the father in his seventy-second.

Harry R. Comly, whose name heads this article, received his education in the schools of his native city, graduating in the Central High School, with the degree of Master of Arts. Choosing the law for his profession, he entered upon its study, and April 10, 1863, was admitted to the bar. He began practice in Philadelphia and continued there until the spring of 1865, when he came to Montana, and here he has spent the prime of his life in the practice of his profession, and in holding various or afterward. No inducements, however, could procure them. Similar efforts were made to secure scouts from the Umatillas, the Walla Wallas, the Nez Perces and other Indians, but for quite a time without success. These failures indicated beyond a doubt that there was a secret understanding among a score of tribes; in fact, among all those who range through Idaho, Oregon and Washington Territory. No matter how advanced any of them were in knowledge and civilization, their "Dreamers," or Tooats, had over their minds a wonderful influence, and the hopeful predictions of ultimate success had for a time many ardent believers.—Ibid.

tured by the Flatheads. Having been informed that they were about putting one of their prisoners to death, I went to their camp to witness the spectacle. The man was tied to a tree, after which they heated an old barrel of a gun until it became red hot, with which they burned him on the legs, thighs, neck, cheek and stomach. They then commenced cutting the flesh from about the nails, which they pulled out, and next separated the fingers from the hand, joint by joint. During the performance of these cruelties, the wretched captive never winced, and instead of suing for mercy he added fresh stimulants to their barbarous ingenuity by the most irritating reproaches, part of which our interpreter translated as follows: 'My heart is strong; you do not hurt me; you can't hurt me; you are fools; you do not know how to torture; try it again; I don't feel any pain yet. We torture your relations a great deal better, because we make them cry out loud, like little children. You are not brave—you have small hearts, and you are always afraid to fight.'

"Then addressing one in particular he said: 'It was by my arrow you lost your eye,' upon which the Flathead darted at him and with a knife in a moment scooped out one of his eyes, at the same time cutting the bridge of his nose offices of importance in the State. He has during his history in Montana been interested in mining and in the development of gold, silver, lead and copper mines. He has also been interested to some extent in Helena real estate. All his life he has been an active member of the Democratic party, but always noted for honesty and actuated by the utmost fairness he has all along won many friends outside of his party. He was elected to and served in the fourth, fifth, seventh and thirteenth sessions of the Territorial Legislature, and was Chief Clerk of the fourth and fifth sessions of the Territorial Council. In 1871–2 he was Speaker of the House, and was a member of the first and second State Legislative Assemblies and Speaker of the House up to November, 1892. Thus it can be seen that he has held a most important position during all the great excitement attending the admission of Montana as a State. He has the honor of having been the compromise Speaker of the joint House, and did his full share in reconciling the discordant factions which at times seemed so liable to result in greatest disaster. In 1879 Mr. Comly was by an act of the Assembly appointed a Commissioner to codify the laws of the Territory. This office he performed in a most satisfactory manner, and, in fact, it can be justly said of him that in all his public life as well as in his professional career he has been actuated by the highest conscientious views.

In the Masonic fraternity Mr. Comly has also taken an active part. He has the honor of being Past Grand Master, Past Eminent Commander, Past High Priest and Past Illustrious Master of the Council. At this writing (1893) he is an active member of the Supreme Council of the Southern Jurisdiction of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite for the State of Montana. He has attained the highest degree in the great Masonic fraternity.

Mr. Comly was married in October, 1882, to Mrs. Beatrice J. Hornbuckle, daughter of John B. Seykora, a native of Bohemia. Mrs. Comly came to America with her parents when she was two years old, and was reared and educated in this country. She and Mr. Comly have two children, James R. and Harry S.

Mr. Comly has recently purchased a tract of land at San Diego, California, which he is having planted to fruit, and where in the future he expects to make his home.

CHARLES ANGUS, Clerk and Recorder of Park county, Montana, was born in Rotherhithe, England, in 1844, son of William Angus. His boyhood days were spent in his native land, and in 1860, at the age of sixteen, he came to the United States and located first in New York city, where he remained for a short time. From there he went to Canada, but in 1864, when the Civil war was raging, he returned to the States, resolved to fight for the country of his adoption. He accordingly enlisted in the First Delaware Infantry and served in the Army of the Potomac. After the war closed he came West and entered the Regular Army, Second Cavalry, in which he served for a term of three years, taking part in all the Indian troubles in which his regiment was engaged. At the expiration of his term of service, he followed other pursuits for four years. Military life, however, still had its infatuations for him, and he again joined the Second United States Cavalry, and shared its camp life and Indian fighting for more than seven years.

In 1882, the Indians having ceased their hostilities, and military life becoming dull, Mr. Angus retired from the army and came to Livingston, Park county. That was about the time the village of Livingston was christened. Here he was for a number of years employed as clerk in mercantile establishments, and became well and favorably known, his popularity being attested in the fall of 1892, when he was elected County Clerk and Recorder of Park county.

Mr. Angus has two children, James B. and Effie M. His wife is deceased. Politically, he is a Republican; religiously, an adherent of the Episcopal faith; and fraternally, a member of the I. O. O. F., being Noble Grand of Park Lodge, No. 17.

almost in two. This did not stop him; with the remaining eye he looked sternly at another and said, 'I killed your brother, and scalped your old fool of a father.' The warrior to whom this was addressed instantly sprung at him and separated the scalp from his head. He was then about plunging a knife in his heart, until he was told by the chief to desist. The raw scull, bloody socket and mutilated nose now presented a horrible appearance, but by no means changed his tone of defiance.

"'It was I,' said he to the chief,' that made your wife a prisoner last fall; we put out her eyes; we tore out her tongue; we treated her like a dog. Forty of our young warriors'—

"The chief became incensed the moment his wife's name was mentioned; he seized his gun and, before the last sentence was ended, a ball from it passed through the brave fellow's heart and terminated his frightful sufferings. Shocking, however, as this dreadful exhibition was, it was far exceeded by the atrocious cruelties practiced on the female prisoners. We remonstrated against the exercise of such horrible cruelties. They replied by saying the Blackfeet treated their prisoners in the same manner; that it was the course adopted by all red warriors, and that they could not think of giving up the gratification of their revenge to the foolish and womanish feelings of white men.

HON. LEE MANTLE, of Butte City, is a native of Birmingham, England, born on the 13th day of December, 1853, springing from one of the old English families.

His parents were Joseph and Mary Susan (Patrick) Mantle. The youngest of their seven children was the subject of this sketch, born after the father's death, which left the family in limited circumstances. The great burden of caring for a family of young children the widow bore courageously and successfully. They all came to America when Lee was in his tenth year, settling at Salt Lake City. He was "placed out" to work for his board and clothes, and for four years he was employed in herding cows and on the farm. At the age of sixteen he was still working on the farm and received $50 for that year's service, including his board.

The Union Pacific was then completed to Utah, and he proceeded to the point where the men were at work on the road, and obtained a job of driving team, hauling ties, and he was thus employed when the Union and Central Pacific railroads met, at Promontory, in Utah, and were completed, in 1869. The following year he packed his blankets and walked to Malad City, a distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles, where he met B. F. White, since the Governor of the Territory of Montana, who gave him a job in driving oxen, hauling salt from his salt works in the mountains of Eastern Idaho to Virginia City, Montana, and to Boise City, Idaho. After following this occupation for two years, he chanced to meet on one of the trips W. N. Shilling, now a banker in Ogden, who at that time was telegraph operator at Malad, Idaho, and young Mantle made an agreement with him to learn telegraphy, on condition that he (Mantle) should keep the line in repair through the winter. He learned rapidly and acquired considerable reputation on the line for his capability, energy and promptness, and finally was given the position of general repairer on the main line between Ogden and Green river on the Union Pacific Railroad for the Western Union Telegraph Company. After serving in that capacity four months, the company gave him an office on the overland stage line between Corinne, Utah, and Helena, Montana. His station was the old Williams Junction, just across the Idaho line, where he was also the local agent for the Gilmore and Salisbury Stage Company. During the following summer he returned across the line to the old Pleasant Valley Home station, on the apex of the Rocky mountain range, where he purchased the station and was telegraph operator, Postmaster and stage agent, and also acquired an interest in the old Beaver Canon toll road.

In 1877 he sold out his interests there and came to Butte City, and opened the Wells-Fargo express office. Two years later he was given charge of the first telegraph office opened at Butte, and also became the first insurance agent there. Hard work in all these responsible positions caused his health to fail, and, being advised to enter some outdoor employment, he became a partner of William Owsley (afterwards Mayor of Butte) in the livery business. In 1880, he became an active participant in the affairs of Butte City, and one of the champions who fought through all the opposition and secured the incorporation of the city. Accordingly he was made one of the first Aldermen. He organized the Inter-Mountain Publishing Company, and began the publication of the daily Inter-Mountain. There had been no Republican daily paper on the west side of the mountains in western Montana, and he became the business manager of the institution, which he has since filled in a manner that has secured the complete success of the undertaking and which has had much to do in shaping the politics and advancing the public interests of the western portion of his State. Mr. Mantle has all along been the principal owner of the paper, and is still at the head of its management, occasionally doing editorial duty.

In 1882 he was elected a member of the Lower House

"Shortly after this we observed a young female led forth, apparently not more than fourteen or fifteen years of age, surrounded by some old women, who were conducting her to one end of the village, whither they were followed by a number of young men. Having learned the infamous intentions of her conquerers, and feeling interested for the unfortunate victim, we renewed our remonstrance, but received nearly the same answer as before. Finding them still inflexible, and wishing to adopt every means in our power consistent with safety, in the cause of humanity, we ordered our interpreter to acquaint them that, highly as we valued their friendship and much as we esteemed their furs, we would quit their country forever unless they discontinued their unmanly and disgraceful cruelties to their prisoners. This had the desired effect, and the miserable captive was led back to her sorrowing group of friends. Our interference was nearly rendered ineffectual by the furious old priestesses who had been conducting her to the sacrifice. They told the young warriors they were cowards, fools, and had not the hearts of fleas, and called on them in the names of their mothers, sisters and wives to follow the steps of their forefathers and have their revenge on the dogs of Blackfeet. They began to waver, but we affected not to understand what the old women had been sayof the Territorial Legislature. In 1884 there was a great struggle in this Territory for the choice of delegates to the Republican national convention at Chicago. Governor Schuyler Crosby and Colonel Wilbur F. Sanders were on one side, and Mr. Mantle and Major G. O. Eaton on the other. The contest was very severe, and resulted in the selection of Mr. Mantle as an Edmunds man and Colonel Sanders as a Blaine man. In the autumn of 1884 he was nominated for the Lower House of the Territorial Legislature, and was defeated by a combination of the gambling element, which demanded a pledge that Mr. Mantle would not interfere with their calling,—which pledge he declined to give. The majority against him, however, was very small.

In 1885, when Governor Crosby was made First Assistant Postmaster General, under President Arthur, his office as Governor of Montana was left vacant, and Mr. Mantle's name was presented for the place, but the contest between the eastern and western portions of the Territory occasioned his defeat. In 1886 he was again candidate for the Legislature, was elected, and took an active part in behalf of a registration law to secure honest elections. In 1887 the Northern Pacific Railroad Company sought to secure from the Government patents to large grants of the valuable mineral lands in this Territory. The people being aroused on the subject, held a mass convention at Helena to devise means for the prevention of such gigantic fraud. The Mineral Land Association was formed and Mr. Mantle was made its permanent president, and such a vigorous fight was made that the issuance of patents to the railroad company was stopped, and has never since been revived. Subsequently the supreme court of the United States sustained the people against the railroads in this matter.

In 1888, Mr. Mantle was again elected to the Lower House, and had the honor of being elected its Speaker. This was the Sixteenth and last Territorial Assembly. During this session he was very active in passing a registration law and the Australian ballot law. In the succeeding autumn, Mr. Mantle had the honor of nominating Thomas H. Carter for Congress, who was elected by a large majority. In 1889, Montana was admitted into the Union. In 1890, Mr. Mantle was a candidate before the first State Legislature for the United States Senate, and was defeated in the caucus by only two votes, Senator Thomas C. Power being his successful competitor. In 1890, he was made chairman of the Republican State convention, held at Butte.

In the spring of 1892, he was candidate for Mayor of the city of Butte, and was elected by a very large majority. While in this office the enterprise of the city public library was pushed forward, the plans for the buildings devised and the contracts let. In May, 1892, he was made temporary chairman of the State convention, held at Missoula, to send delegates to the National Republican convention, at Minneapolis. In the fall of 1892, Mr. Mantle was made permanent chairman of the Republican State convention held at Great Falls to nominate State officers. At the same time he was made chairman of the Republican State Central Committee; and this committee secured the election of Governor Rickards and Republican supremacy in the State. In 1893 the Republicans in the State Legislature were in a minority, and at the first caucus of the party Senator Sanders and Mr. Mantle were candidates for the caucus nomination for the United States Senate, the former receiving the nomination by one vote. He was voted upon for three weeks in the Legislature without being elected, and finally Mr. Mantle was made the caucus nominee, and received the vote of his party until the Legislature adjourned without an election. When Senator Sanders' term expired, Governor Rickards promptly appointed Mr. Mantle to fill the vacancy; but the United States Senate refused Mr. Mantle his seat, nominally on constitutional grounds, yet it was

ing. We told them that this act of self-denial on their part was peculiarly grateful to the white men, and by it they would secure our permanent residence among them, and in return for their furs be always furnished with guns and ammunition sufficient to repel the attacks of their old enemies, and preserve their relations from being made prisoners. This decided the doubtful, and the chief promised faithfully that no more tortures should be inflicted on the prisoners, which I believed was rigidly adhered to, at least during the winter of 1813."

Enough! This one bloody picture from a rare book of nearly 1,000 pages in the same line is not, believe me, given for the sake of blood, but because it is history with duty behind it. If this most gentle and docile tribe positively did these things, reflect what Montana must have endured with half a dozen still more cruel tribes in her midst; and reflect, also, what these mild people had to overcome in their own hearts, and what our duty is in helping them to do it. Although, as Howard says, and I think truly, even the most civilized will follow their dreams if we allow it.

To follow the long and almost continuous war-path of the Montana Indians for the past quarter of a century would be to follow a tortuous and most bloody path, and to little profit.

The Indian had much ground here. He not generally believed that two other reasons largely actuated the Senate; the one being that Mr. Mantle was a strong free-silver man, and the other, that if he were not seated an extra session of the Legislature would be called and a Democrat elected. Seeing through the design, the Governor declined to call an extra session, and the office was therefore vacant for nearly two years.

In 1894, Mr. Mantle was again unanimously made chairman of the State Republican Central Committee, the election resulting in an overwhelming Republican victory for the State.

Since coming to Montana, Mr. Mantle has been very successful in all his business ventures. For nine years he and Charles S. Warren were partners in real estate and mining, and had a large business and possessed many vast interests in nearly every part of the State. Mr. Mantle's newspaper, mining, real-estate and insurance business, connected with his exceedingly active political career, has kept him very busy, his success in all demonstrating him to be a superior man. He built the magnificent Inter Mountain Block, and various other valuable blocks, and has never lost an opportunity to advance the interests of Butte City or of the State of his adoption. He is the owner of the Birchdale stock farm, consisting of 2,500 acres, where he has many thoroughbred and trotting horses, and has taken a great deal of interest in the improvement of live stock throughout the State.

Mr. Mantle is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of the Elks, and of the Knights of Pythias. Of the last he was the first Grand Chancellor for Montana, and since its organization he has done all within his power to promote its prosperity.

Thus we have endeavored briefly to outline the progress of the poor, uneducated, fatherless boy, from his small and humble beginnings to his present high position of honor and comparative affluence, believing that it may be an incentive to other poor lads to emulate his efforts to "get there." Early in his boyhood he became the support of his mother, and for her he has constantly cared; and now the venerable lady, in the eighty-third year of her age, resides with her beloved son in the beautiful home which he has built for her in Butte City. He is still a single man and comparatively young; and the writer of this sketch believes that there will be other and brighter chapters in his career for future historians, as he is evidently in every way worthy of such promotion,—worthy of the highest honors that can be bestowed upon him by his fellow citizens.

JAMES A. TALBOTT, vice-president of the First National Bank of Butte City, Montana, is a Montana pioneer of 1863, and has been a mining man during nearly the whole of his life.

Mr. Talbott began his mining career in California in 1857, and made considerable money there, but at Virginia City, Nevada, lost all he had made. From [illegible] place he came in 1863 to Bannack, Montana, to retrieve his fortune and began working for wages in the mines. When gold was struck at Alder Gulch, he was [illegible] first to arrive at that place, and he mined [illegible] fully until 1865. From 1865 up to the present time he has been a resident of Deer Lodge and Silver Bow counties, and has made his money in [illegible] Silver Bow group of mines. By strict attention to business and by honorable and upright dealings he has accumulated a large property and has also made what is far better—a good name.

Mr. Talbott's parents were early settlers and prosperous farmers of Ohio. His father, Joshua O. Talbott, is of Irish descent, and is still living, [illegible] of eighty-six years; the mother, nee Adaline L. Williams, was of English descent and died in her eighty-third year. Their son, James A., was born in Ohio in 1838. He was married in 1875, to Miss Jose L. Ransdell, daughter of Joseph Ransdell, and they have had seven children, of only lost, deservedly lost, his hunting grounds to a great extent, but he lost his place in history and in the hearts of the people as a picturesque and a wronged man. Up to the time of his treacheries and butcheries in Montana, he had been looked upon as a man who was only defending his own. We defended and excused his barbarous deeds as best we could, because he was only a poor barbarian who battled as best he knew. But we seek in vain for any sort of excuse for his conduct here. A singular condition of things in this saddle of the Rocky mountains revealed his true nature as it had never been revealed before. Now mark this. Our first explorers traveled for days and days up the unnamed rivers of Montana, seeking everywhere they could for Indians or sign of Indians, and when at last they found some from which to purchase horses so as to proceed on their way down the waters of the Columbia, they tell us that the Shoshonees numbered only about one hundred. The truth is the top of the Rocky mountains, here where the rich mines were found and where the Indians murdered and plundered and did all sorts of devilment as long as they could, was neutral country. It did not belong to the Crow, the Sioux, the Shoshonee, the Bannack, the Blackfoot, or any one else, but was a whom four are living,—Mary, Maud, Jose R. and Claris. Mr. Talbott built the comfortable and attractive residence in Butte City, where he and his family live, in 1886.

He has had many interesting experiences in Montana and other parts of the West, but is somewhat reluctant to give his history. It is enough, however, to say that he is a splendid representative of Montana's mining men, and as vice-president of the bank he gives evidence of excellent financial ability. His many estimable traits of character and his cordial and genial manner have gained for him hosts of warm friends here in Montana.

JUDGE GEORGE ROSZELLE MILBURN, Judge of the Seventh Judicial District, comprising the counties of Dawson, Custer and Yellowstone, Montana, is a resident of Miles City. He was first elected to his present position in October, 1889, and re-elected in 1892, having been nominated by a Democratic convention, the district being largely Republican. He humorously claims to have been elected "by the grace of God and the help of the Republican party!"

He was born in the District of Columbia, in 1850, a son of Benedict and Martha (Page) Milburn. His father was of a well-known family in St. Mary's county, Maryland. His mother was closely related to the old Revolutionary families of the Pages of Virginia and Maryland. His father was a strong Union man during the late war between the States.

Our subject, when a youth, took a preparatory course at Rittenhouse Academy, Washington, District of Columbia, and finally graduated at Yale College in the class of 1872. In May, 1873, Mr. Milburn engaged in the real-estate business in Washington city, and lost all his investment, after which, in 1877, he passed a civil-service examination, ranking third in a line of 139 applicants. That was at one of the first civil-service examinations held, which was when Mr. Hayes was President and Mr. Carl Schurz Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Milburn was appointed Examiner of Pension Claims at Washington; but close confinement so impaired his health that he had to seek another climate and another vocation. Accordingly he went to New Mexico, as clerk to the Pueblo Indian agency. He had previously graduated in law, however, at the National University, at Washington city, and received his diploma at the hands of President Hayes, who was then chancellor ex-officio of the university. In this institution Mr. Milburn ranked second in a class of seventeen.

September 30, 1882, he resigned his position in New Mexico, having in the meantime been admitted to the bar at Santa Fe, in February, 1881. In November, 1882, he was appointed United States special Indian agent, and ordered to inspect agencies in Dakota, which he did, and came to Montana in February, 1883, and has been a resident of this State almost continuously ever since. As special Indian agent he had charge of constructing the buildings at the Crow Indian Agency, in 1884, by order of the Government. He opened his first law office and began the practice at Miles City, in January, 1886. Within the same year he was nominated on the Democratic ticket for County Attorney, and was elected over his Republican opponent, William H. Ross, and also over another candidate, a bolting Democrat. In 1888 he was defeated for re-election by Dr. W. A. Burleigh, Republican. The latter, however, eleven months afterward, was in turn defeated by Mr. Milburn, when he was first elected Judge of the district. He was re-elected as District Judge, in 1892, over the most prominent Republican lawyer in Custer county. But Judge Milburn declares that he will not be a candidate for re-election to succeed himself on the bench. He is a stanch Union man, and on national issues is a decided Democrat so long as the party remains patriotic

December 7, 1875, Mr. Milburn married Miss Eugenie Prentiss Bliss, the daughter of Dr. D. W. Bliss, who had principal charge of President Garfield while suffering from the fatal wound inflicted by the notorious Guiteau sort of public highway running over this saddle in the great rocky range of mountains to the buffalo lands.

This highway, dozens of trails side by side, worn so steep in many places, washed by rains and swept by winds, as to nearly hide horse and rider, reached from the heart of the mountains to the Dalles, Oregon, and was called, in the early '50s, the Cayuse trails, after the tribe of Indians who had their home at the head of tidewater and made annual excursions to the Yellowstone. When we first found the Idaho or Salmon-river mines, as I pointed out in a published letter in 1861, the Nez Perce war-chief was at that time beyond the Rocky mountains, hunting. So we see that this ground here was merely a place where the passers by battled or pillaged as they chose or could. It results that the pretty sentimental idea of defending the homes of their fathers falls away; for their fathers had never laid claim to it, and they never came until after the white man came. Under these conditions, never before revealed in all his history, we see him in his true light,—a bad man. The Indian women were not nearly so bloody and treacherous as the men.

All through the civil war what few trained Indian fighters we had in the army, from Ta-

Her father, now deceased, had a national fame as a surgeon. He was a prominent army surgeon during the war. Judge Milburn and wife have three sons and one daughter, viz.: Paul Willard, born October 15, 1876; Eugene, born October 2, 1882; Roszelle, March 9, 1892, and George, born January 8, 1894. The first two were born in Washington city.

The Judge is a member ond Past Grand of the I. O. O. F., and a member of the Knights of Pythias, and the uniform rank of the latter order.

DAVID N. UPTON, of Butte City, a Montana pioneer of 1862, has been engaged in mining ever since coming to the Territory.

He was born in the province of New Brunswick, May 16, 1836. The Uptons from whom he descends came to America from England about the time of the Revolution and settled in New Hampshire. The first ancestor of the family in America was grandfather Aaron Upton, whose son, John, was born in Vermont in 1785, married Elizabeth Nichols, a native of that state, and had a son and a daughter in Vermont. They removed to New Brunswick, where David N. and another child were born in the family. Their father died there in 1853, in the seventy-first year of his age, his wife surviving a number of years. In his religious views he was a Universalist, while she was an Episcopalian. They were worthy people and respected by all who knew them.

David N., their youngest child, was educated in New Brunswick, and when nineteen years old started out in the world for himself. In 1854 he sailed for California, by the way of the isthmus, arrived at San Francisco and proceeded to Nevada City, where he followed placer mining, with fair success. In March, 1862, he went to Florence, Idaho, which point was then one of the principal sources of the gold excitement, and on to Boise Basin, where he with four others located a claim and in 1863 cleared $60,000. Next he went to San Francisco, intending to return home, but was attacked with pleurisy and wintered there.

In the spring he went again to Idaho, and in July started on the stampede for British Columbia, in company with seven others with pack animals, and mined at Wild Horse creek until the following summer, making for himself about $2,000. Then he purchased a claim and lost his money in it.

In 1865 he returned to Montana, proceeding on to McClellan's Gulch in Deer Lodge county. Next he went to Blackfoot City, and on to Helena, arriving in October, 1865, where twelve including himself prepared an outfit for themselves and started Emigrant Gulch in the Yellowstone valley, and they prospected all through that country, returning in March to Confidente Gulch. Hearing of the discovery of gold at Elk creek they went there, secured a claim and made a little money, remaining there four months. Then twelve of them prepared themselves with an outfit and started across the Rocky mountains northward to the head waters of Sun river, prospected there and were attacked by large numbers of Pogan Indians, being thus forced back across the Rocky mountains.

Mr. Upton then went to Flathead lake, then to Missoula and came on to Butte, arriving in September, 1866, after traveling and prospecting over a vast portion of the great Northwest, on horseback, carrying the blankets in which he slept with him; and it is wonderful how regardless of danger the pioneer seeks for gold, what hardships he undergoes and fearful risks he undertakes. It is believed that if all the days spent in search for gold were paid for at a dollar a day it would amount to more money than all the gold that has been collected!

On arrival here Mr. Upton found a number of men engaged in placer mining. John Noyes had arrived in August, and they became partners, locating claims and engaged in placer mining until the railroads reached this locality. They then subdivided their land, 300 acres, into town lots, and the city of Butte below Gold street is situated on this land. They have sold a large portion of the property.

coma to Duluth, importuned for a chance at the front, and at the end of the war the very few survivors were loath to return.

Congress was dilatory and indifferent. Shall we say it was because, as a rule, the legislature of Montana had not a single member in its body that was in political harmony with the administration? It might seem unpatriotic to say so. It might, at the same time, be simply the cold, frozen truth.

The situation of Montana was as unique as it was desperate. Braddock had Virginia to fall back upon; St. Clair, at his defeat, had only to wait for reinforcements, but Montana had no place of retreat, no reinforcements could come to her in less than half a year of time and, even then, only through the heart of the enemy.

The Sioux trails lay to the east, the Blackfoot to the north, the Pierced Nose and the Pendant Ear to the west, the Bannack and the Sheep-eater on the other side; and Montana fought them all, first and last, and some of them nearly all the time. Yet Montana rarely invaded their countries; they came into the country which was found unpossessed and unclaimed, and there they remained as a rule, for

Mr. Upton began quartz-mining in 1874 and was one of the locaters of the "Lookout," afterward named Anaconda. On this claim they had an expensive lawsuit with Marcus Daly, as they knew that the property was valuable: it soon became worth eight or ten million dollars. It is now owned by a syndicate. Mr. Upton was also the discoverer of the "Smoke-house," and procured a patent upon it from the Government, which subsequently gave a patent upon it for a town site. This caused more litigation, and Mr. Upton sold his interest in it for $2,000. Since then it has yielded $150,000. He is now operating the Bozeman, a gold claim in Madison county. He and his partner have erected a number of houses in Butte, and they are counted among the early pioneers and builders of this city. The town was platted in 1866, when it consisted only of Main street, Broadway, Granite and Park streets. Two years afterward, however, the town began to go down. Many left, and the few that remained took the logs from the forsaken houses for fuel. In 1875 William L. Farlin discovered the Tuvonia, a quartz mine, and from that time the growth and prosperity of Butte was assured.

Mr. Upton is a gentleman thoroughly posted on all that pertains to mining and the mines in this part of the world, having devoted his whole life to the business.

He was married November 22, 1877, to Mrs. Dillie Allen, a native of Missouri and a daughter of Sloan Lewis. By Mr. Allen she had three children, viz.: Clara Gertrude, now Mrs. Steven Vanwort; Grace Mabell, who married Frank Tate; and Zella Myrtle, deceased. Mr. Upton's children are: Annie Laura, deceased; David Lewis, deceased; Eulala and Aline. In her religious sympathies Mrs. Upton is an Episcopalian. Mr. Upton is a Republican, and has been such ever since the party was first organized, but he has no taste for office. Mrs. Upton has been a member of the Episcopal Church about fourteen years. Her father was a soldier in the Mexican war, and her grandfather Lewis was in the war of 1812 and a participant in the battle of the Thames, where Tecumseh was killed.

H. C. Lovell, a prominent and wealthy farmer and stock-raiser in Yellowstone county, also in Sheridan county, Wyoming, was born in Kalamazoo county, Michigan, in December, 1840, a son of Enos and Eluthera Lovell, natives of Vermont. The father was a prominent farmer in Michigan.

Our subject came to the West to seek his fortune in 1859, having read much of Col. Fremont's adventures, and first went to Santa Fe, New Mexico, where he engaged in carrying the United States mail between that point and Independence, Missouri. He followed that occupation four years, during which time he was obliged to traverse a large area of country subject to Indian depredations, had many narrow escapes from the red-skins, and was three times wounded. Mr. Lovell afterward purchased a fine mule train, and became wagon-master in a transportation company. They conducted an immense business, and at times penetrated the Mexican domain to the city of Chihuahua. His train was captured by Indians in 1864; continued with the company for wages during the following two years, and then Mr. Lovell made his last trip in that capacity to Salt Lake City. After following Government contracting and other occupations until 1870, Mr. Lovell embarked in the cattle business. During the first year he owned an interest in 800 head, in the second year 1,300, and now owns 8,000 head; he has also 900 acres of land in Wyoming. His cattle roam the hills and valleys of that State and Montana. Mr. Lovell has had an extensive and thrilling experience in the mountains of the West, has had many talks with Kit Carson and other famous frontiersmen, is an entertaining and instructive conversationalist, and is a favorite with all who know him.

In 1884 our subject was united in marriage with Miss Bertha Collins, a native of St. Louis. They have one son, Willard T. The wife and mother died in California two and one-half years after the birth of her child. In political matters, Mr. Lovell affiliates with the Republican party.

there on the top of the mountains lay the mines.

But to proceed in the case. We have room for only two indictments, samples of hundreds, however. I. M. Bozeman, a friend and an able defender of the Indians from the first, till they stabbed him in the back while they ate his bread on the Yellowstone, early in 1867, is one. The details are too terrible to set down. Malcolm Clarke, (a gentle, good man, who began life a West Point cadet) murdered at his own house by the treachery of an Indian he had raised, while his son was shot badly and his wife saved from the brutal creatures only by the help of a squaw, is another example that has no two sides. Of course, a white man may be in the wrong often enough; and there is many an Indian massacre that admits of two varying stories. But Bozeman and the old pioneer, Clarke, were special friends of the Indians; they took sides with them when it was possible, always tried to settle trouble, trusted them entirely, and so were shot down for their faith in them.

General Meagher called for troops. There were none to spare from the posts. The story of the massacre—if the wiping out of eighty-one names so entirely that not one person

HON. WILLIAM MAYGER, one of the early pioneers o Lewis & Clarke county, was born at St. Louis, Missouri, November 24, 1842. His father, John Mayger came to America from London, England, in 1837. He was married in his native county to Miss Elizabeth Cheesman, also a native of London. They had two children born to them in that city: Elizabeth and Charles. With his little family Mr. Mayger came to St. Louis, Missouri, remaining there until his death, January 14, 1885, at the age of seventy-three years; his widow departed this life three years later. Their family consisted of one daughter and seven sons, all of whom are now living, with the exceptionof the eldest son, who died in infancy. William Mayger, the fifth child in order of birth, was reared and educated in St. Louis. In the spring of 1864 he came to Montana (then the Territory of Idaho), making his first mining venture on Silver creek, where he met with but varying success. During the same year Mr. Mayger discovered gold in paying quantities in the left-hand fork of Silver creek, and in company with J. W. Rhodes and Alvord Hintze he located the first placer ground in the gulch, organizing the district and naming the gulch in honor of the town of Ottawa, Illinois, the home of Mr Rhodes. In 1866 Mr. Mayger and associates put in a bed-rock flume, and continued to placer-mine until 1876, making as high as $30 a day, but the greater portion of the time with but indifferent success. He was the first to discover the float of the now famous Drumlummon mine; this was in the gulch below where the mine is located. He and his partners spent many days in trying to discover the vein, but unluckily for themselves they were doomed to disappointment. In the following spring Mr. Cruse, having worked out his placer ground in Trinity gulch, moved his camp convenient to where the lode was supposed to be, and upon the disappearance of the snow from the mountain side, he commenced a systematic search for the lode. The first hole sunk disclosed the foot side of the vein, he then commenced a shaft some ten feet higher up the mountain side, which disclosed the vein, and from which the discovery was made.

After the Drumlummon lode was located, Mr. Mayger and his partner, Mr. Nat Collins, located the ground to the southwest and immediately abutting the Drumlummon location, which they named the Ivanhoe lode, the discovery being made on a small vein near the southern end of the location. After representing this ground for two years, Mr. Collins abandoned his interest. It was at this time that Mr. Mayger, who was then at Butte, wrote to his brother Charles to relocate the ground. Being fully convinced that the Drumlummon lode was not properly staked, he instructed his brother to move the stakes of the Ivanhoe lode higher up the mountain,—100 feet on the north end and 300 feet on the south end. This Mr. Charles Mayger proceeded to do, but unfortunately did not calculate the steepness of the mountain and fell short in his measurement some forty feet on the north end, a circumstance that has caused the two brothers much litigation, from the fact that only a portion of the apex of the Drumlummon lode was cut by their north end line, consequently raising the question of divided apex, which could only be settled through almost interminable litigation. Mr. Charles Mayger named the claim the St. Louis lode, after the city of his birth. Its discovery shaft is on a vein that was first disclosed by Mr. Mayger when representing the Ivanhoe lode.

In 1877 Mr. Mayger sold his placer mining interests and engaged in quartz mining, first operating at Butte, Montana, where, in company with Mr. John C. Reynolds, he purchased the Centennial quartz mill. Mr. Mayger sold his interest in the enterprise the following fall. Returning to Marysville, he entered into a contract with Mr. Cruse for 2,000 tons of ore, to be delivered on the dump of the Drumlummon mine. For the purpose of milling this ore, Mr. Mayger commenced the erection of a five-stamp pan amalgamation mill; this mill was built upon mill site located on the creek just under the mine, and was the first silver amalgamation mill built in the county of Lewis & Clarke. The greater portion of the machinery for this mill was shipped from St. Louis, Missouri,—first by boat to Fort Benton, then by teams to its survived to say what had been done or how, may be called such,—at Fort Philip Kearney was sad reading for those in command elsewhere. Meagher then called for 600 volunteer cavalry. There was almost no money at his service, but the merchants, and, in truth, all men came forward with all sorts of needed supplies, and on the 7th of May the general, who had been placed in supreme command with a staff of able officers under him, took the field. What could they do? Contemplate the extent of frontier to defend, the scattered and defenseless towns and smaller settlements with roads through rocky passes! But they, such of them as could find horses on which to make their perilous marches, kept in the saddle till General Sherman, a good soldier and better civilian, who had learned much in California, came forward with two or three thousand stand of small arms, a heavy piece of artillery and a call for eight hundred Federal troops to serve till the end of the war, or, rather, till he could forward force enough from the regular army to settle it.

Meantime, General Meagher, while actively pushing forward preparations for a thorough chastisement of these murderers, was drowned destination. In 1880 Mr Mayger sold this mill to Mr. Cruse, who, after making several months' run, sold the property to the Montana Company, Limited. Mr. Mayger, after disposing of this mill, devoted several years to prospecting and the examination of mines, extending over a section of country from Colorado to Canada, British America, spending two years in the latter country on a copper property owned by a Canadian and English company.

In 1886 Mr. Mayger was united in marriage with Miss Fannie McLeod, of Boulder, Colorado, a native of Florida. They have two children: Helen Delorm and William Jr. Socially, Mr. Mayger is a member of the I. O. O. F. and also of the B. P. O. E. and one of the pioneer members of the Montana Club. A Democrat in his political views, he has served as Assessor of the Second District of Lewis & Clarke county, and was also a member of the constitutional convention that formed the laws for the State of Montana. In 1887 Mr. Mayger organized the St. Louis Mining & Milling Company, of Montana, St. Louis capitalis's being interested, and immediately commenced the extensive development of the St. Louis lode. He has been its manager from its first organization, and through frugal and economical management has from a small beginning succeeded in developing a mine second to few in the State.

HENRY S. CLARK, a resident of Butte City, has been identified with Montana for nearly three decades, the date of his arrival in Montana being in March, 1866.

Mr. Clark was born in Boonville, Lewis county, New York, October 5, 1832, and is of English descent, his maternal ancestry being traced back in a direct line to the Brewsters, who landed from the Mayflower at Plymouth Rock.

His father, Rev. Charles Clark, was a Baptist minister and was for many years a resident of Denmark, Lowville, Watertown, and Rome, New York, where Henry S. was reared and educated.

After completing an academic course in Lowville Academy Mr. Clark was engaged as bookkeeper and later as teller in the Rome Exchange Bank, and in the year 1853 was elected City Treasurer of Rome, New York, which office he held until the year 1855, when he left for the West, locating in Chicago, Illinois, where for three years he held a position as messenger for the United States Express Company.

In 1858 he removed to Des Moines, Iowa, and was manager of the Parker Express Company, and later was with the United States Express Company as agent in Kansas City, Missouri, until January 1, 1860, at which date he started for Pike's Peak, Colorado. Arriving there, he, with three others, located the now celebrated Manitou Springs, and town site of Colorado; City but there being no show then to make a dollar out of the springs they were abandoned, and Mr. Clark engaged in placer-mining at Frying-Pan Gulch and California Gulch for two seasons, then tried ranching (farming) twelve miles below Colorado City until the spring and summer of 1864, when he was cleaned out by the flood and grasshoppers, and was driven with his wife from their home by the Indians, barely escaping with their lives, while some of their neighbors were killed by the merciless savages. They arrived in Denver (by Government freight train from Fort Bent on the Arkansas river, in which settlers were invited to ride for safety) flat broke and somewhat discouraged; but in a few days he succeeded in getting work at a salary of $150 a month and board and room for wife and self, with plenty to eat and a comfortable, safe place to sleep. (They had been sleeping out in the willows from fear of Indians coming to the house at break of day to murder them, as they had others.)

From 1865 until 1866 he kept a grocery and commission store in Denver. In 1866, in company with others, he made the journey with mule teams from Denver to Montana, and upon his arrival here he settled at the mining camp of Greenwood, near the Mullan Tunnel, eighteen miles from Helena, Montana, where he opened a store and also kept the stage station and post office. Since 1878 he has been a resident of Butte City. For a number of years he has been interested in mining and at Fort Benton. I call these Indians murderers advisedly, for murderers they were. The citizen soldiers under General Thoroughman must have had this idea of them well fixed in their minds; for they hung what few they caught without any great ceremony or delay. Now, I know you may call it scant history of Montana's Indian wars when you find only the mention at any length of Bozeman and Clarke among all the murdered settlers; but when I tell you that these murders reach into the hundreds—aye, thousands, what will you demand,—a catalogue of dead that would swell into a volume? Here is what A. K. McClure, a friend of Lincoln and founder of the Philadelphia Times, wrote in 1867 from the seat of war in Montana, after numberless butcheries that year on the overland and in and about Montana:

"Bozeman City took its name from Colonel Bozeman, who opened the Reno or Power river route to Montana, and who was basely murdered by the Indians last spring. He welcomed the Indians into his camp, believing them to be friendly, as they professed, and while he was eating his dinner he was butchered. Mr. Coover, of Bozeman City, was with him, and escaped with a wound after Bozeman was killed."—New York Tribune.

milling silver ores, and is the owner of numerous mining claims. Nearly ever since he settled in Montana Mr. Clark has been connected with some public office.

In 1871 he was elected Clerk and Recorder of Deer Lodge county, and at the expiration of his term of office he was re-elected to the same position and again re-elected, serving in all seven years. From 1878 to 1882 he was engaged in mining and milling in Butte City, and in 1880 and 1881 was Deputy Assessor of Silver Bow county. In 1882 he was the choice of the people of Silver Bow county for Clerk and Recorder, and was re-elected in 1884, which office he filled four years. In every position to which he has been called he has endeavored to give satisfaction. At present he is Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue for the Third Division of Montana, comprising the counties of Silver Bow, Deer Lodge, Granite, Missoula and Ravalli.

Mr. Clark was married on the 31st of August, 1863, in Colorado, to Miss Laura Roberts, a native of Kentucky and a daughter of Samuel E. Roberts, one of the pioneers of Colorado, who at the time of their marriage was a rancher and stock-raiser. They have had ten children. The oldest died in infancy in Colorado; the second child, Will. Lee, was born June 7, 1865, in Denver, Colorado. In September, 1867, Mrs. Clark started with him to join her husband in Montana, Mr. Clark, as above stated, having come here the year before. She made the journey by stage from Denver, via Salt Lake. A part of the way she and her child were the only passengers, and this was just after the bloody raids made by the Indians and when travel by stage in that part of the country was very dangerous. On that journey, and indeed, during all her pioneer life in Montana, she has shown herself to be a woman of true heroism. The stage in which she traveled was fourteen days in making the trip to Greenwood, a distance of about 1,200 miles. Nearly all of the stage stock had been stampeded by the Indians and the stations burned, but the agents and stock tenders had found some of the wild bronchoes, and, hitching six to a coach, would start them off and let them run at full speed to the next station, making ten or twelve miles an hour. Little Will would "holler": "Let 'em run: I want to get to see my papa."

At that time Montana abounded in wild animals of all kinds, such as buffalo, moose, elk, antelope, deer, bear, mountain lions, etc. One night a grizzly bear killed and carried off a calf at the station and some nights later it came back seeking more prey. Mrs. Clark heard it and aroused a hired man who went out and shot it. It made its escape, however, howling as it went. The next morning they tracked it for some distance by the blood, but failed to find it, and it never after made them a visit. At another time, when the little son above referred to was four years old and when he was returning home from where the men were at work on the toll road, one found a mile above the station, he had a narrow escape from a mountain lion.

This son is now grown to manhood, and in 1886 had the honor of being elected Clerk of the District Court of Silver Bow county, in which office he is discharging his duties efficiently.

Eight children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Clark, as recorded in the order of their births: William Lee, Henry S., born July 17, 1868, died [illegible]; Arthur Roberts, born June 8, 1870, in Deer Lodge City; Clara, born November 14, 1874, in Deer Lodge City; Lewis, born May 19, 1876, in Deer Lodge City; Hudson, born April 25, 1880, in Butte City; and Agnes Isabel, born [illegible], 1884, in Butte City, February 1, 1884. Henry S. died July 13, 1882. Hudson died December 13, 1882. Clara died December 28, 1884. Laura died November 14, 1886. The surviving children Will L., Arthur B., Clara and Lewis are all at home and form an interesting family circle.

Mr. Clark is an active member of the A. O. U. W. and [illegible] I. O. O. F., and also a Knight Templar Mason.

Mrs. Clark is likewise prominent in fraternal secret or-

Let me quote once more from Lincoln's friend, Colonel McClure, who came out to Montana at this time from Philadelphia, with his heart full of Quaker kindness toward the Indians; but who, when he saw with his own eyes, changed his temper and wrote thus:

"Some things relating to what is called the Indian war, the public, East and West, cannot fail to understand. It is known to all that General Sherman has had ten thousand troops on the plains and upper Missouri since April last; that they are costing the Government probably $500,000 a week; that no battle has been fought with the hostile tribes; that no thoroughfare has been protected, and that, relying upon the proffered protection of the army, hundreds of emigrants and settlers have fallen victims to the scalping-knife. So much has passed into history, and must be familiar to all intelligent readers. How many lives have been thus wantonly sacrificed, the nation will never know. Most of them have fallen without survivors to tell the story of their sad fate. I notice that Governor Crawford, of Kansas, estimates the butcheries of settlers and emigrants during the past year at five thousand; and the calculation has been received in the East with general distrust. W., of Butte City, and has the honor of being elected (and serving for its first term) as Grand Chief of Honor of the Grand Lodge, Degree of Honor, Ancient Order of United Workmen, which was organized in Helena, December 14, 1892. She is Past Noble Grand of Mariam Lodge, No. 2, Order of Rebekah, I. O. O. F., in Butte City, and has had conferred on her the "Decoration of Chivalry" of Patriarchs Millitant, I. O. O. F. She is also a member of Ruth Chapter, Order of the Eastern Star, A. F. & A. M., in Butte City, and belongs to the Degree of Isis of Algeria Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, Oasis of Helena, Montana. Both Mr. and Mrs. Clark are well known in Montana.

FRANK KENNEDY, a member of the mercantile firm of King & Kennedy, Anaconda, Montana, is one of the enterprising business men in this section of the country. At their stand on Main street, this firm carries a full line of books, stationery, cigars, tobacco, the leading daily newspapers, and all kinds of notions.

Mr. Kennedy is thoroughly an American. He traces his ancestry in this country back to 1810. His father, Samuel H. Kennedy, was a prosperous western produce dealer and was located in New Orleans for many years prior to the war between the States. In New Orleans, in 1852, Frank Kennedy was born, the fourth child in his father's family, and in that city he began attending school. When forebodings of the Civil war were heard throughout the country, Mr. Kennedy sailed with his family to Europe, in order to avoid the threatened dangers. For six years he remained in the old country, and during this time Frank continued his studies and prepared himself for a business life. After the war closed the family returned to New Orleans, and there our subject and his father engaged extensively and very successfully in the western produce and cotton business. Mr. S. H. Kennedy was president of the State National Bank for many years.

It was in 1887 that Frank Kennedy came to Montana. He filled a clerical position with the Anaconda Smelting Company until he purchased Mr. Crockett's interest in the mercantile business, in which he has since been actively engaged.

Mr. Kennedy was married in 1889 to Miss Lotta Ellenbecker, a native of Michigan, and they have two children, Horton and Eleanor. Fraternally, he is a Master Mason and a member of Acacia Lodge, No. 33, F. & A. M., Anaconda.

E. H. LEE, a successful merchant of Billings, was born in Europe, in 1838, of English ancestry. At the time of his birth his parents resided in Kentucky, but were then visiting in Europe. The father afterward became a real-estate dealer of Philadelphia. In early life our subject had an earnest desire for sea, and for several years was engaged as assistant engineer, on the seas, during which time he visited all the principal seaport cities of the world. In 1863 he located in the United States, and became associated with the famous Custer regiment, United States Army. During the first campaign in 1873, he served as tent-maker, and in the succeeding campaigns as harness-maker. Mr. Lee served in the Black Hills campaign, where for nineteen days he struggled through a Dakota blizzard in going from Fargo to Bismarck, and was also in the massacre of 1876. In the fall of the latter year he completed his term of service at Fort Lincoln, was afterward engaged in merchandising at Bismarck, later at Miles City, and since 1881 has resided at Billings. His first store was devoted to dry goods, and he now carries also a complete line of notions, fruits, etc. Mr. Lee's fine store building, 100 x 25 feet, is located on Main street. He was married September 21, 1886, to Miss Laura Ward, a daughter of Benjamin J. Cemantha (Putnam) Ward, of Cleveland, Ohio. The mother was a lineal descendant of Israel Putnam. Her father was a physician in Cleveland, Ohio, and was a Republican in his political views. Mrs. Lee received a liberal education, is an intelligent lady, time in the West have good reason to know that the number given is not too large. I do not take up a paper published between the Plains and Oregon that does not record some fiendish savagery of the Indians; and there is hardly a cabin on the Platte or the Smoky Hill route that has not the memory of the slain interwoven with its history.

"The people of the far West have good reason to feel sorely aggrieved by the persistent and often malicious representations of their actions and purposes. They, as a rule, have to suffer exposure to the scalping knife, and are generally rewarded for their heroism and sacrifices by studied calumny." -A. K. McClure's Three Thousand Miles Through the Rocky Mountains.

Let it all the time be borne in mind that Montana is an empire in extent, an exposed border at every foot of her four sides,, and dotted with fastnesses where savages might hide in hordes for years all up and down and across her. Had Montana, with her five grand basins and her high-heaved basalt walls, figured in the Old World's history, she would have been cut up into five great kingdoms, each one greater than Greece, Egypt or ancient Italy.

and is certainly a helpmate to her husband. She was reared under Presbyterian influences, but since coming to Billings has been associated with the Congregational Church. Mr. Lee is a member of Ashlar Lodge, No. 29, A. F. & A. M., and of the I. O. O. F., of Billings. In political matters he supports the Democratic party.

PETER COX, one of Anaconda's respected Aldermen, dates his birth in Westmeath, county Mullingar, Ireland, November 26, 1850.

His parents, Peter and Sarah (Fallon) Cox, were also born on the Emerald Isle. In 1860 they emigrated with their family to America, landing in New York and making their home in that city for some time. Later they removed to Kingston, Ulster county, that State, where the father continued to reside up to the time of his death, which occurred in May, 1892, at the age of seventy-five years; and where the mother is still living, she having attained the age of sixty-four years. She is a devoted member of the Catholic Church, as also was her worthy husband. They had five children, of whom four are living, the subject of our sketch being the first born.

At the time the Cox family landed in America Peter was ten years old. He had attended school some in his native land, but his educational advantages were limited; for, soon after coming to this country, he began earning his own living by driving a horse and cart in a quarry, at $1.25 per day. Later he learned the trade of stone cutter, and worked at it until 1881, at which time he came to Melrose, Montana. The Utah & Northern Railroad at that time terminated there, and he worked for the company until the road reached Butte City. Then he accepted the position of receiving and shipping clerk for the company, and later was appointed their baggage master, a position which he held for a number of years, and afterward was in the employ of the Pacific Express Company. In 1889 he came to Anaconda to enter upon the duties of shipping clerk for the Anaconda Company. Later he became their timekeeper, serving as such until 1892, when he severed his connection with them. Next we find him occupied as one of the contractors and builders of the Butte, Anaconda & Pacific Railroad. He has built a portion of the road east of the town and also the road from the race track to the smelters, and is still going on with the construction of the line west of Anaconda.

Mr. Cox has purchased a very pleasant home in Anaconda, where he and his family reside. He was married in 1891 to Mrs. D. A. Gillette, widow of Walter R. Gillette and daughter of William Toole. She too is of Irish ancestry. Her birth occurred in the State of Maine, whence, when a child, she removed with her parents to Madison, Wisconsin, where she was reared. She has two sons,—William and Warren, by her first husband, and she and Mr. Cox have a daughter: Rose, born in Anaconda.

Politically, Mr. Cox is a stanch Democrat. In 1894 he was elected by his fellow citizens of the second ward to represent them in the City Council, in which capacity he is now serving most efficiently. Both he and his wife are members of the Catholic Church.

JOHN M. DELURY, City Treasurer of Anaconda, Montana, was born in Forest City, Sierra county, California, May 15, 1861. His parents, George and Elizabeth (O'Brien) Delury, both natives of Ireland, emigrated to America in 1851 and settled in New York. Later they removed to California, where the father engaged in mining and where they resided for twenty-one years. In 1876 they went to Nevada, and for ten years made their home in that State, returning in 1886 to California and locating in San Francisco, where they still reside, respected and esteemed by all who know them. Both are devout members of the Catholic Church. Of their eleven children ten are living, John M. being the third born.

John M. Delury received his early education in Grass Valley, California, and began life on his own account as clerk in a store. Later he was employed as cutter in a meat market, and still later as bookkeeper and followed plow many of them to the very top; but they have walls and bluffs and are ugly things, with Indians behind the rocks or pines on the upper side as you ride along the trails.

We know nothing about the blood that was wasted before the white man came; we can care but little. I here give one example of their ferocity in these pages, and that is enough. But we do know that all over the sand and the snow, Montana is dotted with red spots of our own blood.

I had planned to preserve the names of these dead heroes. Impossible. I find in the annals of Choteau county alone a list of ninety-eight persons murdered by the Indians,* to say nothing of the wounded, among whom I find the account of a woman who still lives, having been scalped and left for dead by the Sioux. From the bottom of a single page of a list of early settlers, given by the Historical Society of Montana, I clip this foot-note showing what became of some of them.

"1 killed by Crow Indians, on Big Horn river, 1863; 11 killed by Indians, on Yellowstone river, 1867; 1 killed by Indians on Salmon river, in March, 1863; 1 killed by Indians at mouth of Marias river, 1865; 11 killed by the road agents, in 1863; Buffalo Joe, killed by Indians, on Salmon river, 1865."

that business in California and Nevada. In 1884 he came to Anaconda, and was bookkeeper for Beelenburg & Company for a number of years, filling his different positions in life with integrity and ability and making friends with all with whom he came in contact. In 1889 he was elected City Treasurer of Anaconda, and such has been the ability and fidelity with which he has discharged the duties of his office that he has been re-elected and has held the office continuously since his first election and is now serving in his fifth year.

In his political affiliations, Mr. Delury is Democratic. He is a member of the A. O. U. W., and of the Young Men's Institute, and is identified with the Catholic Church.

CHARLES WHEELER HOFFMAN was born in Niles, Michigan, September 2, 1846. He remained there until he was seventeen years old, receiving a common-school education.

In 1863 he went to Fort Randall, on the Missouri river, and when the military post at Fort Buford was established, in 1866, he received the appointment as Post Sutler at that post, This was at that time the very heart of the Sioux country. Hostile Indians surrounded Fort Buford nearly all the time, and his life there was necessarily full of thrilling experiences and narrow escapes.

In the fall of 1868 he returned East and was married at Buffalo, New York, April 27, 1869, to Miss Elizabeth B. Penfield. Being appointed Sutler at Fort Ellis, Mon-

*I take the following list mainly from a single page of a single county in Leeson's History of Montana, which I believe to be entirely accurate for I know some of the facts and persons of my own knowledge. True, many of these murders occurred at a later date than that of which I now write, but observe that all this long list is from within a single county:

Little Tex, killed by Bloods, at the Blackfoot farm, Sun river, in April, 1866. Fitzgerald, by Bloods, at St. Peter's Mission, in 1866. Lagree and Hunicke, murdered by Blackfeet and Bloods at Three Tree Coulee, January 9, 1866. William Berry, killed by Bloods, on Elbow river, in 1874. Joe Munroe, killed by Bloods, on Old Man's river, in 1874. Miller, killed by Bloods, on Old Man's river, in 1872. McMullen, wounded by Assiniboines, near Bow river, in 1874. Two unknown men killed by Assiniboines, near Milk river, in 1874. The bodies were found tied to trees and filled with bullet holes. Ed. Grace, killed by Assiniboines, in 1873. A party of men, women and children, killed by Bloods, near Porcupine mountains, in 1865. A soldier, name unknown, killed by Piegans, on Marias hill, in 1873. Wei and Mitchell, killed by Piegans, on Badger creek, in 1875. Joe Day and Howard, killed by Piegans, near the Marias river, in 1875. John Rock, killed by Blackfeet, mouth of Sun river, in 1875. Jack Gorman and Frank Keisser, killed by Assiniboines, in 1875. Frank Robinson, killed by Gros Ventres, near Cow creek, in 1877. Joseph Spearson, killed by Bloods, on Belly river, in 1870. Nelse Kyse, George Huber and one man, name unknown, killed by Sioux, on Squaw creek, near the mouth of Musselshell river, in August, 1866. Andy Harris, killed by Assiniboines, on Milk river, in 1867. One soldier, killed by Piegans, at Camp Cook, in the spring of 1867. Bozell A. Bair, wounded by Piegans, on Eagle creek, in 1867. Paul Vermette, killed by Indians, on the Teton river, in 1866. Champion, killed by Arapahoes, at Fort Hawley, in 1867. Malcolm Clark, killed by Piegans, in 1869. Charles Carson, killed by Piegans, on Dearborn river, in 1866. Jake Leader, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Musselshell river, in 1869. McGregor, Taber, and two other men, names unknown, were killed, and one man wounded, by Sioux, near Fort Peck, in 1868. The murder of the builders of the town of Ophir, occurred in May, 1865. Six men killed by Bloods on Old Man's river, early in 1865. Ross and McKnight, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Mussel-

C. W. Hoffman

Of course these brave men were trained fighters, cautious and cool-headed; but no precautions could match the wild redmen, ever on the alert and born to kill and plunder.

Montana had more than five hundred gold-bearing gulches, scattered somewhat widely over and along the Rocky mountains. Her five great basins had at least five times five hundred plateaus and valleys and streams, where men were making homes, also scattered.

The following indictment which was drawn by the United States Marshal, W. F. Wheeler, speaks for itself and shows to what desperate resorts the people were driven. As this is drawn by an officer of the Government and signed by citizens under oath it must be accepted as a truthful statement of the condition of affairs at that date:

"The Grand Jury of the United States for the 3d Judicial District of Montana, have examined a number of witnesses, and from the evidence presented to them find that the people of this district have suffered within the last few months great loss of life and property from predatory bands of Indians. We have been furnished the names of nine or ten citizens who have been murdered in cold blood by them. Over 300 head of stock have been stolen within two months past and we believe that within six months fully 1,000 horses have been stolen, tana, he brought his wife West immediately after their marriage, and they have made their home at Bozeman ever since. Here Mr. Hoffman has been connected with many enterprises. He is now engaged in coal-mining, merchandising, farming, stock-raising and banking, being vice-president of the Bozeman National Bank.

He has served as Alderman of the city of Bozeman and County Commissioner of Gallatin county. He was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, joint member for Gallatin and Meagher counties of the Council of the Sixteenth Assembly, and when Montana became a State he was elected a member of the first State Senate, and re-elected to the Second Assembly, being now President pro tem. of the Senate.

Governor Leslie appointed him Quartermaster General on his staff, and he has ever since served in that capacity, being re-appointed by Governors White, Toole and Rickards.

GEORGE R. WELLS, M. D., United States Examining Surgeon, and County Physician for Park county, Montana, is a resident of Livingston. Of his life we present the following brief biography:

Dr. George R. Wells was born in Greenville, Kent county, Michigan, July 9, 1862, son of John E. and Mary E. (Smith) Wells, his ancestors being of English descent and having long been residents of the United States. Dr. William Wells, his grandfather, was a prominent physician and a relative of the Hon. Gideon Wells. In early life John E. Wells was engaged in mercantile pursuits, but later turned his attention to milling and at this writing is largely interested in flouring mills in Lake county, Michigan.

After a preparatory education in the Saginaw high school, George R. Wells began the study of medicine and took a regular course in the Rush Medical College, where he graduated February 16, 1886. Having completed his college course, he entered upon the practice of his pro-

McArdle and comrade, killed by Crows, near Benton, in 1869. Tom Russ, killed by Sioux, near Fort Peck, in 1873. Michael Thebault, killed by Piegans, on the Teton, in 1868. James Quail, killed by Piegans, near Silver creek, in 1869. One man, name unknown, killed by Piegans, on Sun river, in 1868. Clark, killed by Piegans, on Sun river, in 1868. Dauphant, killed by Sioux, near the mouth of Milk river, in 1865. Charley Desronin, killed by Indians, near the Bear Paw, in 1870. Little Frenchie, killed by Assiniboines, on Milk river, in 1869. One man, herder for Carroll and Steel, name unknown, killed by Indians, on Milk river, in 1869. Sam Rax, killed by Bloods, on Eagle creek, in 1869. Jim Watkins, wounded by Piegans, near Benton, in 1868. Old man Long, Foster and Jordan, killed by Sioux, near mouth of Pouchette. Seven unknown travelers, killed by Sioux, on the Missouri river, above Fort Peck, in 1868. Two men, names unknown, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Musselshell, in 1868. Four men, names unknown, killed by Sioux, at mouth of Musselshell, in 1873. George Horn, killed by Assiniboines, on Cow creek, in 1874. Bill Morrison and John Hughes, killed by River Crows, on Arrow creek, in 1877. Antelope Charley and Cook, killed by Piegans, at mouth of Eagle creek, in 1873. Little Rock, killed by Sioux, on Judith mountain, in 1874. Old man, name unknown, killed by Piegans, on Warm Spring creek, near the Judith river, in 1874. Buckshot and Poulett, killed by Assiniboines, at Rocky Spring, in 1871. Joseph Gipperich was killed by Bloods, on St Mary's river, in 1872.

and a number of valuable citizens sacrificed, whose names we could not learn. The Piegans, Bloods and Blackfeet, who all talk in the same language and constitute the Blackfeet nation, have moved their women and children north of Montana, and in that country have procured ammunition and improved arms. This is a declaration of war on the whites of Montana, and some measures should be taken to meet the emergency. The civil authorities have not the means and the people are not able to bear the expense of pursuing and punishing these robbers and murderers, who destroy our property and lives, and come and go like the wind. Ours is a contest between civilization and barbarism, and we must risk our lives and sacrifice our hard-earned property to defend them, unless the general Government gives us the means of defence. To this we are entitled, as we have left homes of comfort in the East to plant civilization in the wilderness. It is evidence that the 'Pend d'Oreilles,' who make periodical journeys from their homes to the valley of the Yellowstone, on hunting expeditions, through some of the settled portions of our Territory, are guilty of horse-stealing if not of murder. Their passage through our settled valleys should be prohibited by the authorities. The fession in his native State. About a year later he went to Gold Hill, Colorado, where he practiced until 1889, at that time going East and entering the New York Post-Graduate College for Physicians, from which institution he received a diploma March 18, 1890. The following May he came West again, this time locating in Livingston, Montana, where he has since continued to reside, and where, during this brief period, he has established a most enviable reputation as a physician of more than ordinary ability. Soon after coming here he was appointed United States Examining Surgeon.

Dr. Wells is a member of the Masonic fraternity, Reed City, Michigan, No. 363, A. F. & A. M.; Livingston Chapter, No. 7, R. A. M.; and St. Bernard Commandery, No. 6, K. T. He is also a member of the K. of M., and A. O. U. W., being Examining Surgeon for the latter organization. He is also Examining Surgeon for the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, for the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, the Pacific Mutual Life of San Francisco, and the National Life of Montpelier, Vermont. While Dr. Wells is not a politician, he takes a commendable interest in public affairs and is a supporter of the Republican party.

Dr. Wells has a brother, Cephas Wells, who is also a member of the medical profession, being a practicing physician at Chase, Michigan,—a graduate of the Louisville (Kentucky) Medical College.

September 22, 1886, the subject of our sketch was married to Edith Z. Marsh, daughter of Orlando and Francis (Quance) Marsh, her ancestors being among the early settlers of New York.

CRAIG CORNELL, a Montana pioneer of 1864, and one of the enterprising and successful farmers of the Beaver Head valley, is a native of the State of Indiana, born in Porter county, January 8, 1839.

Mr. Cornell is of Scotch descent, his great-grandfather Cornell having emigrated from that country to Long Island previous to the Revolution. Some members of the family participated in the struggle for independence. Mr. Cornell's father, Isaac Cornell, was born in Allegheny county, Pennsylvania, April 17, 1792. He was married in 1818 to Miss Priscilla Morgan, a native of Virginia, born in 1800. They moved to Ohio and settled in Wayne county, where they resided until 1835, at which time they removed to Indiana, where he cleared up several farms, being among the pioneers of that State also. He died in Indiana, January 22, 1874, in the eighty-first year of his age. His good wife had passed away November 25, 1859, in her fifty-ninth year. They were honest, upright and industrious, and were the parents of eleven children, of whom five are still living.

The subject of this sketch was their tenth child. He was reared on the farm in Indiana on which he was born, and remained at home until he was twenty-five years of age, his education being received in the district schools. In 1864 he crossed the plains to Montana, came with a mule team and was sixty days on the journey. He came direct to Bannack and worked at mining, receiving $6 a day. In 1865 he was engaged in prospecting at Helena and in other parts of the Territory, and in 1866 he located the ranch on the south side of Dillon where he now resides. Here he owns 1,000 acres of land and his wife is the owner of 115 acres. His chief farming products are wheat, oats, timothy, and alfalfa hay. He has also been largely interested in the stock business, raising horses, sheep and cattle, he being the pioneer dairyman of his section of the country. His cattle are Holstein and Shorthorn, his horses are Norman-Percheron, and his sheep Shropshire and Merino. His stock and premises are indicative of the intelligent and prosperous farmer.

Mr. Cornell had "bached" in Montana until November 16, 1871, when he was married in Indiana to Miss Eliza Keller. She was born in Ohio, June 30, 1845, daughter of John Keller, a native of Maryland; moved with her parents to Indiana, and there she and Mr. Cornell were River Crows murdered two white men near Fort Benton about the 20th July last and took their horses to their camp.

"In none of these cases of murder and theft have the Indians been pursued and punished. Our population is necessarily scattered along the valleys, or isolated in mining camps and gulches, and hence is exposed to sudden attacks from Indians. We make this statement, which is substantiated by truthful evidence, and respectfully request that it may be sent to such officers of the general Government as are entrusted with the care of the Indians, and our protection by military force, trusting that they take the steps necessary to give us full protection, or, if the means in their hands are not adequate, that they will represent our exposed and dangerous position to the heads of government at Washington, who have authority to punish or prevent Indian outrages.

"Signed: G. W. Tubbs, foreman; D. W. Buck, A. A. Green, James P. Mabbett, John H. Curtiss, Moses Morris, Benjamin Stickney, Jr., E. S. Mansfield, Wm. Simms, D. M. Gillette, E. L. Baker, Felix Poznainsky, L. Behm, W. F. Richardson, Hugh Glenn."

To sum up all this sad business briefly, no State, or group of States, shows half such sufschoolmates. They have four children, Isaac Rosco, Estella, Mary Viola, and Miron C. At this writing their son, Isaac R., is attending college.

Mr. Cornell has been a consistent Democrat all his life. He is a Master Mason and a citizen of the highest integrity. During his long residence in Montana he has made a most satisfactory record.

DANIEL DWYER, ex-Mayor of Anaconda, Montana, and one of the best-known contractors and builders in the State, is a native of the Emerald Isle. He was born in county Cork, Ireland, in 1850, is a son of John and Mary (Murphy) Dwyer, and passed his youth and early manhood in his native land. In May, 1873, he emigrated to America, and upon his arrival in the United States selected Houghton county, Michigan, for his location. There he was successfully engaged in contracting and building until 1878, when he came to Montana.

Mr. Dwyer's first location in Montana was at Butte, with the building of which town he was prominently identified. He there erected for himself the first two-story brick building in the town, and he also erected for other parties many substantial buildings. In 1883, when the town of Anaconda was laid out, he was among the first contractors on the scene, and has been engaged in contracting here ever since, building and extending the immense Anaconda Smelting Works. It was not, however, until two years after he began business here that he located permanently in Anaconda. In the fall of 1891 he erected his magnificent residence on Park avenue, No. 408. Besides this he owns a fine residence on the corner of Park avenue and Locust street, and the handsome brick block on Main street that is occupied by the Smith Drug Company. Ever since he located here he has not only been identified with the material growth and progress of the city, but he has also taken an active part in educational and other matters. In 1890 he was elected a member of the Board of Education, on which he served two years, and in May, 1892, he was elected Mayor of the town. After serving one term as Mayor, he declined a re-election. In partnership with a Mr. Cosgrove, and under the firm name of Dwyer & Cosgrove, he is now constructing large copper-smelting works at Salt Lake City.

Mr. Dwyer was married in 1881 to Miss Mary Driscoll, daughter of Jeremiah and Mary (Sullivan) Driscoll, residents of county Cork, Ireland. Mr. and Mrs. Dwyer have five children living—John, Robert Emmet, Dannie Eddie, Michael and Ann Christina. They lost one child, William George, at the age of fourteen months.

Mr. Dwyer and his wife are members of St. Paul Catholic Church, Anaconda.

JAMES B. HAWKINS, the present Sheriff of Custer county, and residing at Miles City, was elected on the ticket of the People's party, in 1892, and is a model Sheriff. He neither drinks intoxicants nor uses tobacco in any form; nor did he use a dollar in his campaign for office, while his opponents, both Democratic and Republican, spent money liberally, and called our subject the "ghost-dance" candidate! Yet he was elected, and his fidelity to his official duties proves the wisdom of the majority of voters in the county, as all now agree that he is the right man in the right place. He is both vigilant and wisely courageous, and withal a genial gentleman.

He had served as Deputy Sheriff under J. W. Johnson for two years,—1882–3—and Deputy Sheriff and jailor under Sheriff Irvine for three years,—from December, 1886, to November, 1889. In the fall of 1892 he was elected by a majority of fifty eight over the Republican candidate, and 113 over the Democratic.

Mr. Hawkins was born in Utica, New York, July 10, 1849, a son of Martin and Harriet (Ballou) Hawkins. His mother was a relative of President Garfield's mother, and her ancestry were early settlers in Connecticut, her remoter ancestry being French Huguenots. Mr. Hawkins' fering as this which Montana endured in these early years. Had not the men been trained fighters, every one, the place would have been blotted out, as a white man's land, on any one of many occasions.

President Grant came nearer to a wise and swift solution of the Indian question than any one before or since, when he proposed making wards of all wild Indians under the direct guardianship of army officers. But he was diverted at once from this high purpose by the absurd and untenable grounds taken by all the bad Indian agents and traders and like selfishly interested persons, to the effect that an army or federal officer could not at the same time hold a civil office. Of course this clause in our fundamental law was intended only to forbid the holding of a civil office with emoluments by an acting federal officer. An army officer can take care of an Indian, so far as any legal grounds to the contrary can rightly be raised, as well as he can take care of his horse or his child.

Grant knew, from his long service in Oregon and elsewhere, that an Indian cannot restrain his warlike, plundering habits any more than can a child refrain from taking hurtful sweets when too much tempted.

The Indian, best or worst, is a child. Let the man who really loves the Indian see to it that paternal ancestry were Irish. His father was for several years engaged in the livery business in Utica, and died when the son was seven years of age. After that event the mother moved with her children to McHenry county, Illinois, where they resided two years, and then moved to DeKalb county, same State, where James grew up on a farm, receiving a common-school education. There were four children in the family. Thomas B., the eldest, enlisted, before he was sixteen years old, in the Fifty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in Company G, and served under General Sherman until June, 1865. He was in the famous battle of Alatoona, Georgia, and in all the battles from Chattanooga to the surrender of Johnston, and was in the grand review at Washington, District of Columbia: he now resides in Texas. James B., our subject, is the next in order of birth. Sarah Ellen, the next, died in 1885; and William is the present jailor, under the authority of his brother.

In 1869 Mr. Hawkins started to explore the great West, intending first to join a friend, James Ashbaugh, then in the live-stock business near Bannack, Montana; but on reaching Omaha he turned to Atchison, Kansas, where he remained until the spring of 1870, when he went to Abilene, that State, and engaged with a cattle outfit, which was his beginning as a "cow-boy." That summer he spent in herding cattle, taking one herd to the Platte river. For two years he was engaged in driving cattle from Texas to Kansas, and one season he followed farming in Blanco county, Texas.

At Blanco City, May 25, 1874, he enlisted in Company D, of the frontier forces known as "Texas rangers," under Captain Rufus Perry. It was a State military organization, formed for the purpose of suppressing the outlaws who were so numerous and active at the time, and also for the purpose of guarding against the hostile invasion of Indians, who sometimes made raids into the State, stealing horses, etc. The company were mounted on their own horses, which were paid for by the State if lost in the service. The company went out with seventy-five men, with Mr. Hawkins as Sergeant, which position he filled during his term of service,—two and a half years; and he was in the saddle about half the time, scouting and sometimes skirmishing with the Indians. On one of these expeditions they encountered Indians, and in exchanging shots Mr. Hawkins was wounded in the knee by a shot from an Indian. While engaged as scout for the United States Government, the two Cheyenne Indian scouts with Mr. Hawkins were killed. This was in 1880 on the Rosebud, in Custer county, Montana. Many thrilling adventures he experienced, which gave lessons of value to him in his responsibilities as Sheriff. He was discharged from his duties in Texas November 6, 1876.

During the following winter he spent most of the time traveling in New Mexico. He reached Custer City, South Dakota, March 11, 1877, in company with "Doc" Long and Andrew Wilson, comrades from Texas. In May of that year they went to the Big Horn river, where there was a mining excitement. Not finding the field very promising, and meeting two old Montana prospectors near Deadwood, they were induced to come to Bozeman, in the Gallatin valley; but at the Little Horn river, on the way, they met a company of soldiers, the captain of which advised them to halt at the present site of Miles City, where he was confident that they could procure employment in the construction of Fort Keogh. They accordingly stopped there, but instead of engaging in fort-building they cut grass, which was then abundant in the valley, and they made hay, which they sold to the Government at $25 a ton, for use at the fort, and they cleared $1,200, thus netting $400 to each of the party in one month.

Soon thereafter Mr. Hawkins located a ranch on Graveyard Bottom, twenty miles above Miles City, on the south he is taken care of as a child; that he is restrained, guarded, kept from temptation to plunder. Looking at it, not from the point of protection to the white man at all, but entirely from the Indian's side, I say he must be kept from pulling destruction down on his own head. The white man, with the continual inundation from other places, will survive, and civilization, in the centuries to be, will not greatly miss the few hundreds or thousands that the Indian may yet massacre, if still left to do his will, as peace commissioners sentimentally insist; but where willbe the Indian? He can be perpetuated only by being protected,—protected from himself.

Soon after the sad death of General Meagher, at Fort Benton, and about the time when Montana, by the help of General Sherman, had got herself in a fair way to protect her people, Congress was induced, through the persuasions of those who knew little about the Indians and less about the situation, to turn the whole affair over to the Department of the Interior,—taking a war out of the hands of the army, volunteers and regulars, and turning it over to a peace commission!

The Indians seemed delighted and all was quiet for a few months. A great council was held at Fort Laramie. The heroic red man was reported, through the Eastern press, in terms to suit the East, by Eastern reporters. Peace commissioners won great renown to themselves at the hands of their attending and generous side of the Yellowstone river. The name of this place is derived from an Indian graveyard in the vicinity, and is now owned by W. S. Snell. On this ranch Mr. Hawkins began raising live stock, at the same time working for wages and hunting buffalo, then numerous; he turned every possible honest way to earn something. In the winter of 1880 he and a brother killed 1,146 buffalo, and while on the ranch about 3,500; also many deer and antelope. Much of the time he was also engaged in herding cattle, while acting as Deputy Sheriff and up to the time he was elected Sheriff in 1892. He has traversed Montana from the Wyoming line on the south to Milk river on the north, and from the eastern border of the State to Yellowstone county, both in wagon and on horseback.

He is a member of Custer Lodge, No. 13, I. O. O. F., Miles City, and has filled the chair of Vice Grand three terms. Politically he has always acted with the Democratic party until 1892; he is now for the "entire populace" without respect to party affiliations. Mrs. Hawkins is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

In 1888 Mr. Hawkins married Miss Nannie Watson, a daughter of William M. Watson, who was a machinist and served in the late war in a Connecticut battery. Mr. and Mrs. Hawkins have two children,—Maisie and William W.

JOHN HARVEY, Alderman for the Second ward of Livingston, Montana, is one of the representative citizens of this place, and was elected to his present position in the spring of 1892.

Mr. Harvey was born in Jo Daviess county, Illinois, in 1850, son of James and Letitia (Hosking) Harvey, his parents being of English descent. James Harvey was superintendent of one of the largest copper mines in the Lake Superior region, and while acting in that capacity, in 1856, was killed by a falling stone. The subject of our sketch was educated in the public schools of his native State, and at the early age of sixteen he resolved to seek his fortune in the great West, of which so much was at that time being said. He accordingly joined a caravan which finally (for mutual protection from Indian depredations) joined the Willson-Rich train, of which Charles Rich became commander, and proved himself a vigilant and safe leader. They had many encounters with the Indians. This was in 1866. Upon his arrival in Montana, young Harvey spent his first two years in Madison valley, Gallatin county, where he helped to build a log schoolhouse, and where during these two winters he worked for his board while attending school. This school was taught by Esquire Stephen Allen. He worked on a ranch for wages for a time, saving his money until he accumulated means sufficient to go into business for himself. Then he turned his attention to freighting and dealing in stock, carrying on the stock business on his own account and also having charge of a large amount of stock for other dealers. He frequently drove stock as far east as Bismarck, North Dakota. He now owns a half interest in a valuable ranch of 2,300 acres on Shields' river, Park county, where he located in 1879, in partnership with Thomas Tregloan. They are engaged in raising grain and hay, as well as having large stock interests, and they also have the largest meat market in Livingston.

Mr. Harvey was married in February, 1885, to Miss Jennie Cox, daughter of John and Eliza Cox. Mr. and Mrs. Harvey have an only child, Lester.

Fraternally he is a member of Garfield Lodge, No. 17, I. O. O. F., of Livingston, in which he has filled the Junior Warden's chair and also that of High Priest. Politically, he is a Republican, though not an active politician. Mrs. Harvey is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

reporters and established a great treaty. But a tardy, not to say imbecile, Congress was slow to confirm the contract, and the Indian, this time not without excuse, went forth once more on the war-path to try the mettle of the beautiful new tomahawk given him by the Peace Commission and to test the range of his repeating rifle.

I am not one of those who abuse all peace commissions indiscriminately. They surely did not seek to make money out of their opportunities; nor could they hope to make much lasting fame. Let it be conceded that, as a rule, the men who hold appointments as peace commissioners mean well in what they do; but they don't know what they do. Mostly, like poor General Canby, butchered by the Modocs when doing his best to help them, they are strangers, the strangest of strangers, trying to drive square pegs into the roughest and toughest of round knot-holes. They are generally benign and benevolent men, from far away, their sole knowledge of an Indian's childish, weak nature having been taken from Cooper's novels. And so, by presuming to deal with a very serious subject in the lightest way, they have done more harm to the Indian, to say nothing of the white man, than any body of men you can mention. Briefly

DAVID G. BROWNE, Collector of Customs for the district of Montana and Idaho, was born near Belfast, January 16, 1859. He attended the public schools until he was fourteen years old, and afterward, by self-instruction, became an expert bookkeeper and accountant. In 1876 he came to the United States, and proceeded at once to Utah Territory, where his uncle then resided. Here he entered the employ of Wells, Fargo & Company, becoming their agent at Kelton; this position he held about a year, gaining the first insight into the transportation business, in which he afterward became prominent and successful.

In 1878, he gave up his position to accept that of conductor of a mule train, freighting from Corinne, Utah, to Montana points. By the next spring he had saved money enough to be the owner of a twelve-mule team himself, and he engaged in freighting from river and railroad points to the business centers and mining camps of the Territory. Before the season closed he added another team to his outfit, and in the next year, 1890, was the owner and wagon boss of four twelve-mule teams, thoroughly equipped. From this time Mr. Browne made Fort Benton his headquarters, and as it is the port-of-entry of his customs district, it is still his home.

During the active transportation period, from 1879 to 1885, Mr. Browne held a front rank among the freighters of the Territory, and few, if any, were more successful in the financial way. In the spring of 1881, Mr. Browne took charge of the office of W. S. Wetzel & Company, general merchants, at Fort Benton, and had virtual charge of the firm's affairs. Besides attending to this immense business, and keeping his teams on the road, he managed, in 1882, to get a monopoly of the ferry business at Fort Benton, from which he made $15,000 as a side issue. In December, 1883, W. S. Wetzel & Company failed, and Mr. Browne was appointed assignee; the assets of the firm amounted to $250,000, and he succeeded in winding up its affairs in a satisfactory manner in a little more than a year.

In 1883, Mr. Browne engaged in Government contracting, securing that year, among others, the large hay contract at Fort Assiniboine. In 1885, he had the Government transportation contracts for Montana, Wyoming, and the State of Nebraska, carrying them through to the satisfaction of Uncle Sam, and everybody concerned. In 1886, he accepted a position in the Bank of Northern Montana, at Fort Benton, and on the organization of the Stockmen's National Bank, of that city, became a stockholder and director in it, and to him is largely due the success of that financial institution.

He is also interested in cattle herds, on the Marias range, and has large reale-state and mining interests throughout the State. Mr. Browne has always taken an interest in local and general politics, and for several years past has been the undisputed leader of his party, in Choteau county. He has served his city as Alderman, and his county as Commissioner, for a number of terms. He was a member of the State Constitutional Convention, and served on many of the most important committees of that body; and in 1891-2, served as a member of the State Board of the World's Fair managers, of which body he was treasurer. He has been chairman of the County Central Committee for six years, in his district, and has served as a member of the State Democratic Central Committee for a like period, and is always a conspicuous figure in the county, State and national conventions. When at the beginning of the present administration, Mr. Browne received the appointment of Collector of Customs, for Montana and Idaho, the Democracy of the State with one accord approved and applauded his selection.

Mr. Browne was married in 1883, to Miss Emma Wright, of Fort Benton, who died in 1891. He has two sons, seven and ten years of age.

ABNER G. ENGLAND, a Montana pioneer of 1864 and one of Missoula's most successful farmers, dates his birth in Lawrence county, Illinois, November 1, 1830. Of his life and ancestry a brief record is herewith presented.

and finally, this one example must serve to illustrate a volume. The gentle heart of General Canby at the lava beds cost Captain Jack his cunning head. And here, while recording the meddling of strangers with the profound questions of Montana, let us look at the list of governors sent to keep guard over the cradle of this encompassed young Territory. We smile with mingled pity and derision at the appointments by Roman emperors of their court friends to far-off provinces. Centuries from now the school-boy of Montana will read the long list of names of strangers sent to guard and govern this beleaguered heart of the world's heart and will turn to the map of Ohio to see what similarity there may have been between the two geographical divisions that so many governors were sent from the maple woods by the lakes to the grassy mountain tops of Montana. Indeed will he marvel, too, why it was that Montana had to wait till her wars were over before one of her own people, who knew her and how to defend her, could be appointed to govern her.

Governor Green Clay Smith invoked the Legislature in the session of 1869 to pass a militia law; but nothing was done in the way of discipline or equipment. Early in the next

Mr. England's grandfather, Thomas England, was born in Pennsylvania, and was descended from a family of early settlers of that State. He lived to be eighty-five years of age, and reared a family of thirteen children, six daughters and seven sons. His fifth child, Joel Wallace England, was born in Tennessee, in 1807. From Tennessee the family emigrated to Illinois, being among its pioneer settlers, and in that State Joel W. Engand was married to Miss Jane Seeds, a native of Illinois, her father having removed from Ireland to that State when it was on the frontier. After their marriage, they settled down on a farm, and continued to reside in Illinois for a number of years, after which they removed to Missouri, where he spent the rest of his life and where he died at the age of eighty-four years. He had been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for many years and was one of the most highly respected men in the community where he lived. His first wife died, leaving him with three sons and two daughters, of whom Abner G. was the oldest, and by a subsequent marriage Mr. England had one son and four daughters.

Abner G. England was seven years old at the time his mother died, and after her death the home was broken up and he went to live with a Mr. William Thompson, his youthful days being divided between farm work and attendance at the district school. Upon reaching maturity, he rented a farm on Ellison prairie, Lawrence county, Illinois, and at the end of one year he had by hard work and economy saved enough with which to furnish his share of an outfit with two others to come to California. This was in the spring of 1853. Their outfit consisted of five yoke of oxen and a wagon and provisions. Frank and Wiley Cruse had been his schoolmates and they were now to be his companions and partners in crossing the plains. They left St. Joseph, Missouri, on the 28th of April, as a part of a train composed of twenty-six men, made the long journey in safety, and landed at Placerville August 2, 1853. After Mr. England's arrival in California, he was for two years in the livery business at Marysville. Then he mined on the middle fork of the Yuba river, and engaged in a fluming enterprise in which he lost all he had made. From there he went to Nevada City, where he had a claim which he worked four months, during that time taking out $500 worth of gold more than his expenses. Next, he went to Alleghany, Sierra county, where he remained five years, having the usual luck of a miner—sometimes lucky, sometimes "broke." From Sierra county he went to the Territory of Nevada, from there to San Francisco, and from that city came in 1864 to the Missoula valley in Montana. He then rented a farm three miles from his present home. Although the crops were small that year prices were high and he cleared $4,000. He sold his wheat for $7.50 per bushel; oats, $2.50 a bushel; potatoes, six and a half to ten cents per pound; cabbage, five cents per pound; and onions, twenty-five cents per pound. The following year he took claim to 160 acres of Government land, moved on to this place in November, and ever since 1865 has resided here. He built a log cabin on his claim, and for eight years he lived the life of a bachelor.

March 11, 1873, Mr. England was happily married to Miss Mary Cousins, a native of Illinois and a daughter of Dr. E. G. Cousins, a physician of that State. They are the parents of two children, a son and a daughter. Their daughter, Ella N., is attending school at Missoula, while their son, Orville G., is in college at Deer Lodge.

While in Sacramento, in 1862, Mr. England offered his services to his country, but on account of a physical disability was rejected. This effort to join the Union army proved his loyalty to his country. While he has given little attention to political matters, his vote has always been cast with the Republican party.

Since coming to Montana, Mr. England's career has been that of the successful farmer and able financier. From time to time he has added to his original holdings until now he has 560 acres in one body, one of the choicest farms in Montana. In 1883 he erected his splendid and year the Governor ordered the establishment of two military divisions, and appointed a brigadier for each.

But there is too much red tape and entanglements of all sorts about Territorial or State troops, as a rule. The hard fighting is done mainly, at least according to the history of the extreme West, from one end to the other, by either the federal troops or minute men of the Bunker Hill kind,—men who leave the plow in the furrow. There was fighting by men of this sort far away from towns or any other center of assistance almost continually. Each little remote settlement of ranchers or stock-raisers stood on its own bottom; the men in each little settlement standing by each other as best they could. Many and many a small campaign, long or short, for a day or forty days, was organized, fought out, and dismissed from any mention and from all place save in the minds of its participants year after year in Montana, almost from the first, but we cannot enter into details. These little campaigns were much alike in conception and results. The settler was never the aggressor. He took his gun down from the rack above his fireplace only when he found his home in danger. Often one man set out alone to attempt the recovery of his stock, sending a commodious brick residence. While he has met with marked success in his farming operations, he has not confined his attention to his farm alone but has become interested in various enterprises that are of great value to the country. He was one of the organizers of the First National Bank of Missoula, has been one of its stockholders since its organization, and is now its vice-president. The bank corporation owns the beautiful National Bank building, which was built at a cost of $115,000, and the same corporation also owns the Missoula Hotel, one of the best hotels in the county, it having been erected at a cost of $65,000.

Mrs. England was a charter member of the First Presbyterian Church of Missoula, and is one of the few charter members who are still spared to worship here.

GEORGE M. MILES.—Among the prominent and leading business men of Miles City is George M. Miles, nephew of General Nelson A. Miles. He is one of the founders of the city, the leading dry-goods and hardware merchant and vice-president of the First National Bank.

He was born in Westminster, in 1854, a son of Daniel C. and Lucy Ann (Puffer) Miles. He graduated at Amherst College, Massachusetts, in the class of 1875, and came to Fort Keogh in 1876, where he was engaged in the quartermaster's department, the post then commanded by General Nelson A. Miles, for whom Miles City was named. He was in Government employ for eighteen months. In the fall of 1876 he invested in the sheep industry, having the first herd owned in Custer county. Since that time the industry has had an immense growth in the county and State. Mr. Miles herded his sheep during the winter on the ground now occupied by Miles City, which was then covered by large sage brush. For six years sheep were his principal live stock, and proved profitable. Later he turned his attention to cattle and horses,—draught horses, in considerable numbers, and large herds of cattle. In this business he was connected with two others, Hawes and Strevell. Their range is 100 miles from Miles City.

Mr. Miles was the first United States Commissioner in Custer county, as also the first Notary Public. He has also filled the offices of Justice of the Peace and member of the Board of County Commissioners. In religion he is a member of the Presbyterian Church, being an Elder and a Trustee of the same. He was one of the organizers of the church at Miles City, and organized and has taken an active part in building up the Sunday-school, of which he has been superintendent for fifteen years. He gives much of his time and money to the church, Sunday-school and charities. The dry-goods firm with which he is connected is known as the McIntire Mercantile Company, he being president. His hardware interests are in the partnership store at Miles City, owned by Miles, Strevell & Ulmer. This company has also a store at Ogden, Utah. Mr. Miles owns much valuable real estate in and adjoining the city, and good business property, which yield him a good rental revenue. He is a conservative, practical business man, and is also prominent in society. Politically, he is a stanch Republican.

He was married in 1880, to Miss Helen Strevell, daughter of Hon. Jason W. Strevell, of Miles City. He has one son, Jason D. Miles, now eleven years of age. Mrs. Miles died in 1887.

JOHN W. WINSLETT came to Montana in 1865, and consequently holds rank with the pioneers of the State. Of his life we make the following brief record:

John W. Winslett was born in Jasper county, Georgia, July 13, 1821. His ancestors were English people who settled in the South some years previous to the Revolution, and in that war his great grandfather was a participant. John Carson Winslett, the father of John W., was born in Jasper county, Georgia, March 4, 1799, and in his native State was married to Miss Susan Stewart. The subject of our sketch is their only child. In 1829 they removed to Alabama, where the father continued his occupation, that of planter, until 1843, at which time his death occurred.

boy down the creek to tell a neighbor to follow, and his wife up the creek to give warning and get help, and so they followed on in a string, with set teeth, breathless, alert, finger on trigger, firmness in every muscle. Scarce any one of the little settlements but lost some stock each year, and some of them lost their bravest and best men.

As an example of these sudden little wars in the West, I give here an account of the fight at Castle Crag, California. I give it not only as an illustration of what the settlers of California, Oregon and Montana had to encounter, but, as it is verified and in the archives of the nation, as a sort of certificate that I know something of this subject of which I choose not to write at great length, for, as will be seen, I served, while yet but a lad, with one of Montana's best defenders, General Crook, in his very first Indian wars, and so know my ground well:

"At what date Mountain Joe located Lower Soda Spring Branch, now known as Castle Crag Tavern, I am not certain. Col. Hastings was the first proprietor—1844. Hastings was the first man to open a permanent trail up the Sacramento river, and pass with a pack train and a band of Spanish cattle from California to Oregon by this route; though McCloud, a Hudson's Bay trapper, after whom the McCloud river was named, was here before him—1841.

In Alabama John W. Winslett was reared. He received only a limited education in private schools. He served six months in the Cherokee war, under Captain Jenkins, in the Barbour Rangers, soon after leaving school, and after this was employed as overseer on plantations, being thus occupied for several years in Alabama, Arkansas and Louisiana. At times he had as many as seventy-five slaves under his supervision. In 1849, when the gold fever spread over the country, he was one of its victims, and in 1850 made the journey by way of the Isthmus of Panama to the new El Dorado. He mined on the Yuba and American rivers, and was in California three years before he learned to find gold successfully; but finally succeeded, and made as high as $50 a day in the mines. During the fall and winter of 1851 he kept a hotel in Nevada City, and while he was thus occupied the whole town was swept away by fire, he not only losing everything he had but also being left about $2,500 in debt. He then mined again to get a fresh start, got straightened out and in business again, and again suffered loss by fire. Such was the experience of many of the early pioneers of California—up to-day and down to-morrow.

In 1858, when the Redwood Indians made war against the whites, Mr. Winslett volunteered and served six months, and while on duty received a shot in the groin, from the effects of which he was laid up a few months. The Indians were subdued and placed upon a reservation, but a year later they renewed their depredations and again were quelled by the soldiers. In the meantime much property belonging to the whites had been destroyed, Mr. Winslett being burned out and being a heavy loser. Mr. John K. Houk was at this time his partner, and they not only lost their property but also both were severely wounded. After their unfortunate experience in California, they went to Boise Basin, Idaho, and engaged in mining, and from there came to Stevensville, Montana, arriving here July 25, 1865. Here, in a little pole cabin, they opened a general supply store and began dealing with the Indians. They met with prosperity on every hand, and continued to do a successful business until 1875. For eighteen years Mr. Winslett and Mr. Houk had been partners, and during that time the warmest friendship existed between them. They were the pioneer merchants of Stevensville, and during their business career made a large acquaintance and won the respect and esteem of all with whom they had dealings. But Mr. Winslett's kindness of heart brought him into some financial embarrassment. He had gone security for a friend, and thereby lost $7,000.

After meeting with the above loss, Mr. Winslett disposed of his interest in the store and turned his attention to the sheep industry, in which he met with success, having as high as 3,500 sheep at one time. While he was absent in California to buy sheep, his property, amounting to about $15,000, was sold for a security debt, at a great sacrifice, which might have been avoided had he not been traveling so steadily that letters could not reach him. Advantage was taken of this very circumstance. In 1889 there came a drought and a plague of grasshoppers, and again he suffered heavy losses. Then he located 160 acres of land, five miles northeast of Stevensville, and upon it he resided for some time. Later he purchased 160 acres four miles above this tract. Both of these places he still owns, his principal products from them being wheat, oats and hay.

Mr. Winslett was married in 1861 to Mrs. Louisa Cunningham, a daughter of Mr. Fogle. As they never had any children of their own, they adopted a little girl, whom they named Mary E. Winslett. She was born in California, and was two years old at the time they adopted her. After a few years Mrs. Winslett died. Mr. Winslett and his daughter have since resided together, the latter being one of Stevensville's stylish dressmakers and the owner of considerable real estate. She also has a number of horses on the ranch.

"Hastings was so charmed with Soda Springs, and so delighted with the waters, that he built a small fort or barracks on the north side of the little valley opposite the springs, and Mountain Joe said, applied for a grant, which was to include Mount Shasta, then known as Chaute Butte. I have heard this old barracks spoken of as Fremont's Fort. Fremont was not here at all in the early days. He lost nearly half his force in a night battle with the Klamath and Modoc Indians east of here, on the other side of Mount Shasta, in 1846, and but for Kit Carson would have been annihilated.

"In his reports to the government, published in the first volume of his memoirs, which he sent me shortly before his death, there is no mention of this place, and all know that he was very elaborate and exact. The scene of his operations lay entirely to the east and southeast side of the great snow pyramid, and was full of battles. He concludes his report to congress of the fatal night attack in these words: 'I have since fought these Indian nations from one end of their possessions to the other.'

"He complains bitterly of the British traders for furnishing the Klamath Indians with steel points for arrows, saying, 'Kit Carson pronounces them the most beautifully warlike arrows ever made.'

"True, Fremont and Kit Carson did their hard fighting not far away from what is now Castle Crag Tavern, and you could reach their battle-grounds easily any day now; but you must bear in mind that in those days there were no roads, and men had to keep compactly together and out of dangerous passes or perish. Besides, I have heard Mountain Joe, who served under Fremont through the Mexican war, and

In his early life Mr. Winslett was a Whig, but later became identified with the Democratic party. While in California he served as Deputy Sheriff four years under John P. Jones, now Senator from Nevada, and also for some time was a Justice of the Peace. He was made a Mason in Missoula, Montana, in 1867, and for the past eighteen years has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

L. G. SMITH, of the Smith Drug Company, Anaconda Montana, is one of the representative business men of his town.

Mr. Smith was born in Monmouth, Illinois, September 21, 1852, son of William F. and Margaret (Bell) Smith, both natives of the State of Virginia. Grandfather Barnett Smith removed from Virginia to Barren county, Kentucky, at an early day, and was well known there as a wealthy planter and slave-owner. Our subject's father was one of the clerks of the court of Louisville. In 1835 he removed to Monmouth, Illinois, where he was in the drug business for many years, and where he died in 1894, at the age of seventy-eight years. His widow is still living. They had nine children, of whom six are living, L. G. being their fifth child.

L. G. Smith received his early education in the public schools of Monmouth, and it may be said was reared in the drug business, as he was in his father's store during the most of his boyhood days. In 1876 he went to the coal mines, at Carbon, Wyoming, and from head clerk worked his way up to superintendent, in which position he continued until 1890, when he came to Montana and purchased his present drug business and organized the Smith Drug Company, of which he is the head. His wife and Mr. R. T. Williams are stockholders in the company. The store, No. 118 Main street, is one of the best locations in the city, and from the commencement of his business in Anaconda Mr. Smith has met with marked success, now being ranked with the leading druggists of the place. During his residence in Anaconda, Mr. Smith has shown himself to be a most liberal and enterprising business man, and has made a wide and favorable acquaintance throughout the county. He has invested in property here, and is deeply interested in the development of the place.

Mr. Smith is a chapter Mason and a Knight of Pythias, and in politics is a Republican.

He was married June 10, 1875, to Miss Lizzie Williams, a native of Ohio and a daughter of Dr. Isaac C. Williams, of that State. They have a delightful home in Anaconda, and are highly esteemed by all who know them.

W. A. CLARK, Butte City, Montana.—Western pluck, enterprise and intelligence are rightly accounted for on the theory that it was the strongest of mind and heart, as well as body, that pushed out from the older communities to the western frontier, especially into the wilds of the Rocky Mountain region in the early '60s, some 2,000 miles beyond the border line of civilization. The weak, the timid, the vacillating were not apt to undertake the role of pathfinders, under the circumstances and conditions which brought the pioneers to Bannack, Virginia City and Last Chance Gulch. It was another race of men that came at that period to lay the foundation of this young commonwealth, fitting exactly the poet's ideal of those who "constitute a State," and who have given to Montana a pioneer history and achievements in commerce and enterprise and government, alike honorable and glorious. Among the pioneers of this stamp, none have achieved greater success or distinction than the Hon. W. A. Clark, of Butte City, Montana. The material benefits which the State has derived from his energy, enterprise and ability, cannot be better presented or illustrated than by the recital of the story of his busy and eventful career.

W. A. Clark was born on the 8th day of January, 1839, near Connellsville, Fayette county, Pennsylvania. He is the son of John and Mary (Andrews) Clark, both natives of that county. The father of John Clark, whose name was also much with him on the plains, say that it was Hastings, not Fremont, who built the old pine-log barracks in the little valley across from Soda Springs, at the base of the hill.

"Whether it was the winter snows, the solitude or the savages that drove out the first proprietor of Soda Springs, no one can say; but it was doubtless the latter. Down on the south side of Castle Creek stands, or stood a few years ago, a white-oak tree with this bit of history cut in shapely letters on its widening bark, 'Killed with Hastings, 1844.' A mile or so further down the old pack-trail is, or was, another oak, telling, with its lone cross, where a whole party with its laden pack-train perished at the hands of the red men.

"It is equitable to set Mountain Joe down as the first earnest and permanent proprietor of all this region round about here, for he tilled the soil, built some houses, and kept a sort of hotel, and guided people to the top of Mount Shasta, to say nothing of his ugly battles with the Indians for his home.

"I first saw this strange man at his own campfire when a school-lad at home in Oregon, where he had camped near our place with his pack-train. He told us he was in the habit of going to Mexico for half-wild horses, driving them up to Oregon, and then packing them back to California, by which time they were tamed and ready for sale. He told my brother and me most wondrous tales about his Soda Spring, Mount Shasta, the Lost Cabin, and a secret mine of gold. He talked to us of Fremont till the night was far spent, and father, the schoolteacher, had to come out after us. But what won my heart entirely was the ease with which he reached his left hand, and taking 'De was also John, was a native of county Tyrone, Ireland, who emigrated to this country and settled in Pennsylvania soon after the Revolutionary war. The grandfather of the subject of our sketch was married to Miss Reed, of Chester county, Pennsylvania, whose parents also were from the north of Ireland. On the maternal side, William and Sarah Andrews, the grandparents of our subject, were also from county Tyrone, Ireland, and settled in western Pennsylvania about the beginning of this century. Sarah Andrews' maiden name was Kithcart. She was a descendant of the Cathcart family who were originally Huguenots, and the name became changed to Kithcart by an error made by a registrar in the transfer of a tract of land. The Cathcart family emigrated from France to Scotland at an early period, and later moved to the north of Ireland. Subsequently they emigrated to the United States, and different branches of the family settled in New York and Pennsylvania.

The parents of our subject were married in Pennsylvania, where they resided until 1856. They then moved to Van Buren county, Iowa, where John Clark died in 1873, aged seventy-six years. In religious belief he was a Presbyterian, and an Elder in that church for forty years before his death. Mrs. Clark now lives at Los Angeles, California, and is nearly eighty-one years of age.

Mr. Clark's father was a farmer, and his boyhood days were spent on the homestead, where he enjoyed the advantages of three months' winter school, and nine months of such farm work as the boy could turn his hand to. At the age of fourteen he entered Laurel Hill Academy, and acquired a good English education. In 1856 his father moved to Iowa, and there William assisted the first year in improving and tilling the new prairie farm, teaching a term of school the succeeding winter. He then attended an academy at Birmingham one term, and afterward entered the university at Mount Pleasant, becoming a disciple of Blackstone. Here he prosecuted his legal studies for two years, but did not afterward engage in the profession, so that the broad and masterful career of a man of affairs in the Western world was not cut short by his installment in a lawyer's office. Young Clark now started toward the setting sun. In 1859-60 he was teaching school in Missouri. In 1862 he crossed the great plains, driving a team to the South Park, Colorado, and that winter worked in the quartz mines in Central City, gaining knowledge and experience that afterward served him a good purpose, and perhaps in no small degree helped to shape his destiny as the future quartz king of Montana.

In 1863 the news of the gold discoveries at Bannack reached Colorado, and Mr. Clark was among the first to start for this new El Dorado. After sixty-five days' travel with an ox team, he arrived at Bannack, just in time to join a stampede to Horse Prairie. Here he secured a claim which he worked during this and the following season, cleaning up a net $1,500 the first summer, which formed the basis of his future operations in Montana and the beginning of the immense fortune he has since accumulated. In the ensuing five years we may pass rapidly over Mr. Clark's career, although it was one of push and enterprise, characteristic of the man. Instead of working in the placers, he took advantage of the opportunities offered for trade and business, and in less than half a decade was at the head of one of the largest wholesale mercantile establishments in the Territory, built up from the smallest of beginnings. His first venture was to bring in a load of provisions from Salt Lake City, in the winter of 1863-4, which he at once sold at amazing prices. The next winter this experiment was repeated on a larger scale, and Virginia City was his market. In the spring of 1865 he opened a general merchandise store at Blackfoot City, then a new and hustling mining camp. In the fall of the same year he sold his store, and noticing that tobacco was a scarce article in the mining camps, went on horseback to Boise City, Idaho, where he Bello Gallico' from my father, divided 'Gaul in three parts' in the ashes of the campfire as he read and translated the mighty Roman by the roaring Oregon. He was a learned foreigner, of noble birth, it was said,—certainly of noble nature. I could not forget Mountain Joe and his red men, and his Mexicans and mules and horses; and so, in the fall of 1854, I ran away from school and joined him. * * *

"I cannot say certainly as to his hidden treasures, though he always seemed to have pots of gold to draw on in those days; but I can frankly confess that I have drawn on him and his marvelous stories, making them my own, of course, for all these years,—a veritable mine, indeed, to me.

"I found him fortressed in the old Hastings barracks, before mentioned, though the place had been nearly destroyed by fire in his absence. We guided a few parties here and there, taking the first party to the top of the mountain that ever reached that point with ladies, I believe, and then returned to Yreka for the winter, going back to Lower Soda over the spring snowbanks with a tremendous rush of miners that Mountain Joe had worked up by his stories of the Lost Cabin and mysterious gold mines.

"Thousands on thousands of men! The little valley of Soda creek back of Castle Crag Tavern was a white sea of tents. Every bar on the Sacramento was the scene of excitement. The world was literally turned upside down. The rivers ran dark and sullen with sand and slime. The fishes turned on their sides and died. But the enraged miners found nothing. Mountain Joe disappeared. Men talked of hanging 'Mountain Joe's boy.' The game disappeared before the avalanche of angry and hungry men. The Indians had vanished at their first approach, and were starving in the mountains.

purchased several thousand pounds of "the weed," and at a cost of $1.50 a pound. Securing a team he drove to Helena with his precious cargo, closing it out at five and six dollars a pound to ready purchasers. In February, 1866, Mr. Clark joined a stampede to Elk Creek, where he established another store, and sold goods to the miners during the season. He sold out in the fall, and took a trip to the Pacific coast, going as far as San Francisco, and making a goodly portion of the journey on horseback. He then returned to Montana with a stock of goods, which he had selected to meet the wants of the miners, and which he readily disposed of at large profits.

In October of 1866 Mr. Clark went East by way of Fort Benton and the "Mackinaw Route," being thirty-five days making the voyage from Fort Benton to Sioux City. After visiting the principal cities of the Union, including a sojourn in the South, he returned to Montana the following year. We next hear of him as a mail contractor on the star route between Missoula and Walla Walla, a distance of 400 miles, where his energy and rustling qualities had ample scope to display themselves, but he made a success of mail carrying and staging, as he did of every other undertaking. His next move was in the direction of a wider sphere of business action.

In the autumn of 1868 he made a trip to New York city, and there formed a co-partnership with Mr. R. W. Donnell for the purpose of engaging in the wholesale mercantile and banking business in this Territory, a connection that resulted in one of the strongest business firms in that period in Montana. They shipped in a large stock of general merchandise via the Missouri river, in the spring of 1869, and established an extensive wholesale business at Helena. In 1870 the business was transferred to Deer Lodge, and consolidated with that of Mr. Donnell in the west side city. At this time Mr. S. E. Larabie was admitted into the business, and the firm of Donnell, Clark & Larabie entered upon a successful career. They soon closed out their mercantile business and gave exclusive attention to banking, first at Deer Lodge, and at a later date at both that place and at Butte City. In May, 1884, Messrs. Clark and Larabie purchased the interests of Mr. Donnell in their Montana business, and subsequently Mr. Clark and his brother, James Ross Clark, came into full ownership of the Butte Bank, disposing of his Deer Lodge interests. The banking house of W. A. Clark & Brother, of Butte City, Montana, has since that time grown into one of the strongest banking institutions of the West.

But it is in his mining investments and in the operation of vast mills and smelters for the treatment of base ores that Mr. Clark has made the great success of his life, and contributed so largely to the development and prosperity of the Treasure State. No other individual has played so conspicuous a part in this direction. In 1872 Mr. Clark first began to give attention to the quartz prospects of Butte, purchasing in this year, in whole or in part, the Original, Colusa, Mountain Chief, Gambetta, and others, nearly all of which proved afterward to be fabulously rich. In order to fit himself for a successful mining career, Mr. Clark spent the winter in 1872–3 at the School of Mines, Columbia College, taking a course in practical assaying and analysis, with a general outline of mineralogy, gaining a knowledge that afterward served him an excellent part in his extensive mining, milling and smelting operations. The first stamp mill of Butte, the "Old Dexter," was finished in 1876, by the financial help of Mr. Clark. The first smelter of consequence in Butte was erected by a company organized by him. This was the Colorado and Montana Company, which still continues as one of the leading enterprises of the Copper City. Mr. Clark is one of the principal stockholders and is vice-president of the company. In 1880 he organized the Moulton Company, which at once pro-

"The tide went out as it came in—suddenly, savagely. Deeds of cruelty to Mexicans and half-tamed Indians who tried to be friendly and take fish in the muddied waters were not rare, and the disgusted miners retired from the country, either up or down the river, leaving trails of dead animals, camp debris and cast-iron oaths behind. As they went Joe came, and the Indians came, furious! We treated them well, tried to make friends of them once more, but they would have none of it.

"By the end of June, 1855, the last miner had left our section; and soon the last Indian left us to go on the warpath. Mountain Joe and I were now utterly alone, with not even a Mexican to take care of the pack-train and do the cooking. But we kept on. We had quite a garden, but it was needing water; so Joe and I took our guns each day, leaving the store or trading-post to take care of itself, and went up the creek to work on a ditch.

"Meantime, ugly stories were afloat; and ugly, sullen Indians came by now and then—Modocs on their way across to the Trinity Indians, by the pass up Little Castle creek. They would not sit down, nor eat, nor talk. They shook their heads when we talked, and assumed to not know either the Shasta or Chinook dialect. The Trinity Indians were in open revolt beyond Castle Crags, and Captain Crook, from Fort Jones, near Yreka, the famous General Crook, was in the field there. He drove them up Trinity river to Castle Crags, but had no decisive battle.

"One hot morning, while we were at work on the ditch, Joe suddenly dropped his pick and caught up his gun. A horse went plunging up the valley past us with an arrow quiver-ceeded to the erection of the Moulton mill and the development of the mine. The company built a complete dry-crushing and chloridizing forty-stamp mill, sank a three-compartment shaft 800 feet, put in a modern pumping and hoisting works, and thoroughly explored the property, at a cost of about $500,000. This mine has been in successful operation since. Even through the period of financial depression, when nearly every other silver mine in the West closed down, the stamps of the Moulton never ceased to drop. W. A. Clark is president of the Moulton, and his brother, Joseph K. Clark, manager. Mr. Clark and his brother, James R., own the Butte Reduction Works and the Colusa Parrot, and several other copper and silver mines in connection therewith. Besides his interests in these companies, he has large individual holdings in the mines of Butte, many of which are in successful operation, affording employment to large numbers of men. He also owns valuable mining properties in Idaho and Arizona. The United Verde Copper Company's property in Arizona, owned by him, is just now the first wonder of the mining world. It is probably the richest and most extensive copper mine in the world, not excepting the Anaconda, Mountain View, or any of the big properties of Butte. Mr. Clark has just completed and equipped a railroad to this mine, connecting with the Santa Fe system, which is a marvel of engineering, and for its length (twenty-six miles) one of the most expensive in the West. He has built immense modern smelting and refining plants at this mine, and in the future his output of copper will only be limited by the demands of the world's markets.

Mr. Clark established the first water system in Butte, also the first electric-light plant. He is the owner of the Butte Miner, one of the leading daily papers of the State. He also is principal owner and president of the Cable and Electric Railways of Butte, and largely interested in many other industrial enterprises besides the mining and smelting of ores.

No man gives closer personal attention to his extensive business affairs than does Mr. Clark, and consequently he is one of the busiest men imaginable; still he has always found time to respond to any call of public duty, either from his State or his party, and the services rendered have invariably been of the highest order. Whatever he does he does well. Taking a deep interest in public and political affairs, he has prepared himself by study and observation to fulfil the highest functions of citizenship. Governor Potts appointed him State Orator, to represent Montana at the Centennial Exhibition in 1876, and his oration on that occasion was a brilliant effort and did a good part in making known the wonderful resources of this Territory. In 1877 he was elected Grand Master of the Masonic Lodge of Montana, and in 1878, during the Nez Perce invasion, received the commission of Major and led the Butte Battalion to the front against Chief Joseph. He was elected a delegate from Silver Bow county to the first constitutional convention in 1884, being chosen president of that body, in which position he won new laurels as a presiding officer and master of parliamentary law and tactics. In 1884 he was commissioned by President Arthur as one of the commissioners to the World's Industrial and Cotton Exhibition at New Orleans, where he spent several months in the interests of Montana.

In 1888 Mr. Clark received the Democratic nomination for delegate to Congress, and made a brilliant canvass of the Territory, but was defeated by reason of treachery within the party camp. When Montana was admitted to the Union, in 1889, and a second constitutional convention was necessary, he was again elected a member of that body, and as before was chosen its presiding officer, rendering splendid service in that capacity. Upon the first Legislative Assembly, which convened in Helena in January, 1890, devolved the duty of electing two United States Senators. The political muddle growing out of the Precinct No. 34 troubles, fully discussed elsewhere, resulted in the organization of two Houses of Representatives and ing in his shoulder; and smoke began to curl above the pines from the burning trading-post. We hastened down, but did not see a single Indian, nor did we see another horse or mule. All had silently disappeared in the half hour we had held our faces to the earth in the ditch.

"Blotches of flour from torn sacks here and there made a white trail up over the red foothills on the brown, sweet-smelling pine-quills, and, without a word, Joe led cautiously on, I at his heels. The savages divided soon, the party with the horses going to the right, toward the Modoc country, the party with the stores leaving a trail of flour, to the left, toward Castle Crags. This latter Joe followed, crossing the river at a ford, and going up the left bank of little Castle creek. The canyon shuts in very close after a time. In a narrow pass the spilt flour was suspiciously plentiful, and Joe led across the spurs of the mountain toward what is now Sisson. It was called Strawberry Valley then, and was kept by two brothers by the name of Gordon. We were desperately worn and hungry, and they treated us well.

"As said before, there were and had for some time been rumors of coming trouble. Joe and I turned back from Sisson to give the alarm and get help along the river. Portuguese Flat, which it took us two days to reach through the mountains, as we dared not take the trail, was the nearest post. Dog Creek, the ghost of which may be dimly seen in Delta now, was then a prosperous camp and full of men. Judge Gibson, then the only magistrate in the the election of two sets of United States Senators. The Democrats elected W. A. Clark and Martin Maginnis, and the Republicans W. F. Sanders and T. C. Power, Mr. Clark receiving the unanimous vote of his party in caucus and in joint session. Each presented their claims to the United States Senate, and as the Republicans were in a majority in that body, the issue did not remain long in doubt. Messrs. Sanders and Power were declared elected, whether rightly or not is hardly a subject for discussion at this time. But Mr. Clark received from his party in the State the highest honor in its gift, and is as proud of it as if he enjoyed the full fruition of what he regards a just and legal election.

Again a Senator was to be elected to succeed Colonel Sanders, by the Legislature that convened in Helena in January, 1893. In this body the Populists, with three members, held the balance of power. Mr. Clark again received the Democratic caucus nomination, but a small contingent of Democrats, under the avowed leadership of Mr. Marcus Daly, refused to go into caucus or to abide by the decision of the majority. As a consequence the contest was protracted through the entire session of sixty days, and the gavel fell at the last joint session with no election for United States Senator.

It was a memorable contest, in which party and factional strife ran high. On the last ballot, and one or two preceding ones, Mr. Clark came within two votes of an election, receiving the support of one Populist and several Republicans, in addition to that of the faithful band of twenty-six Democrats that stood true to him from start to finish. Mr. Clark headed the delegation to the Democratic National Convention at Chicago in 1892, and has been justly recognized by the administration in the distribution of federal patronage in this State.

In concluding this reference to a unique career, it may be safely said that no man in Montana has been more highly honored by his party, or has more richly deserved the confidence and leadership by one accord awarded to him. At all times and under all circumstances he has been faithful to his party,—as constant and true-fixed as the northern star. Enjoying many victories in business affairs and having been repeatedly honored by his fellow-citizens, it remained for the year 1894 to bring to Mr. Clark his greatest triumph and most enduring laurels. In this year the permanent seat of government of Montana was located. In 1892 the first capital contest, in which several towns were entered, resulted in leaving Helena and Anaconda in the field as the only candidates which could lay claim to the suffrage of the people. Helena was the temporary capital. Anaconda being the Anaconda Company's candidate, had immense financial backing and enjoyed the advantage of a powerful political alliance. For a time it seemed that this town, owned and controlled by one corporation, would win the day. People who feared the consequences of such an outcome were without a leadership upon which they could lean with confidence. Helena forces were without organization. At this juncture W. A. Clark, whose home is within plain view of the Anaconda mines in Butte, and who was therefore surrounded by the strongest Anaconda influences in the State, cast aside all personal and political ambitions and entered the fight for the people. From the day that he made his position known through the columns of his newspaper, the Butte Miner, until election day, he was the recognized leader of the Helena forces. Not only did he contribute liberally of his time and means, but he took the stump and addressed the people in the principal cities of the State, making a most powerful and eloquent appeal to their pride and patriotism. Never in the history of this or any other State was a battle more intense or exciting; never did the people more keenly feel that their rights and liberties were at stake, and never did a citizen receive a greater or more spontaneous ovation than that which Mr. Clark enjoyed when, after having unquestionably snatched victory from defeat, the people of the State gathered in thousands at Helena to do him honor. The citizens bore him on their shoulders from his train, placed him in a carriage, and then, detaching the horses, took their places at the pole and triumphantly hauled it to the city as a victor's chariot.

country, had married an influential chief's daughter, and, by a wise and just course, had gained great authority, and had keep this tribe, the Shastas, from taking part in the great uprising which finally spread all over the coast. The Indians had determined on a war of extermination. It ended in the utter extinction of many tribes in Oregon and some in California.

"Courage was not lacking in those days, but coolness and experience in Indian warfare were wanting. Gibson had all these. So had Mountain Joe; but Joe had lost an eye by an arrow, and the other eye was not good. So he deferred to Gibson. Major Dribelbies, then sheriff, and Ike Hare, each took active part in trying to keep down the uprising of savages, and also in getting up an expedition against those in revolt, while Joe and I went back, and, with such friends as we could gather, waited at the base of Castle Crags for Gibson and his men.

"Amazing as it may seem, he brought but about fifty, all told, Indians and whites; and yet he was the only man who could have done as well. The miners were already more than disgusted with the country, and Indians rarely fight Indians in a general uprising like this. Mountain Joe could raise but ten men of his own.

"Gibson led straight up Big Castle creek, as if avoiding Castle Crags and the savages entrenched there. He kept himself almost entirely with his Indians, and hard things were said of him by the worn and discouraged white volunteers. They suspected that he was afraid

It was a battle never to be forgotten, and the unprecedented expressions of gratitude which were showered upon Mr. Clark formed a climax of triumph such as rarely crowns the efforts of man. It was a victory which easily gives Mr. Clark rank as the first citizen of his State, and one of the most commanding figures of the West.

In March, 1869, Mr. Clark was married to Kate L. Stauffer, a highly accomplished lady of Connellsville, Pennsylvania. The couple started on their wedding day for their distant home in the mountains. They made their residence at Helena, and here their first child, Mary C., was born, in January, 1870. Locating that year in Deer Lodge, their other children were born in this town, with the exception of the youngest child, Francis Paul, who was born at Paris, France. Six children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Clark, one of them, Jessie (twin sister of Katharine L., now living), died in Deer Lodge in April, 1888, at the age of three years. The eldest, Mary C., was happily married in April, 1891, to Dr. E. M. Culver, of New York city, a successful practitioner, and is the mistress of a beautiful home in the metropolis. Charles W., their eldest son, is a graduate of Yale College, and has supplemented the regular academic course by taking a degree in mineralogy, thus fitting him for a successful career in the mining world, and is now in full charge of a copper mine and smelting plant at Houston, Idaho. In 1879 Mr. Clark took his family to Paris, where they remained three years, all of them besides himself having acquired a thorough knowledge of the French language. He then sent them to Dresden, Germany, for two years to acquire a knowledge of the German language. During these years Mr. Clark spent the winters in Europe, and he and Mrs. Clark and the elder children traveled extensively throughout Europe, and in parts of Asia and Africa. In later years, besides their beautiful home in Butte, they have maintained a residence in a fashionable district in New York city, where a portion of each year was spent, and where the younger boys, William A. and Francis Paul, are preparing for college.

On the 19th day of October, 1893, Mr. Clark met with the greatest loss of his life in the death of his wife, which occurred at the family residence in New York city, after a brief illness. The deceased was a lady of rare intelligence and refinement, a fitting helpmate for her active and ambitious husband, and her death was sincerely mourned by many Montana friends.

This sketch of Mr. Clark is necessarily general in its character. To go into the interesting details of his life, of the struggles of his early manhood and successes of later days, would require a volume in itself, and one that would not be lacking in interest. Enough has been submitted, however, to prove that he is entitled to a place in the first ranks of the brave, determined, energetic and self-made men of the West, who have builded a new empire in the Rocky mountains in the last quarter of a century.

Mr. Clark is yet in the prime of life, and is pushing on to greater and grander achievements. His wealth is variously estimated at from five to ten millions of dollars, but he is still the same warm and steadfast friend, the same genial companion as of yore. He has accumulated riches without arrogance, a rare instance indeed. Above all Mr. Clark is a good citizen, public-spirited and patriotic, proud of his State and of the greatest mining camp on earth, which is indebted in so large a measure to him for its present prosperity.

JOSEPH HORSKY, real-estate dealer at Helena, Montana, is a native of Austria, born October 6, 1842. He spent his youth in his native land, and emigrated with his parents to this country, settling in Johnson county, Iowa, near the city of Cedar Rapids. His early education was received in Austria, and after their removal to the United States he attended school in Iowa and Nebraska, his parents having moved from the former State to the latter. From Nebraska he went back to Iowa, and in 1859 started for Colorado, but at this time inducements were offered him to remain in Nebraska, which he did, and until 1862 was with his parents engaged in farm work.

In 1862 Mr. Horsky went to Colorado and engaged in to make the fight, and was trying to join the regulars under Crook in the Trinity mountains.

"At last, when our shoes and moccasins, as well as our patience, were worn out, he turned sharply to the right, making the entire circuit of the Castle. We rested by a deep, dark lake which the Indians call the abode of their devil, Ku-ku-pa-rick, and they refused to approach its grassy, wooded shores.

"Here Gibson, leaving his Indians for the first time, passed from man to man as they crouched under the trees. He told them that there was to be a fight, and a fight to a finish; that the hostiles were not an hour distant, and that no one could turn back and live, for if we did not kill them they would kill us. He told us that they had come down out of the Castle to kill deer, and so their arrows were not poisoned, and that we could swim.

"He broke us up in parties, putting good and bad together, with Indians at the head of each. He told me to go with Joe, whom he sent to make a show of attack on the side next to Soda Springs. When near the hostiles Joe put me behind a tree on the edge of a small open place, and told me to stay there. Then he went on, creeping through the dense brush, to place the other men. I put some bullets into my mouth so as to have them handy, but I do not know what I did with them. I fired a few shots after Joe opened the fight, but hit only brush and rocks, I reckon. And now quartz mining, continuing there until January, 1864. At that time he returned to Omaha for his brother John, and together they started for Montana, arriving in Virginia City on August 27, of that year. He resided in Virginia City until February, 1865, when he came to Helena, and from that time up to the present he has given his attention to the real-estate business, having considerable property in Helena and also large ranching and stock interests.

Mr. Horsky was married July 4, 1885, to Lettie Carr, and they have two daughters. He is a member of King Solomon Lodge and Helena Chapter, No. 2, and also of the A. O. U. W. Politically, he is a Republican, but is not a politician and has never been an office-holder.

Hon. William O. Speer, Judge of the Second Judicial District Court of Silver Bow county, Montana, is a native of Pennsylvania, born August 26, 1846. His grandfather, William Speer, emigrated from the north of Ireland to America soon after the Revolution, settling in western Pennsylvania, where he was an industrious farmer. He was one of the lay members of the Covanters' Church who took an active part in forming the new division of that denomination. His son Robert, the Judge's father, was born in Carlisle, that State, married Charlotte Covert, a native of the same State, and in 1855 moved to Iowa, settling in Davenport, where for many years he followed his trade of carpentering. He had seven children, of whom three are now living. He with his wife still survives, he being now in his eightieth year.

His eldest child, whose name heads this sketch, was educated principally in Davenport, graduating at the high school there. He then read law under the preceptorship of Brown & Campbell of that city, and was admitted to the bar in 1874. After practicing two years alone, he formed a partnership with N. S. Mitchell, which continued three years.

In 1880 he came to Butte City and at once opened a successful practice. Soon afterward he took part in the formation of Silver Bow county, and, being a stanch Republican, also participated efficiently in the canvass with Hon. W. F. Sanders; and in 1882 he was a candidate against W. F. Pemberton for the office of District Attorney, but was defeated. In 1884 he was elected a member of the Legislature, in which body he was chairman of the Judiciary Committee. In 1887 he was elected City Attorney for Butte, and was re-elected to this position in 1888, both times being opposed by the candidacy of Judge McHatton. In 1889 he again ran for the office, Frank E. Corbet being the candidate on the Democratic ticket; but the entire Republican ticket was defeated that year. In 1890 Judge Speer received the appointment of Superintendent of the Census for the State of Montana. In 1892 he was made a non-partisan candidate for Judge of the Second Judicial District of Silver Bow county, which position he has since filled, giving uniform evidence of his fitness for the place. He has a fine judicial mind, is thoroughly conversant with the law, and is a man who has the credit of being self-made; and he pleasantly remarks that he is "not a bit proud of the job." In his every-day life he is a very pleasant and agreeable gentleman.

To fraternal orders and other absorbing interests outside of his profession he has not devoted a great degree of attention, but he is a member of the I. O. O. F. and of the A. O. U. W.; and it is indeed a matter of wonder that such a pleasant, good-looking gentleman should have remained single all his life.

George Pascoe, President of the Board of Aldermen of Butte City, has been a resident of Montana since 1872.

Mr. Pascoe was born in England, July 8, 1845, and is a descendant of one of the old English families. He was educated in his native land and there spent five years of his early life in acquiring proficiency in the business of landscape gardening, this business having attained great perfection in that country. In April, 1872, he emigrated to America, and for some time was engaged in landscape gardening on Long Island. Believing that the West afforded better facilities for accumulating property, he directed his course toward Montana and that same year, 1872, took up his abode in Deer Lodge. At first he worked at whatever employment he could secure, and for a number of years had a position in the Insane Asylum, under pandemonium! Indians do not often yell in battle; but on both sides of us now the yelling was simply fiendish. They yelled from the top of the Castle to the bottom, it seemed to me.

"We had taken the enemy entirely unawares, asleep, most of them, after the morning's chase, and our first shots brought down their dozing sentinels on the rocks. Finally there was some parleying, and the yelling, the whiz of arrows and the crack of rifles stopped. Then some Indian women came out and across the little gorge to Joe and his men, and I, thinking they had all surrendered, walked out into the open. Gibson called from the rocks ahead of me and to my right: 'Boys, the fight now begins, and we've got to git them or they git us. Come on? Who will go in with me?' I answered that I would go, for it was all a picnic so far as I had yet seen, and I ran around to him. But there was blood on his hands and blood on his face, blood on all of his Indians, and most of the white men were bloody and hot.

"The red-skin enemies used arrows entirely. They could tell where we were, but we knew where they were only when we felt their sting. Gibson led, or rather crept, hastily on, his head below the chapparal. No one dared speak, but when we got in position, right in the thick of it, our men opened. Then the arrows, then the yelling, as never before! The women and children prisoners down with Joe set up the death song, as if it was not already dismal enough. The savages bantered us and bullied us, saying we were all going to be killed before the sun went down; that we were already covered with blood, and that they had not lost a man. I had

Dr. A. H. Mitchell. After that he went to Walla Walla and purchased sheep, and for some time continued in the sheep industry with fair success. In 1882 he came to Butte City and entered the employ of the Silver Bow Brewing Company. For some years past he has had the management of the depot at Butte City, in which capacity he has shown himself to be a capable and successful business man.

During his residence in Butte City, Mr. Pascoe has become deeply interested in its affairs and has proven himself a public-spirited and enterprising man. He has invested in quartz mining and also largely in real estate, owning a number of residences in the city. In politics he has been a life-long Republican. In 1887 he was elected by his party to the office of Public Administrator, and in 1889 was elected one of the Aldermen of Butte City. In this latter capacity he has served two full terms and is now serving on the third. For the past two years he has been president of the Board and a part of that time acting as Mayor of the city. During his long service in the Council he has made himself thoroughly conversant with the affairs and needs of the city, and is one of its most useful officers.

In fraternal circles also is Mr. Pascoe prominent and active. He is Past Grand Master of the I. O. O. F. of the State of Montana, and is Grand Representative of the Sovereign Grand Lodge of I. O. O. F. He has been Secretary of the local lodge, K. of P., for eight years, and has served as Representative to the Grand Lodge several years, also Secretary of the Encampment of the I. O. O. F. ever since it was organized. He is also a member of the A. O. U. W., is Treasurer of the lodge, a member of the Grand Lodge, and a member of the committee on its laws.

Mr. Pascoe is a widower and has two children, Alice and Mary, both born in Butte City.

FRANK BOUCHER, an enterprising and successful clothing merchant of Butte City, was born October 26, 1858, a native of Quebec, Canada, of which city his parents, Enos B. (a prominent farmer) and Victoria (Deschene) Boucher, were also natives. They had ten children, of whom nine are still living. The elder Boucher died February 5, 1889, in the eightieth year of his age, and his wife is still living, a resident of the old homestead, now in her seventy-fifth year.

Their seventh child, the subject of this sketch, was educated in the public schools of Quebec and spent three years as an apprentice to the blacksmith's trade. In 1879 he came to Butte, and there being nothing for him then to do in his line, he cut cord-wood for the first two winters, at $1.50 per cord, and then he opened a shop on Arizona street, where he carried on his trade as a blacksmith for two years. Then selling out he engaged in the livery business, with a partner, and drove a very remunerative trade for six years. Then he sold this business and engaged in the clothing trade, in company with E. A. Dany, putting in $10,000, while Mr. Dany gave to the business the advantages of his experience; but at the end of eleven months they were in debt $24,000, while they had only $18,000 in stock. Seeing something wrong, Mr. Boucher gave his partner a few hundred dollars to get him out, mortgaged his assets and pulled victoriously through, paying all the indebtedness alone, and meanwhile making a signal success with his business. He now has a large and commodious store on 45 East Park street, filled with a choice stock of clothing, gents' furnishing goods, hats, caps, boots and shoes, and he is considered one of the most successful and reliable business men of the city. He is a bright, capable and enterprising merchant.

Mr. Boucher was married in 1890 to Miss Laura Adams, a native of New York, and they have a daughter, named Mary Hallie.

As to fraternal relations Mr. Boucher belongs to the A. O. U. W., the Select Knights, the Knights of Labor, the Maccabees, the National Union and the Canadian Institute. In his political sympathies he is a Republican, and he and his wife are members of the Catholic Church.

not yet fired a shot since joining Gibson, and, rising up to look for a target, he told an Indian to 'pull the fool down by the hair,' which he promptly did.

"The battle had lasted for hours. The men were choking, and the sun was near going down. We must kill or be killed, and that soon. We must do our work before dark. The white man has little show with an Indian in battle at night.

"Gibson gathered all who could or would go, and took still another place by storm. Then Lane fell, mortally hurt by an arrow in the eye. I saw Gibson's gun fall from his hand from the very deluge of arrows; then all was blank, and I knew no more of that battle.

"The fight was over when I came to my senses, and it was dark. A young man by the name of Jameson was trying to drag me through the brush; and it has always seemed to me that a good many people walked over me and trod on me. I could hear, but could not see. An arrow had struck the left side of my face, knocked out two teeth, and had forced its point through at the back of my neck. I could hear, and I knew the voices of Gibson and Joe. They cut off the point of the arrow, and pulled it out of my face by the feather end. Then I could see. I suffered no pain, but was benumbed and cold as we lay under the pines. Joe held my head all night expecting that I would die. Gibson had the squaw prisoners carry his wounded down to the pack-trail on the banks of the Sacramento. They laid us down under some pines and pretty juniper trees on the west side of the swift, sweet river. And

CHARLES P. BLAKELEY of Bozeman, Register of the United States Land Office for that district, was born in Daviess county, Missouri, June 6, 1834. His earlier education was acquired in the common schools of the district, he remaining on the farm with his parents until he reached his eighteenth year.

In 1854 he went to Kansas and took up a farm in that troubled border region. One year later he drove an ox team to Fort Laramie and back for the Government, returning again to Kansas, and in 1856 was married to Miss Elizabeth Downen. They took up their residence on a farm near Iowa Point, Kansas, remaining there until 1861, in which year they sold out and removed to Missouri. The war breaking out, Mr. Blakeley was among the first to offer his services to the Southern cause, entering General Price's army. He continued in service until January, 1862, returning then to his home in Missouri. Here he was taken prisoner and confined at St. Joseph, Missouri, for seventeen days, when he and two others escaped by overpowering the guard and getting off in the darkness. He went direct to Iowa and remained there nearly a year, and on the seventeenth of April, 1863, accompanied by his wife, he left Omaha for the West.

His destination was the far-off Salmon river country of Idaho. They stopped in Colorado that winter, and on the 16th of May, 1864, started for Virginia City, Montana, the fame of the Alder Gulch placers having reached them. The summer of 1864 was spent by Mr. Blakeley in Alder Gulch, where he mined some and conducted a small dairy. On the 4th of October, 1864, they removed to the Gallatin valley, locating a ranch on the west branch of that stream, at which place they resided until 1870.

Mr. Blakeley and John Nelson built the first bridge across the West Gallatin river, at what is now Central Park. In 1870–1 he mined on Gold creek, but with indifferent results, and soon returned to the Gallatin valley, locating this time at Bozeman. In 1874 he moved to a farm further down the valley and engaged principally in stock-raising. In 1878 he drove his stock to the Yellowstone country and again took up his residence at Bozeman, where he has since continued to reside.

Mr. Blakeley has always taken a lively interest in politics. He voted at the first election ever held in Montana. The first primary in Gallatin county was held at his house.

He has attended nearly every Democratic county convention since, and nearly all State and Territorial conventions. In 1865 he was nominated for County Clerk and was elected by several hundred majority, but the canvassing board threw out the votes of all the precincts save Bozeman and Gallatin City, thus preventing his seating. He was elected Representative to the Legislature in 1866, that body being known as the "Bogus Legislature." From 1879 to 1882 he acted as Under Sheriff performing also the duties of Assessor, becoming thus thoroughly acquainted with the business men of the county. In 1882 he was elected Sheriff of the county, and defeated for the same office in 1884. He was again elected a member of the Legislature in 1888 and re-elected the succeeding year to the first State Legislature, being chosen Speaker of the Democratic House during the legislative block, of ninety days, so memorable in Montana's legislative history. In May, 1894, Mr. Blakeley was appointed, by President Cleveland, Register of the Bozeman Land Office, which position he now holds. Through this long public career he served the people of his county faithfully and conscientiously, and enjoys the esteem and confidence of the community in which he has been so important a factor.

His good wife crossed the plains with him in 1863, and is still at his side. They have no children. Mr. Blakeley is still an active figure in the political conventions of Gallatin county. His past experience has eminently fitted him for the position to which he was so justly appointed, and his many friends throughout that section will find him an efficient and able servant in this capacity. He is known all over the State, and known for his earnestness in supporting any cause he espouses.

Charles P. Blakeley

how tender and how kind these heroic men were! I was as a brother to them now,—their boy hero. Only the day before I had been merely 'Mountain Joe's boy.'

"Gibson's loss in killed was considerable for so small a number engaged,—several Indians, though only one white man. Indians never give their loss, because of encouragement to the enemy; and Mountain Joe and Gibson, for a like reason, always kept their list of killed and wounded as low as possible, and spoke of the battle of Castle Crags as a trifling affair. Yet General Crook, in his letter to Captain Gibson, marveled that he ever got out with a single man.

"I had promised to mark the grave of Ike Hare with a fragment of granite from Castle Crags, so that those who pass up and down the pleasant walks around Castle Crags Tavern might look with respect on the resting-place of a brave man and an honest legislator of two States. But my little tablet would seem so pitiful in the mighty presence of Mount Shasta. And it is Crook's monument, and Dribelbies' and Mountain Joe's. The finger of the Infinite traces and retraces in storm or sun the story and the glory of their unselfish value here while the world endures. It is enough.

"There are those who care to read of savage incidents in these border battles, but such things should be left to obsecurity, and I shall set down but two here. The first of these was the treatment of the dead Modoc chief. Docas Dalla, by the chief of our Indian allies. When

GEORGE A. DOUGLAS, a farmer near the Boulder Hot Springs, was born in Chateaugay, Franklin county, New York, March 7, 1831. His ancestors were natives of Scotland, and came to America prior to the Revolutionary war. His father, Augustus Douglas, was born in Vermont in 1785, but when a young man moved to Franklin county, New York, and was there married to Miss Sophia Sylvester, a native also of Vermont. They had five children, three of whom still survive. The wife and mother died at the age of forty years, and the father was afterward again married. He was an honest and industrious farmer, and lived to the age of ninety years.

George A. Douglas, the subject of this sketch, was reared to manhood on his father's farm, attended school during the winter months, and remained at home until twenty-three years of age. He then started to make his own way in the world, first going to Wisconsin, and worked as a fireman on the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad. He next secured and improved a Government claim of 160 acres of land in Nebraska, remaining there nine years. In 1861, on Christmas day, he was united in marriage with Miss Calista Allen, a native of Ohio, and one child was born to them while residing in Nebraska: Mary E., now the wife of Frank Cook and a resident of Montana. Mr. and Mrs. Douglas and little daughter crossed the plains with ox teams in 1864, was ninety-six days in making the journey, spent the first winter in Virginia City, this State, and then located on the land which he now owns in Jefferson county. Mr. Douglas first secured 160 acres, on which he built a log cabin, and began a life of honest industry. He raises grain, hay and cattle, has a large free range for his stock near his farm, and has owned as many as 200 head of cattle and a number of horses at one time. His cattle are a grade of Shorthorns.

Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Douglas in Montana, viz.: Clara M., born in Virginia City, January 31, 1865, is now the wife of Temple Grady, and resides near her parents; Elmer Allen; Arthur W., telegraph operator at the Great Northern depot at Boulder; George A., John Franklin and Pearl. Mrs. Douglas is a worthy member of the Presbyterian Church in this city. In his social relations, Mr. Douglas is an active member of the Independent Order of Good Templars, is a Republican in his political views, and is one of the representative citizens of his community.

THOMAS A. CUMMINGS came to Montana in 1867, and has since been one of her most worthy citizens.

He was born in county Kilkenny, Ireland, August 3, 1845. His father, Patrick Cummings, was born in Ireland in 1818, reared in his native county, and in 1843 married Miss Ellen Fitzpatrick, who was born in the same county and is a member of his own church. They emigrated to America in 1849, settling at Evans' Mills, Jefferson county, New York. Being a blacksmith by trade, he followed his vocation ever since he came to this country until he retired from active life. He still resides there, seventy-six years of age; and his wife also is spared to him, one year older. They are faithful adherents of the Catholic faith, people of industry and worth. Of their eight children only two survive.

Thomas A., the first-born, was attending high school when the news of the firing upon Fort Sumter was telegraphed over the country, President Lincoln issued his call for volunteers, the cry to arms resounded throughout the land and the entire North aroused as it were from a sleep. In every hamlet the fife and drum were heard. At the same instant the patriotic zeal of Cummings was excited to the fighting heat, and August 29, 1861, he enlisted as a member of Battery C, First New York Light Artillery, which was attached to the Fifth Army Corps, the Army of the Potomac. He served his term, and in December, 1863, re-enlisted in the same battery and served till the close of the war. He participated in the battles of McClellan's, Burnside's, Hooker's, Meade's and Grant's armies, was at the surrender of Lee at Appomattox, and participated in the grand review of the victorious army at Washington in 1865. During his entire time of service he didnot receive even the scratch of a wound. He was honorably discharged June 27, 1865. All this before he the body was dragged before him, where he stood in the heat and rage of battle directing his men, he threw off his robe, and, nearly naked, leaped on the naked body (for it had already been stripped and scalped), and there danced and yelled as no fiend of the infernal regions could have danced and yelled. He called his fallen foe by name, and mocked and laughed, and leaped up and down on the dead till the body was slippery with blood which gushed from its wounds, and he could no longer keep his footing. Yet after all it was only the old Greek and Trojan rage,—the story of Homer in another form of expression; and Castle Crag was Troy above the clouds.

"One more incident, as described to me by the son of this same furious chief on revisiting the battle-ground: This son of the chief was but a lad at the time, and so was left by his father with two Indians and a few white men, who were too lame and worn out to rush into the fight, in charge of the blankets, supplies and so forth. They were left in the little depression or dimple in the saddle of the mountain a few hundred feet above and to the south of Crook's or Castle lake, and in the Modoc pass or trail.

"When Gibson forced the fighting as night came on, the hostiles separated, some going down the gorge as if to reach their stores of arrows in the caves of Battle Rock (for their supplies must have been well nigh spent by this time), while others stole off up the old Modoc trail that winds up and above and around the lake, and in which the son of the chief and other Indians, as well as some whites, lay concealed. And here in this dimple on the great granite backbone that heaves about and above the lake, here above the clouds, amid drifts and banks and avalanches of everlasting snow, the wounded fugitives, with empty quivers, and leaving a red path as they crawled or crept on and up over the banks and drifts of snow, were met by their mortal enemies, face to face.

"If you will stand here facing Battle Rock to the south, and with your back to the lake, which had attained his twentieth year! He returned to his home both a veteran and a victor.

April 1, 1867, seized with a desire of adventure and of improving his financial condition, he started up the Missouri river, intending to make the rich Territory of Montana the scenes of his future activities. Landing at Fort Benton July 8, he proceeded to Helena, where he was employed during the winter of 1867 by Vanderburg & Ellis. In the spring he obtained a position in the hardware business of John Kenna, in which he continued until the autumn of 1869. In 1869 he was employed at Blackfoot City, as manager for the Montana Hide and Fur Company. In 1870 he went to Washington Gulch and opened a store on his own account, and continued it two years.

In 1872 he was appointed Indian Agent for the Flathead Indians, but his appointment was not confirmed. In March, 1873, he was, by President Grant, appointed Collector of Customs for Montana and Idaho, and served four years, when he was reappointed by President Hayes, in 1877, and served a second term of four years, being then succeeded by H. W. Hunt, now Judge of Lewis and Clarke county, who, after serving a part of the term, resigned to receive the appointment of Attorney General of Montana. In December, 1884, President Arthur restored Mr. Cummings to his former position as Collector of Customs, which position he held until June, 1889.

Since 1887 Mr. Cummings has been actively engaged in the cattle business. In the meantime he has been a special officer of the Treasury Department. He has built two residences in Fort Benton, the last, a very commodious one, in 1893, in which he and his interesting family reside. They are active and highly esteemed members of the Catholic Church, having aided in the building of their house of worship and in all the interests of the church. Politically, Mr. Cummings has always been an active Republican; is now secretary of the Republican State Central Committee, and is a respected and influential citizen of Montana.

September 4, 1880, he married Miss Mary Gallager, a native of Carthage, Jefferson county, New York, and a daughter of Richard and Maria (Sherwood) Gallager. On her father's side she is of Irish ancestry, and on her mother's American. She was American born and bred. Her father was an Englishman, and her mother a Scotch woman. Mr. and Mrs. Cummings have three children, namely: M. Marguerite, Helen S. and Thomas S. C.

S. W. Lewis.—In the person of this gentleman we find a large volume of fraternal feeling, hope, perseverance and fortitude, as will be observed as we follow his footsteps through life.

Mr. Lewis was born in the West Indies, May 19, 1835. When a small child he came with his parents to the United States and located in Newark, New Jersey, where his boyhood days were spent. His mother died in 1844, and his father in 1847, leaving young Lewis and a younger sister. From 1847 to 1852 he spent in traveling from town to town, and in the various places where he stopped working at his trade, that of barber. He soon became eager to see the great West, and at the same time he had great concern for the welfare of his sister, Edmonia. He finally secured her a home in the family of Captain S. R. Mills, where he knew she would be kindly treated, and where he paid her tuition at school. His anxiety with regard to her thus being relieved, in the spring of 1852 he went to California.

Upon his arrival in California, Mr. Lewis opened a barber shop on Commercial street, San Francisco, where he lies only a few hundred feet to the rear, though far below, you will see how impossible it was for the wounded savages to escape down the rugged crags to the left, or up and over the crescent of snow to the right. They could not turn back; they could not turn to the left nor to the right; and so they kept on. Two of them got through and over the ridge and onto the steep slope of snow, and slid down almost to the lake, where they lay for a few moments concealed in the tall grass. But their relentless red enemies followed their crimson trail, found and tomahawked and scalped them where they lay and threw their bodies into the lake.

"Like all decisive battles with swift-footed savages, this one covered a large field. The fighting, or at least the dead, and the blood on the rocks and snow, reached from the south shore of Crook's lake to the north base of Battle Rock. The cross-cut in the white spruce tree by the hand that writes this, and not far from the northernmost bank of the lake, may be set down as the outer edge of the battle-ground in that direction.

"You will find small stone cairns set up here and there on heads of granite rocks that break above the snow. It is the custom for an Indian, when passing the scene of some great disaster, especially if alone, to place in a conspicuous position a stone by the way in memory of his dead. He never rears his monument at one time, as does the white man. He places but one stone, often a very small one, and leaves the rest to time and to other hands.

"Mountain Joe, Jameson (now of Port Gamble, Washington) and others have published accounts of this fight, so that I must say no more. But I will add Captain Gibson's story of it from its own trembling hand:

"GIBSON'S SWITCH, Sacramento River,
"July 25, 1893.

"In the year 1855, there being a great rush of miners here, the Sacramento river and other streams became muddy, thereby obstructing the run of fish. The Indians became very indignant on account of it stopping the run of fish, which was their principal living. They commenced making preparations for hostilities did a good business for two years. Next he went to Sierra county, that State, where he engaged in barbering and also in mining, continuing the same successfully until 1862. Failing health at that time caused him to relinquish his hold on business, and the following two years he spent in travel, visiting the various cities and other points of interest in Europe and also stopping for a time at the West Indies. He returned to San Francisco in 1864, but as business was somewhat dull there at that time he directed his course toward Portland, Oregon, and soon afterward went to Idaho City. At the last-named place he engaged in business, erecting buildings, etc., and in 1866 met with misfortune in the way of fire, two of his fine buildings being consumed. And we here state that before starting on his trip to Europe, and while operating in Sierra county, he accumulated $5,000 in gold, which he had on deposit with two different firms in San Francisco. Both of these firms failed and he lost every dollar. But, not discouraged, he went to work with renewed vigor to make more.

In 1866 he made a tour of Montana, visiting Virginia City, Helena and other points, and finally located at Elk Creek, where he purchased a lot and erected a building. Later in the season, however, he changed his residence to Helena, where he was engaged in business until late in 1867. He then opened a shop in Radersburg, and at the same time traveled and worked at his trade in other mining camps. He had in the meantime traveled with shows, he being an expert sleight-of-hand performer and a first-class musician. And all these years, be it said to his credit that he never indulged in strong drink and never gambled; in fact, he did not know one card from another.

Although far away from his sister, Mr. Lewis still paid her expenses at school, first at McGrawville, New York, and afterward at Oberlin College, Ohio. While at Oberlin she first showed talent as a sculptor. One of the professors in the college had a peculiar visage and wore glasses. There had been some putty left in the college building by repairing workmen, and this putty she used in making a bust model of the professor, which she had on her stand in her room, and which, when observed by ladies visiting the college was pronounced an excellent likeness. These friends advised her to cultivate her talent in that art. She accordingly consulted her brother by letter and he cordially entered into the plan and furnished her means with which to go to Boston, where she placed herself under the instruction of an eminent sculptor, Professor Brackett. She soon passed beyond his ability to teach her, and her brother, pleased with her progress, furnished her the means to continue her studies in Italy. Hon. William H. Seward was then Secretary of State, and from him she received letters of introduction to the American consuls at Florence and Paris, who paid her marked attention. She arduously pursued her studies as a sculptor, and soon became master of her profession. The name of Edmonia Lewis, a resident of Paris, France, is now known the world over as a famous sculptor. She has produced many noted pieces of art, and received a gold medal from King Victor Emanuel, of Italy, as a mark of his appreciation of her taste and skill. It is needless to say that no one feels prouder of her accomplishments than her brother.

In the fall of 1865 Mr. Lewis came to Bozeman and established himself in business on Main street, where he has since continued successfully. In 1870 he erected his business house on Main street, and since then he has by getting into strongholds, the principal one being the Castle Crags. Captain Crook came to the east fork of the Trinity about twelve miles from here with a company of regulars, and went out to Castle Crags with a view to break up the band, but failed to engage them.

"I sent him a letter telling him that the way I was situated, so that, by raising some men, I could destroy them. His answer was to do so, which I did. We had a severe fight,—some men killed and a number wounded. We also found that the arrows were Modoc arrows, also amongst the dead two Modoc chiefs. I sent word of the battle to Captain Crook, and he gave it his hearty approval, and thanked me.

"We had and have every reason to believe that the Indians intended to consolidate and make a general outbreak, as the Modocs did soon after do; and there is no doubt but they would have done it had it not been for that battle as aforesaid at Castle Crags. Captain Crook was afterward a famous Indian fighter, General Crook. I was enabled to reach these Indians, which Crook could not, through my father-in-law, Wielputus, the chief of the Shastas. We took twenty-nine of his men with us. R. P. GIBSON.

"This, you note, is of recent date. It is, in fact, a dying man's last utterance. Finding himself near the edge, he called on the survivors to meet him once more on the old battle-field on the thirty-eight anniversary. The mayor of Oregon City answered, answered from the cemetery there for Mountain Joe. Major Dribelbies, the old sheriff of Shasta, is buried in Oregon. Ike Hare, his associate, lies buried within a stone's throw of Castle Crag Tavern. Years after the battle, when we met in the north, and when the new country was organized, the Shasta men there who had known us of old, in their loyalty and in memory of our battle days, made one of us a judge, one of us a sheriff, and one of us a senator.

"Gibson and I went on the battle-ground alone at this last roll call, for only Jameson besides survives, and he is very ill. We marked with a Greek cross on a white spruce tree the spot where we had rested above and beyond the from time to time put up other buildings in the town, which he rents. In 1890 he completed his present handsome and commodious brick residence, fronting on Bozeman street, which, with its beautiful lawn and fine shade trees, forms one of the most delightful homes in the city.

Mr. Lewis was married August 1, 1883, to Mrs. Malissa Bruce, nee Raidia, a native of St. Joseph, Missouri. They have one child, Samuel E., aged seven years. Mrs. Lewis is a member of the Baptist Church and is a woman of many estimable qualities.

M. A. FLANAGAN, a druggist and the Postmaster at Fort Benton, came to Montana in 1866.

He was born in Dubuque, Iowa, January 6, 1841, a son of Matthew and Mary (McNarama) Flanagan, natives of Ireland who came to America, married in New York State, settled upon a farm in Iowa, and for several years, in addition to farming, the father was a contractor and builder of highways. They had two children: Mary, now the wife of Hon. T. C. Power; and Michael A., whose name introduces this sketch. The father died in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and the mother at the age of sixty-five years, both devout adherents of the Catholic faith and people of the highest respectability.

Michael A., the eldest child, was educated in the public schools of Dubuque and at Sinsinawa Mound College in Wisconsin; was in the grocery business in Dubuque, Iowa, two years, and then, allured by the gold excitement in Montana, crossed the plains and arrived at Virginia City, Montana, in July, 1866; after about one and a half years' sojourn between Virginia City and Helena he came to Fort Benton. At first here for a number of years he was in the emoloy of T. C. Power & Brother as their bookkeeper. In 1875 he started out in the drug business, being the pioneer in that line in Fort Benton, and has continued in it ever since, having a successful trade. In addition to drugs and patent medicines, he deals also in paints and oils.

Mr. Flanagan has been an intelligent Republican all his life, and in 1880 received the appointment of Postmaster, and has now held that position for more than twelve years, giving perfect satisfaction. He has financially succeeded in business; has a ranch near the city and real estate within the corporate limits, and has built both his store building and a good residence, which is one of the pleasantest homes in Fort Benton. Mr. Flanagan is a gentleman who has attended strictly to his own business, and has never sought office or desired it. He has always taken an active part, however, in the public enterprises of the town, is enterprising and liberal, and he and his family are highly esteemed by the entire community in which they have so long been active and respected citizens.

Mr. Flanagan was married in 1873, to Miss Elizabeth V. McKinley, a native of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and the daughter of John McKinley, of Dubuque, Iowa. Mr. and Mrs. Flanagan have four children: M. Genevieve, Grace, Virginia and Frank T. Both parents are active and prominent members of the Catholic Church. Mrs. Flanagan has had much to do with the erection of the church edifice, and in fact has been indentified with all its growth and prosperity.

HON. THOMAS L. GREENOUGH, one of Missoula's most successful business men, was born in Davis county, Iowa, October 25, 1851.

Thomas Greenough, the grandfather of our subject, was born in Scotland, and emigrated from that country to lake, and then followed the line of stone mounds or cairns to the south and above the lake, past the lesser lake in the saddle of the ridge that divides the water of Castle lake from those of Castle creek. The battle was fought directly under the highest crag in the northwest corner of the great castle, although on the other side of Little Castle creek. This battle rock is conspicuous above all other spires or rock of Castle Crags for hours on the way around the spurs of Mount Shasta to the north.

"Fires have swept the country here time and again since the Indians perished, and it is not nearly so well wooded as of old. Castle lake, probably from this devastation, is not half so broad and deep as when we first found it hidden in its dense banks of verdure. We thought ourselves the first white men to look down into the lake; but General Crook, with whom I served a year later as interpreter, at old Fort Crook, east of Mount Shasta, told me that he had pursued the Modocs to that point, and had set up a small mound of white marble stones near there. So that it Crook's Lake."—Joaquin Miller in the San Francisco Traveler, 1893.

General Sherman, the citizen-soldier, Montana's wisest and best friend of all outside her borders, meant business now, and when Red Cloud left the reservation and began to gather his Sioux by thousands on the Big Horn, he saw war not far off and pushed his troops to the front at once. Colonel Baker invaded the Blackfoot country and drove the savages, after a loss to them of nearly two hundred and much property, into the British possessions. General Sheridan was directed to address the Sioux.

Of course there were few Indians to be found when the federal troops came into the field to fight them. They had, as usual, gone back to America, first locating in Nova Scotia and subsequently coming from there to the United States and settling in Ohio. His next removal was to Davis county, Iowa. There he built the first water mill in that part of the State, it being located on Soap creek. Some years later he went to Harrison county, Missouri, and built a mill on Big creek in Harrison county, and in that county he spent the residue of his life and died, being seventy-five years old at the time of his death. Christian Greenough, his son, the father of our subject, was five years old at the time the family settled in Ohio. He went with his father to Iowa, and in that State was married to Miss Martha J. Lockman, a native of Indiana and a daughter of Thomas Lockman. After their marriage they settled on a farm in Davis county, and until 1857 Mr. Greenough carried on farming and stock-raising, and also bought and sold horses and cattle. In 1857 they removed to Kansas, settled on the frontier and there continued farming and stock-raising. They continued to make their home in Kansas during all the troublous times of the Civil war. Mr. Greenough enlisted in the service in 1861 and remained on active duty until 1863, when he was discharged on account of disability. His next removal was to Missouri, in 1868 went to southern Kansas, and in the latter State continued to reside up to the time of his death, January 7, 1885. All these years he was engaged in agricultural pursuits. His widow is now a resident of Missoula. They had fourteen children, eight of whom reached maturity. John, the eldest son, died in his twenty-second year; seven of the family are still living, all residents of Montana.

Thomas L. Greenough, with whose name we begin this sketch, was the second born in his father's family and is the oldest of the seven who are now living. He was six years old at the time of their removal to Kansas, and in hat State and Missouri he was reared and educated. He learned the trade of stone mason, and was engaged in railroad masonry for a number of years. After that he mined in New Mexico and Colorado, spent four years in the Black Hills, and while at the latter place did a great deal of contract work, sinking shafts and running tunnels. March 16, 1882, he landed at Miles City, Montana. There he was connected with the building of the Northern Pacific Railroad, contracting and furnishing ties. From Miles City he went to Bozeman, thence to Helena, next to Deer Lodge, and in July, 1882, came to Missoula. All this time he continued contracting and furnishing ties. In the summer of 1883 he brought a drive of ties down the Rattle Snake river to the beautiful spot at the foot of Mount Jumbo, which he afterward purchased, and on which in 1884 he erected the pleasant home in which he now resides. Since coming to Missoula he has been engaged in sawmilling, has continued his railroad contracting, and has met with success on every hand. He was one of the builders of Union Block, and has also invested in other valuable real estate in the city. Also he is a director and stockholder in the First National Bank.

Mr. Greenough was married December 25, 1879, to Miss Tennie Epperson, a native of Tennessee and a daughter of W. C. Epperson. Her father lost his life while a soldier in the Union ranks during the Civil war. Mr. and Mrs. Greenough have five children as follows: Estella, Thomas L., Harry Paul, John Epperson and Ruth.

Politically, he is a stanch Republican. By that party he was elected to the first and second State Legislatures of Montana, and while in the Legislature served on several important committees, thus proving himself a successful legislator as well as an able business man.

the reservations. A temporary peace, with much noise and sentiment on the part of peace commissions, was patched up and the volunteers of Montana were disbanded.

The actual cost involved in calling out these citizens to do the duty of those who are paid and prepared to do our fighting was something more than a round million of dollars. But, as has always been the way of Congress in dealing with California and Oregon soldiers, this sum was cut down about one-half; although I am advised by merchants and others who contributed toward putting these men in the field, that many of them made no charge at all for supplies furnished, and that as a rule all things furnished by the best merchants were put in at cost. They preferred to do it merely for the good of the country and say nothing about it,—and I can understand that feeling well, having served in the forty-eight days' campaign of the Pit River war with only a bullet hole in my arm to pay for it. True, a soldier's pay for my services and equipments was placed to my credit years later; but I prefer to let the little sum stay there, out of respect for the memory of my Quaker father.

Early in 1872 Congress set off what is known as the Yellowstone National Park, and the surveying party had to have plenty federal troops. Also the surveyors of the great continental rail-

CHARLES A. BROADWATER.—There are vestments won from the cloisters of human achievement which lie with gentle grace upon the shoulders upon which they have fallen, and an attempt to add luster to that memory which still lingers about the life of Charles Arthur Broadwater would at this time be profane and unseemly.

His name is synonymous with that of his chosen State and echoes and re-echoes amid the movements of its affairs as the living factor of his past achievements. The story of his life,—rich in adventure, great in result, and marked throughout with characteristic features,—would be a tale of more than passing interest to the world at large, but in this present day of activity a retrospective glance back through a vista of forty years, can mark but the prominent features of his life as they have passed, and must omit much which will be remembered by those who were personally acquainted with his life and movements.

The measure of merit becomes illimitable when we pause to consider the far-reaching influences of such men as Broadwater, and an effort to fathom its boundaries or to picture within the scope of a short biographical sketch the full extent of its lasting results falls far short,—but a trembling echo amid the pulsing tenets of the fleeting years.

It was in Virginia City, in 1863, that we first hear of Colonel Broadwater in Montana. Of his earlier experiences we can find but little record, or of the adventures of his trip across the plains and in ascending the Missouri river, or the time he spent at Deer Lodge before going to Virginia City. Here he entered into the life of the then active mining camp as a freighter, handling a pack train belonging to the firm of King & Gillette, subsequently becoming associated with Captain Nick Wall, who represented John J. Roe & Company, of St. Louis, Missouri, the founders of the celebrated "Diamond R" transportation lines. Here it was that Colonel Broadwater first exhibited the qualities which afterward marked his success in his subsequent undertakings. He was general superintendent of the "Diamond R" lines until the spring of 1869, when Mat Carroll, George Steell and E. G. McClay purchased the outfit in the name of E. G. McClay & Company, Colonel Broadwater remained as superintendent, was made a partner and continued as such until 1879. At this time the first railroads began to push their way into the Territory, and Broadwater turned his attention to contracting. His previous connection with the "Diamond R" line had made for him many acquaintances among the Government officers, and, with their influence, he secured a number of Government contracts. Among the first was one for furnishing the material for the construction of Fort Assiniboine: this contract was one that required a great deal of executive ability to successfully carry out. The time given for its execution was limited to six months, and the bulk of the material had to be transported by team from Fort Benton. By close management in this contract and a similar one for Fort Maginnis, he cleared a great deal of money and became the leading partner in traderships at both posts. At the former he was associated with Robert L. McCulloh, since cashier and vice-president of the Montana National Bank. At the latter point he was associated with ex-State Senator C. J. McNamara, with whom he was interested up to the time of his death, in various business ventures.

The transit from the superintendency of the various trains of wagon transportation to that of a railroad was natural, and, for Broadwater, very easily accomplished. Although lacking experience in the workings of a railroad he soon acquired a familiarity with its machinery,—thus displayed a peculiarly marked ability in that direction; and when J. J. Hill, of the Montana system, decided to push his operations to the coast, he selected Colonel Broadwater as his manager and local representative in the State of Montana. At the organization of the Montana road had to be heavily attended; and so it was that Montana, for the first time in her history, began to have protection while she toiled.

In the meantime, Red Cloud faced and fought the surveyors' escort more than once. General Custer came to the front in fine style and did dangerous work, leaving his horse killed, also his orderly, in a battle on the Yellowstone. The Sioux lost heavily here also, as he had in a previous engagement with Colonel Baker; but Red Cloud did not by any means cease harassing the surveying parties. The one advantage to Montana was the diversion of the savages' attention from her own people to those who came prepared to fight.

The sure faith in the final construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad, the adoption and geological survey of Yellowstone Park, the presence of thousands of federal soldiers, the established certainty that the climate of Montana was not temporarily or for a few seasons a mild one, but continuously so, —these, and the firm hold of the farmer on the plow-handles in place of the pick and shovel,—all these together looked like a great, bright sunrise shouldering up from the east and shining as never before on the mountain tops of Montana.

Central Branch Colonel Broadwater was made president of the company. These positions at the head of the railroad movements of the Great Northern system gave Colonel Broadwater the opportunity and field for action which he desired. He was at the head and front of this great enterprise throughout its construction in the State of Montana, and in this stupendous undertaking was found equal to every emergency which presented itself. It was work to his liking, and in the war of wits which taxed to the utmost the management of an enterprise of this kind in the face of a natural opposition of a powerful rival, he found his element. Contending with sharp, shrewd men, he became as sharp and as shrewd. His natural resources, which had become prolific through his previous years of traffic in this State, now stood him well in hand and he was never so much himself as when he had scored a point over his opposing forces. Many incidents of the spirited contentions between the forces of the Northern Pacific interests and those presided over by Colonel Broadwater could be cited; but where the difficulties seemed thickest his talents shown most brilliant and elicited the admiration of his adversaries as well as his friends. Under his supervision as president the Montana Central road from Butte to Great Falls, via Helena, and the Rimini and Marysville and Neihart branches were constructed. But it was not in the building of these short lines that the greatest service was rendered to the State by Colonel Broadwater. It was due to his untiring and assiduous efforts that President Hill was induced to extend his road into Helena and Butte, and long before President Hill had decided to build over the present routes Colonel Broadwater's active and earnest labor with him succeeded in finally having this route selected.

In this undertaking, as well as almost all others which mark the career of this brilliant life, we can see a liberality of effort which but displays the actual grandeur of his character. Not for himself were these tremendous undertakings pushed to completion, but for the constituency for whom he labored,—and that constituency was his State and his chosen city of Helena. To no single man's effort within the State can be traced the results which are to be seen in the undertakings of Broadwater. The hotel and natatorium are probably the most brilliant and enduring conceptions of his life, and in points of design and execution but demonstrate the liberality of his humanitarian efforts. Long before the beautiful city of Helena became a city, when it was but an uncouth mining village resting there upon the sides of Last Chance Gulch, was this edifice and the purposes of its construction first formulated in the mind of its promoter. The buildings and their surroundings are the most perfect in their appointments of any resort in the Northwest, and stand to-day the pride of Helena and pre-eminently the chief of Montana's many attractions.

Its construction required a faith in the future of Helena which few would have possessed, and to many at the time it seemed a rash and perilous venture. The plant with its equipment involved an expenditure of some $500,000, and, with the limited population of the State at the time of its conception, carried with its construction the necessity of operating the hotel for a number of years at a great expense to the promoter.

It was probably in view of the necessity of creating a source of revenue for this magnificent resort that the idea of establishing a military post at Helena first presented itself. Nor is it improbable that the previous connection which Colonel Broadwater had had with the Government work at Assiniboine and Fort Maginnis first encouraged the promotion of the hotel and resort at Helena. It was in the final fulfillment of this design that the Colonel undertook the great work which finally resulted in his death. The Montana National Bank was another institution which owes its inception to the busy brain which afterward made it one of the soundest financial institutions of the Northwest. At its beginning, in 1883, it was a small concern, but under the fostering care

CHAPTER XXIII.

THIRD CHAPTER ON THE BENCH AND BAR, BY EX-CHIEF JUSTICE WADE, OF MONTANA—CODIFICATION AND COMPLETION OF LAWS—THE CALIFORNIA PRACTICE ACT ADOPTED—PRESIDENT GRANT'S APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE WADE—WARM WELCOME IN A SUPPOSED COLD LAND—THE MONTANA LAWYERS—THE FIRST GREAT MINING CASE—NEW WINE IN OLD BOTTLES—BRILLIANT LAWYERS—TERRITORIAL PROTECTION OF WATER RIGHTS—ALIEN ACT VOID—MINERAL LANDS.

1871 TO 1880.

UP TO and including the January (1871) term of the Supreme Court, there had been cases concerning the capacity of water ditches as measuring the amount of water appropriated; actions for the diversion of water; concerning the place of diversion; construing the rules and customs of miners; as to the right of tailings to flow free down a mining gulch; as to forfeiture upon failing to work mining claims; as to validity of mining rules and regulations made by the miners; concerning mining partnerships, besides a large number of cases relating to real estate, possessory rights and commercial law.

The Legislative Assembly of 1869 appointed the judges of the Supreme Court, Warren, Knowles and Symes, a commission to codify and arrange the statutes of the Territory. Of this work Warren undertook the Civil Practice Act, Knowles the Criminal Laws and Procedure, and Symes the General Laws. The work of Judge Knowles was most excellently performed, the system of criminal laws and procedure codified and arranged by him having now been in force in the Territory and State for nearly a quarter of a century with but slight changes. Judge Warren made a few amendments to the Civil Practice Act of 1867, con-of its able projector it soon grew into the powerful factor in the State's financial affairs which he left at the time of his death.

Here he gathered about him some of the ablest financiers of the State. His old partner, Robert L. McCulloh, with whom he had been associated at Fort Assiniboine in 1891, was made cashier, and subsequently vice-president. The directorate at present includes: T. A. Marlow, John T. Murphy, Robert L. McCulloh, D. A. Cory, Hermann Gans, Nick Kessler, H. F. Galen, Peter Larson, Henry Bratnober, R. C. Wallace, A. H. Wilder, C. J. McNamara and R. S. Ford.

Colonel Broadwater's investments and business enterprises extended in every direction. He was largely interested in other banks throughout the State, and at Great Falls and Neihart was a prominent stockholder in the First National Bank at each place and a heavy stockholder in the townsite of Great Falls. His mining and cattle interests are to be found all over the State, and his wealth at the time of his death was estimated at from a million to a million and a half of dollars. His death was probably as unexpected to himself as it was to his State, and his many enterprises were all in that unfinished condition which marked out the necessity of much future work and development. His death came at a critical time in his own affairs and the affairs of the State, and in the urgent and dire need which the recent financial distress engendered throughout the silver-producing districts his stalwart generalship was more than missed.

The management of these vast properties has since fallen in the hands of Mr. Thomas A. Marlow, a nephew of the widow of Colonel Broadwater, and a young man of remarkable business qualifications. He was designated by Colonel Broadwater as one of the administrators of his estate, and developed in the administration of these affairs such marked business qualifications that he was subsequently elected president of the Montana National Bank at the time of its reopening after the panic of the summer of 1893.

tinuing substantially the California Practice Act then in force in that State. Judge Symes, who had charge of the codification of the General Laws, which then involved what is now known as the Probate Practice Act, followed a system which required the bringing together, under their appropriate chapters and titles, all of the statutes, whether repealed or unrepealed, that the Legislative Assembly had ever enacted upon any given subject, intending to note the decisions of the courts under the repealed and unrepealed statutes.

The work of this commission came before the Legislative Assembly of 1871–2. At that period the sessions were but forty days in length, including Sundays. The judiciary committee of the two houses changed or attempted to change the system of Judge Symes, by striking from his codification all of the repealed acts, or parts of acts, which it contained. But the shortness of the term and other duties prevented thoroughness of this work, and here is the source and beginning of the confusion and contradiction of our statutes. Acts that had been long since repealed were re-enacted, together with those that had been substituted for them.

The work of this commission, after having been passed upon by the Legislative Assembly, and enacted into law, is seen in the volume of laws entitled "Codified Statutes, 7th Session, 1871–2."

Mr. Marlow, ably assisted by Mr. Albert L. Smith, his efficient cashier, has taken the reins of this banking institution into his hands with the determination of sustaining the reputation which was so magnificently established by its able founder, and has proved himself an able official at the head of its affairs.

The entire career of Colonel Broadwater, from his first undertakings within the State up to the time of his death, shows a well formulated plan of life. Founded on a broad basis of humanitarianism, he was a most zealous advocate of the modern movements on international progress. Democratic in principle, as well as in politics, he carried his convictions into every action of his life, and when wealth smiled propitiously upon his efforts he still retained his kindly interests and genial comradship for those with whom he had labored.

Ex-Governor J. K. Toole, in speaking of Colonel Broadwater's death, says: "I have never known a death to touch a whole community as deeply as this has. Everybody seems to realize that a potent if not a dominant factor in social, commercial and political life is gone. No man in this State ever inaugurated and carried to a successful issue more great enterprises than did Colonel Broadwater. None knew the people better or had more of their confidence. He was a man of clear foresight who knew himself and knew the way before him. He led the way in all he did, he was fruitful of resource, adroit in attack, masterful in defense, relentless in pursuit. His friends are counted in every profession, every avocation and walk in life. He was lenient with those in his debt and charitable to a high degree. He was accustomed to bestow favors in a manner so easy, so graceful, so natural, that it created a pleasing sense of gratitude without any special thought of obligation. He was of gentle blood, but knew how to remember, how to resent and how to revenge. The city that he loved and in which he lived and wrought so much ought to record its lamentations in silent signs of universal mourning."

Above all let it be said that he was a man and a prince among men. There are those who have acquired successes in life in the financial and political world, who may have reached to greater results, but few there are among the world's great men who occupied the place in the hearts of their constituencies that Colonel Broadwater filled in his. His death was mourned by all who had ever known him, and the messages of condolence from the highest tribunal in the land echoed in unison with the cry from the hearts of the very children of his State, in the same grateful, loyal, loving sorrow which bespoke that true homage from his humbler friends that was paid to his memory by the lowly as well as the great. His last sickness was the direct result of influenza, which laid hold upon him while in New York city. He was there preparatory to the Senatorial fight for the Helena Post Bill, in which he was much interested, and an active and zealous advocate; and it was while making this fight that he brought on a relapse of the attack, from which he had partly recovered. The bill was passed, but Colonel Broadwater had fought his last battle. He returned to Helena victorious in his efforts, but broken in health and constitution.

When the Hotel Broadwater was reopened for the season almost the entire community turned out to see him. The Colonel remained during the evening upon the hotel veranda, exchanging greetings of cheer and accepting congratulations upon the success of his efforts in Washington and the hopeful outlook for the satisfactory perfecting of his plans. This was his last appearance in public. A cool breeze had been blowing from up the valley and he retired with a severe chill which developed

The prominent lawyers of the Territory at this time, besides those already named, were: W. E. Cullen, George May, W. W. Dixon, W. H. Clagett, James H. Brown, Joseph K. Toole, Thomas L. Napton, James E. Calloway, W. F. Kirkwood, Massena Bullard and Henry F. Williams.

After the adjournment of the January (1871) term of the Supreme Court, Chief Justice Warren and Associate Justice Symes resigned, and on March 17, 1871, President Grant appointed Decius S. Wade, of Ohio, Chief Justice to succeed Warren, and about the same time John L. Murphy, of Tennessee, Associate Justice, to succeed Symes.

Warren resumed the practice of his profession at Virginia City, and Symes at Helena. Subsequently they both left Montana, Warren to practice at St. Louis, Missouri, and later in New Mexico, where he achieved success, and Symes at Denver, Colorado, where he amassed a fortune, and was elected to Congress. He died at Denver, in 1893, leaving a name as Judge, Congressman, and citizen above reproach.

To these newly-appointed justices, as at that into a congestion of the lungs. The strain of the past month had been too much for him, and the excitement attendant upon the opening of his hotel had a bad effect. He gradually failed until Monday morning following, when he breathed his last. His last struggle for life was aggravated to some extent by a weak action of the heart, resulting from the use of tobacco; this, with the strain of his active work in Washington and the previous attack of influenza, comprised the combined forces which finally brought him to his death. Its announcement threw the entire State into the profoundest gloom. All business was for the time suspended and messages of condolence poured in from all over the world. President Harrison was among the first to send his words of sympathy from the executive mansion, and throughout the State adversary and friend alike paused to add to the universal sorrow their words of tender and reverential tribute. The business houses of Helena, his chosen and beloved city, closed their doors; and lowered flags and mourning buntings but lent to the cause their mute appeal to the memory of the sacred dead.

From a historical standpoint the life of Colonel Broadwater enters to a far greater degree into the present conditions within the State than any other of the earlier factors. His fertility of conception may be credited as the original source of an immeasurable after-result whose potential must remain as yet within the scroll of future years. His life portrayed a character of more than mere genius in a chosen profession. In fact he had no profession. His capacity was too broad to limit to the boundaries of a single walk in life. It covered the entire breadth, from a pleasant spoken word to a child at play to the shrewd, tactful commander of an army; the heights and depths perfectly balanced by a well-lighted plane of genial warmth where all could meet him in an atmosphere of perfect ease. Unassuming in this self-poise he left the fields of literature and religious controversies to those better suited, and taught a lesson of greater import and stronger impact by his example of broad humanitarianism than could the written sermons of a volume or an era of dogmatic oratory. Always a man of close and profound thought he was pre-eminently a man of action.

HILAIRE PALIN, a worthy Montana pioneer of 1863, and now a successful farmer residing in Grass Valley, a few miles east of Frenchtown, was born thirty miles south of the city of the city of Montreal, Canada, January 6, 1838, and is of French ancestry. He attended the schools of his native place, and at the age of fifteen years started out in life to make his own way in the world. He first worked for wages on a farm in New York three years, afterward went to Iowa, was next engaged in cutting wood for the steamers on the Mississippi river, followed lumbering and rafting on the St. Croix river and Stillwater lake, Minnesota, five years, spent one winter in Mississippi, being employed by the Mississippi Central Railroad Company, in the following spring went to St. Louis, thence to New Mexico, spent the next winter in Kansas City, and then crossed the plains to Colorado. Mr. Palin remained in that Territory about three years, and followed mining at Grizzly Bear Gulch and Black Hawk Point, where he made about $1,200 during a part of the summer. At that time gold had just been discovered at Virginia City, Montana, and he mined at that place two years. Taking part in all the exciting times of that period, Mr. Palin joined the Vigilant Committee, and aided the law-abiding citizens in ridding the country of the "road agents" that threatened the life and property of every honest man. He afterward engaged in ranching at Stinking Water, Madison county, where he sold his hay for $25 to $28 a ton. In 1866 he pre-empted 160 acres of Government land in Grass Valley, four miles east of Frenchtown on the Mullan Road, in 1879 homesteaded 160 acres, and has ever since resided on this property. He has raised from fifty to sixty bushels of oats to the acre.

Mr. Palin was married January 30, 1870, to Miss Angeline Finley, a native of Colville valley, Idaho, and a daughter of Patrick Finley, a Montana pioneer. Mr. and Mrs. Palin have had the following children, viz.: Mary, (now Mrs. Gabriel Russell); Isaac, Eli, Charles (who died time to all the East, Montana was an unknown region, marked on the maps as unexplored, situated on the western border of that mythical land, "The Great American Desert," inhabited by Indians, a few venturesome gold-seekers, and stage-robbers. And to one born and reared among the farms, the trees, the birds, the flowers, the sunshine and the verdure of Ohio or Tennessee where there were people, homes, schoolhouses, churches, roads and fences, a ride on a stage coach from Corinne, situated on the Central Pacific Railroad, in the Territory of Utah, northerly, over sage brush, treeless, birdless, rainless plains (now known to be excellent for grain, fruit and vegetables, when irrigated), without a habitation or the sound of a human voice, except those of the jolted and dusty passengers, and that of the stage driver, who, when the night closed in, would, especially if there were women and children on board, relate marvelous stories of stage robberies and murders, and wonderful escapes, and then up and up over barren mountains and down into deep and narrow valleys, and so on and on, for at the age of sixteen years), Lena, Eugene, Adeline, Joseph, Albert, Peter and Louis. The family are members of the Catholic Church. Mr. Palin was formerly identified with the Democratic party, but has recently joined the ranks of the Populists, on account of the question of the free coinage of siver. He has always been an industrious and honest man, and by leading such a life has acquired a good reputation in the valley in which he has so long resided.

ROBERT W. NICOL, a Montana pioneer of 1864, and now one of the representative farmers of the Bitter Root valley, one mile south of Hamilton, was born in Michigan, March 4, 1847. His father, Robert Nicol, was born in Scotland in 1800, and in 1836 emigrated to America, locating in Newark, New Jersey. He was there married to Miss Amelia Stockman, and they had six children, of whom three are now living. The family subsequently moved to Detroit, Michigan, where the father died in 1850. The mother afterward came with her son to the Bitter Root valley, Montana, where she reached the age of sixty-seven years. Both she and her husband were members of the Methodist Church.

Robert W., their youngest child, removed with his parents from Detroit to La Porte, Indiana, where they resided on a farm a number of years. He next went to Aurora, Illinois, afterward to Iowa, and in 1864 crossed the plains to Montana. At Omaha they left the Missouri river and joined a large company of emigrants for self-protection. They reached Fort Bridger July 28, of that year, where Mr. Nicol conducted a stage station for the Overland Stage Company, until the spring of 1863. He then went with ox teams to Colorado, and March 10, following, resumed the journey to Montana, arriving at Virginia City July 10, 1864. He followed various occupations there until November, then went to Bannack City, and November 19 started for the Bitter Root valley, via the Big Hole Pass. After spending eleven days on the road Mr. Nicol arrived at the place where he still resides, December 2, 1864. He was accompanied by his stepfather, D. C. Elliott, and his step-brother, Leander C. Elliott, and the three purchased three-quarters of a section of land. They erected a log cabin, and for the first few years were obliged to make their bread of bran. Their potatoes cost them $6 a bushel. Mr. Nicol followed mining at French and Washington Gulch, receiving $6 per day, and afterward conducted a dairy for three years. He sold his milk for $1 a gallon. His next occupation was freighting from the valley to the various mining camps. He sold potatoes at as high as 25 cents a pound, onions at 30 cents a pound, beets and turnips at 25 cents per pound, butter at $1.50 a pound and eggs at $1.50 a dozen. In addition to his general farming and stock-raising, he has turned his attention to fruit-growing, in which he has met with good success. In 1886 a good and commodious residence took the place of the old log cabin, which is surrounded by trees of his own planting.

Mr. Nicol was married April 2, 1878, to Miss Nellie M. Goff, a native of Kansas, and a daughter of Jacob and Emma (Reed) Goff, natives of Pennsylvania and Illinois, respectively. Mr. and Mrs. Nicol have three children: Florence M., born July 28, 1880; Robert H., July 6, 1882; and Annie A., July 26, 1884. In his social relations, our subject has passed the chairs in both branches of the I. O. O. F., and, politically, is a stanch and life-long Republican.

HON. EDWIN C. SMALLEY, the oldest and leading druggist of Stevensville, and at this writing one of the Representatives from Missoula county to the State Legislature of Montana, was born in Xenia, Ohio, October 18, 1846. His ancestors emigrated from England to this country during the Colonial period and settled in New England. His father, James Smalley, was born in Vermont in 1803, while his mother, whose maiden name was Cynthia Palmer, was a native of Connecticut. In the course of his long life he did business in Troy, New York; Xenia, Ohio; and St. Louis and St. Joseph, Missouri. At Xenia he spent twenty-five years. In his religious views he was a Presbyterian, and in every way he was a man of excellent worth. He died at Cameron, Missouri, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, and his good wife still survives him, she having attained her eighty-eighth year. They reared a family of eight children, of whom six are still living.

four days and nights, without stopping or rest, for a distance of five hundred miles, he begins to think the desert not so much of a myth, after all, and wonders why he left a pleasant home among devoted friends to exchange for such a desolation.

But when, a stranger in a strange land, he is greeted by warm hearts, such hearts as only the miners and pioneers of the far West have, he feels that the world is larger than the neighborhood of his father's farm, that the choicest flowers of friendship may bud and bloom in a country where there is not much other vegetation, and that "one touch of nature makes all the world of kin," even in the neighborhood of Mullan's Pass or the Falls of the Yellowstone.

In the summer of 1872 Justice Murphy, preferring the practice, resigned his position, and opened a law office at Bozeman, Montana, and subsequently located at San Francisco, California, where he became prominent in his profession, and served for one term there as City Attorney. In September, 1872, he was succeeded as Associate Justice by Frank G. Servis, of Ohio, a trained and successful lawyer.

Wade was not without experience as a judge before he came to Montana, and he had also served in the Ohio Senate. He was reappointed by President Grant in March, 1875; by President Hayes in March, 1879, and by President Arthur in March, 1883. his service as Chief Justice of Montana being continuous from March, 1871, to May, 1887, a period of more than sixteen years.

Edwin C. Smalley was the sixth born in the above family. His education was received in the public schools, and until he was twenty-two he was, when out of school, employed as clerk. At that age he began business on his own account at Norborne, Carroll county, Missouri, where he continued two years, at the end of which time he sold out and returned to Ohio. After conducting business in Napoleon, Ohio, four years he disposed of his store at that place and returned to Cameron, Missouri. There he started up in business, but at the end of eighteen months sold out and removed to western Kansas, settling at Osborne, the county seat of Osborne county, and doing a successful business there for four years. His next move was to Stevensville, Montana. In company with a partner he at once established himself in business here; at the end of a year and a half bought out his partner's interest, and since that time has conducted the business in his own name. He built the nice residence which he occupies and also the business house in which his drug store is located.

Mr. Smalley is a man of family. He was married May 15, 1872, to Miss Lucy Goddy, a native of Olney, Illinois, and they have one son, Lloyd, born in Stevensville, June 19, 1887.

During the most of his political career Mr. Smalley has been a Republican. Recently, however, he has adopted the principles of free trade that are advocated by the Democracy, and by the Democratic party was nominated in 1892 to represent Missoula county in the State Legislature. To this position he was elected, and his services have been performed in a manner creditable both to himself and to his constituents. While in the Legislature he served on the committees on Appropriations and Claims and on Enrollment, and was Chairman of the committee on Towns, Counties and Highways. He is a prominent member of the A. O. U. W. at Stevensville.

JOHN BOTHOLF JOHNSON, a merchant tailor of Helena, Montana, dates his birth in Helsingborg, Sweden, June 17, 1843. He spent his early youth in his native city, attending school up to the age of thirteen. Then he entered upon a five years' apprenticeship to the trade of tailor in Landskrona. At the expiration of his term of service he went to Stockholm, and eighteen months later to Copenhagen. A short time afterward he went back to Stockholm, then again to Copenhagen and other places in Denmark, and finally returned to his native land and remained there until April 5, 1867, when he embarked for the United States.

Upon his arrival in this country, Mr. Johnson first located in Brooklyn. He afterward went to Philadelphia, thence to Omaha, and in the spring of 1869 to San Francisco. After a sojourn of four years and a half in California, he returned to Europe and visited England, France and Germany, but came back again to this country and settled in New York city, where he remained until June 9, 1875. Next we find him in Denver. He was afterward in Leadville, Albuquerque, San Francisco and other Western cities, and in 1878 he again returned to Europe, this time to visit the Paris Exposition. After coming back to this country he settled in Los Angeles, California, where he made his home until 1886. Since that time he has been identified with Helena, Montana, and has carried on a merchant-tailoring business.

Mr. Johnson was married October 6, 1883, to Miss Annie Roshnofsky, a native of Austria.

The business of holding district courts in the counties of the three judicial districts of the Territory, besides two terms per year in each district for the trial of causes arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, and two terms of the Supreme Court, at the capital, had become laborious and exacting. The only means of travel was by stage coach, the counties were larger than many of the the States, and the distances to the places for holding court very great. It is estimated that Judge Wade, before the advent of railroads in 1883, traveled twenty-five thousand miles by stage coach in attending to the holding of courts in Montana, and it is probable that Judge Knowles in his eleven-years service as Associate Justice accomplished an equal task. The centers of population and business at the time were Virginia City, the capital of the Territory; Bozeman, in Gallatin county; Helena and Diamond City, in Lewis and Clarke county; Deer Lodge City, in Deer Lodge county, and Missoula, in Missoula county. These places were county seats, and the lawyers traveled from court to court, many of them having cases in every court in the Territory.

The courthouses, like those of most new countries, were not imposing temples of justice. Many important cases, involving large sums of money or valuable property, or perhaps pioneer cases, without precedents for guides, and whose decision would become foundations in the systems of law for this Western world, were fought out in log cabins, or in crude wooden structures whose walls and ceilings were lined with cheese capping for plaster, whose carpets were saw-dust or sand, whose chairs were backless boards, and whose jury seats were bare benches.

The accommodations at the hotels, if the

Mr. Johnson's experience as a traveler has been equaled by few. As a business man he is thoroughly posted in his line, is an artistic workman and has an extensive trade.

GEORGE M. HATCH, of Big Timber, Montana, was born at Griggsville, Pike county, Illinois, May 8, 1852. He attended the common schools of his native village until he was nine years old, when he "went off to the war," accompanying his father, who was a Captain in the Eighth Illinois Infantry, being afterward Major of his regiment. George followed the fortunes of the division of the Mississippi, remaining with the troops until the close of hostilities in 1865. While not old enough to carry a gun, he had a most varied and interesting army experience. After the close of the war he joined the family at Quincy, Illinois, where they located, and again for two years he attended the public schools, completing his education with one term at an Episcopal school at Racine, Wisconsin.

In 1868, he became infected with the "Western fever," and that year emigrated to Wyoming, locating at Laramie City. There he joined the Union Pacific Railroad surveyors, and carried the chain about a year. He returned to Chicago the next year, and for a time was with an engineering corps of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad. In 1870 he went to California and entered a general store at Shasta as clerk, being engaged with the same firm two years. His next employment was as agent for Wells, Fargo & Company, at Redding, California, and later as messenger on the California & Oregon Railway. He then tried ranching and stock growing on the Sacramento river, being interested with Mr. C. C. Bush in this undertaking. In 1876, Mr. Hatch left California with a band of 5,000 sheep, headed for Montana, this being one of the pioneer sheep drives to this Territory. He reached Bannack October 1, and wintered on Horse prairie, driving the next spring to Old Camp Baker, in Meagher county, where he closed out the band to good advantage and returned to California. In the spring of 1870, he took the trail for Montana with another big drive, this time with the intention of remaining in Montana to engage in the sheep business. In 1879, he located at Big Elk, one of the tributaries of the Musselshell, being the first to settle on that stream, and, in fact, one of the pioneers of the Musselshell country. Here he engaged in driving from California, and trading in sheep generally. In August, 1881, he shipped 2,000 head of mutton from Glendive to Chicago, these being the first sheep ever shipped from Montana, and the beginning of what is now a most important industry.

In 1882, Mr. Hatch became interested in a small general business at Big Timber, and laid the foundation of that prosperous town. In 1885 he sold out his ranch interests and located at Big Timber, where he still resides, and where he is extensively interested in business, real estate, stock, mining and ranching. He was one of the promoters of the telephone line from Big Timber to Lewiston and to Independence. He was one of the organizers stopping places could be so dignified, for jurors, witnesses, lawyers and judge, were of like character; but for many, the dance houses, the saloons, and the gambling places running all night with music in full blast, rendered sleeping apartments quite unnecessary.

To these isolated places, the coming of court was the event of the year, the harvest time; and with beer or whisky at twenty-five cents per drink, and other things in proportion, the expectations were never disappointed. Everything was carried on at high pressure and with lavish hand. Perhaps this resulted from the ease with which gold was washed from the ground, or it may have been the isolation of the country and the difficulties in reaching it, and the absence of other diversions and pleasure; but whatever the cause, it is certain that never was there a more generous or hospitable people than those of Montana at that period. The latchstring hung on the outside, and there was nothing too good to be shared, even with strangers. Every place of business had its scales for weighing out gold dust, and every lawyer carried a buckskin pouch for the reception of fees,—which in amount would have astonished an Eastern lawyer and dazed an Eastern client,—in the same material. But though the fees were large, the lawyers, like the other people, seemed to think the supply inexhaustible, and like them were reckless and extravagant. This characteristic did not, however, disqualify them as lawyers. For the number of people in the Territory the litigation was very large, owing to the disputes and conflicts concerning mining claims and the appropriation of water; and it is not too much to say that the bar of this period was equal to that of any other country. Notwithstanding the expense and difficulties of transportation, they had fine libraries, and when

of the First National Bank of Big Timber, and has been, in short, the leading spirit in the business and enterprise of that progressive young town.

Mr. Hatch represented Meagher county in the lower house of the Fourteenth Legislative Assembly, and assisted materially in the formation of Fergus county. Park county was created by the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly, and Mr. Hatch was named in the bill as one of the first County Commissioners. He was elected to represent Park county in the council of the Sixteenth or last Territorial Legislature, and in 1892 was elected State Senator, to serve a term of four years.

Mr. Hatch was married in 1885, to Mary L. Pound, daughter of A. E. Pound, a resident of Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin, and a brother of the late Governor and ex-Congressman, Thad. Pound, of that State. They have three children.

GEORGE G. BECKWITH, President and manager of the Boulder Hot Springs Company, was born in New York, September 11, 1839, and is of English descent. The ancestors of the Beckwiths came to America previous to the Revolution, settling in Virginia, and the grandfather of our subject, Elisha Beckwith, fought in the war for independence. They were also for many years residents of Connecticut. Our subject's father, Roswell Beckwith, went to New York when fifteen years of age, first locating in Saratoga county, and later in Madison county.

George G., the subject of this sketch, was raised to manhood in Madison county, New York. At the opening of the late war he tendered his services to his country, and August 8, 1861, entered the Forty-fourth New York Infantry, called the Ellsworth Avengers. They served in the Army of the Potomac, under Generals McClellan, Mead and Grant, and participated in the battles of Manassas, seige of Yorktown, Gaines' Mill, Malvern Hill, Charlottsville, Fredricksburg, Gettysburg, and in all the engagements of his command. At the battle of Cold Harbor a ball carried away four of his teeth, and he was several other times slightly wounded, meeting with many close calls. After serving three years Mr. Beckwith reenlisted, but was discharged by reason of being a supernumerary Sergeant. His regiment and another had been greatly reduced in numbers and they were combined in one, which made two sergeants of the same rank in one company. They could not be returned to the ranks, and in this unusual way Mr. Beckwith received his honorable discharge.

After returning from the war, he was engaged in farming in Madison county from 1865 to 1870, and in the latter year sold his farm to the railroad company. He next followed the hotel and mercantile business in Silver Creek, New York, ten years and for the following six years conducted a dining station between Butte City and Ogden, on the Union Pacific Railroad. Two years afterward he came to the Boulder Hot Springs and joined the company which now own and manage the enterprise with so much ability. The company is composed of W. B. Gaffney, F. C. Berendes and G. G. Beckwith, all of whom are gentle-occasion required would ship large numbers of books at the rate of twenty-five cents per pound to remote counties, to be used there in the trial of cases.

At the August term, 1871, of the Supreme Court, that being its first term after the accession of Wade as Chief Justice and Murphy as Associate Justice, several important cases were tried, among them that of Robertson et al. vs. Smith et al. (1 Montana, 410), which has become a leading case upon the question decided, for all the mining regions of the West.

The case had been tried before Wade, J., at the July (1871) term of the Meagher county district court. It was such a case as could not have arisen in the East, and about which an Eastern lawyer, however learned he might have been, would have known nothing at all. Certainly the trial judge having just arrived from Ohio had entered a new legal world. And to lawyers to whom mining law was not a sealed book, the case was a pioneer, and its decision has been a living precedent not only as to placer-mining claims, but as to quartz-lode locations.

Justice Knowles, who wrote the opinion for the court in affirming the judgment of the district court, held that under the act of July 26, 1866, where a citizen or a person who had declared his intention to become a citizen, takes up, holds and possesses a placer-mining claim in pursuance of the local rules and regulations of the miners of the district in which the claim is situated, the act aforesaid confers upon such person a title equivalent to a patent from the United States, so long as such rules and regulations are complied with; and so, that the appellants, who were the county commissioners of Meagher county, and a road supervisor, and who were attempting to construct a road over and men of business ability. The hotel and all appliances in connection with the house and baths are in the best possible condition, and they are doing a most excellent work for the many invalids who come to the waters for health and strength.

Mr. Beckwith is a member of the A. O. U. W. and affiliates with the Republican party.

Mrs. Laura Jane Scott, one of Montana's bravest pioneers, is the builder and owner of the Scott House, an elegantly furnished establishment of Butte City. To the pioneer women, as well as to the men, is due great credit for the part they took in braving the dangers of the frontier and paving the way for more advanced civilization.

Mrs. Scott was born in Canada, September 25, 1830, daughter of Daniel Tomlinson, a native of Dublin, Ireland, and a descendant of English ancestors. She received her early education in Indiana. Her spirit of adventure led her to make the journey to Montana in 1864, and she crossed the plains in company with some friends and greatly enjoyed the trip. Upon her arrival in Virginia City, she superintended the building of a log house on the Summit, in which she opened a boarding-house, receiving $14 per week for day board. Lumber being scarce, she had no floor in her house, and on the ground she spread down gunny-sacks for a carpet. After a year spent at this place, she removed to Ophir Gulch, and at Blackfoot City built another log boarding-house, this one being 20 x 24 feet, and costing $500. This cabin could boast of a floor, its cost being $75. She remained there two years and did a successful business. In 1865 she was married to Samuel Scott, who arrived in Montana the same year she did. In 1868 they started the Scott House at Deer Lodge, and conducted the same until 1873. Then she kept the McBarney House a year. In 1876 we find her keeping a station in the Black Hills, at a stage station sixty miles west of Deadwood. That was at a time when the "road agents" infested the country, when the stages were held up and a number of persons killed, and when both life and property were in danger. Excepting the presence of her hired help, Mrs. Scott was alone at this time, and her station was twelve miles from any settler. She armed herself with a Winchester rifle and a revolver, and right bravely did she hold her ground, determined not to surrender or be robbed without a fight. Another protection she had was a faithful Shepherd dog. One of the road agents was captured by the detectives and was taken to her barn, where he made a full confession of his connection with the gang. He was hung up three times by the neck to gain this information! She continued there until the stage route was changed, when she sold out and removed to Deadwood. There she built a nice house. Within a year from the time it was built it was burned down, and as she had no insurance her loss was a heavy one. Her next move was to Rapid City, where she kept the American House until 1883, buying a ranch adjoining the town. Then, selling her interests there, she returned to Montana. In 1885 she bought across the placer claims of respondent, as over and across the public domain, which they were authorized to do by said act of Congress, should be perpetually enjoined and restrained from so doing.

This decision, giving as it did to the local rules and regulations of miners the full force and effect of law, did much to strengthen and uphold the title to mining claims, and placed that kind of property on a solid foundation.

The January term, 1872, of the Supreme Court became important by the decision in the Gallagher-Basey case before mentioned, in which was determined how and in what manner the common law and equity jurisdiction of the district courts must be exercised and carried into effect.

At the August term, 1872, of that court, twenty-six cases were argued, submitted and determined, many of them important and controlling, in forming, building up and directing the judicial system of the Territory.

In the case of the United States vs. 196 buffalo robes, etc. (1 Montana, 489), at that term, the court, by Knowles, J., determined that Montana is Indian country under the laws of the United States regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes; the case of Donnell et al. vs. Humphreys (1 Montana, 578), by Wade, C. J., that the grant of a water ditch by general words, includes the excavated channel, the rights to the water by which it is supplied and made valuable, and another ditch which conveys water to it; the case of Griswold vs. Boley (1 Montana, 545), by Wade, C. J., defined the rights of married women to their separate property under the laws of the Territory (see Vantilburg vs. Hamilton, 2 Montana, 413, by Knowles, J., on the same subject); the case of property on Granite street in Butte City,—a lot, 42 x 50 feet, with a cheap building on it, this building also being destroyed by fire soon afterward. She then planned and built the Scott House, alluded to at the beginning of this sketch. It has three stories and a basement, is fitted and furnished throughout in the latest and most approved manner, and comprises twenty large rooms, the first floor being occupied as store rooms, and the upper part being used as a lodging-house, over which she presides as landlady in a most becoming manner. Previous to the building of this house, and while it was being erected, she rented and ran the Beaver Block House, called at the time the Scott House.

Mrs. Scott's long experience in hotel business and her extended acquaintance throughout Montana render her an excellent hostess. She owns other property in Butte City besides that referred to.

Having no children of her own, she adopted a little girl, Frankie Scott, who is now the wife of John Manning, Sheriff of Deadwood.

JOSEPH SHINEBERGER, one of the prominent and wealthy farmers of Red Rock, Montana, was born in the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, January 5, 1836, son of Nicholas and Mariane (McCullish) Shineberger.

The Shinebergers are of German origin, Nicholas Shineberger having emigrated from Germany to this country when he was a young man. He was a prominent manufacturer and was successful in his operations.

Joseph received his education in the common schools, and when he was only twelve years old went to work as errand boy in one of the offices of the English Hardware Company, where he remained one year. When he was thirteen he began learning the drug business in his uncle's store, but did not like this occupation and soon secured a position in another store, where he spent two years. After that he served as an apprentice in a shovel factory, remaining in the factory until he attained his majority. He was employed in work at his trade when the Pike's Peak excitement broke out in 1858. In the spring of the following year he went to Colorado, and at Boulder creek mined and made a good living that year. From there he went up Clear creek cañon, where he helped build a ditch above Golden, working at this time by the day. Then came a change. He first went to Tarry-all diggings, and from there to California Gulch, making money during the summer and spending it in the winter. In 1861 a gold discovery in New Mexico, known as the "Baker excitement," caused him to go to that point. When he started for New Mexico he had good clothes and a supply of money. When he returned he wore a pair of overalls made of a wagon-sheet and his moccasins were of rawhide, and he made the trip on foot and without money. He then worked at Golden and at Gold Dirt diggings for six months; thence went up to Nevada City, Colorado, where he made some money mining. In 1862 he returned home, and remained in the East until the following year.

In the spring of 1863 we again find him en route for the West, his destination this time being Idaho, and the Atchison vs. Peterson, et al. (1 Montana, 561), by Wade, C. J., determined what was an abandonment of a water ditch and water right; that the first appropriator of water for mining purposes is entitled to the same, as against subsequent appropriators, without material interruption in the flow thereof in quantity and quality, which decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in a very instructive opinion by Justice Field (—— Wall. —— See Bach, J., in McCauley vs. McKeig, 8 Montana, 389; the case of Woolman et al. vs. Garringer et al. by Murphy, J. (1 Montana, 535), determined that the prior appropriator of water for mining purposes has the right to change the place of diversion or use of the water (see same case, 2 Montana, 405; opinion by Knowles, J.); the case of Lamme vs. Sweeney (1 Montana, 584), by Knowles, J., contains an interesting discussion of the law concerning attachment and replevin, which decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (—— Wall, ——), and Thorp vs. Freed (1 Montana, 651) contains a discussion upon the subject of water for irrigating purposes. Wormel vs. Reins (1 Montana, 630), opinion by Knowles, J., has long been a precedent upon the subject of amending pleadings, after trial, to make the averments correspond with the proofs. (See also Hartley vs. Preston, 2 Montana, 415; Hershfield vs. Akin, 3 id., 442; Randall vs. Greenhood, 3 id., 506; Southmayd vs. Southmayd, 4 id., 107; Anderson vs. Hulme, 5 id., 298; Lavelle vs. Lowry, 5 id., 500; Palmer vs. McMasters, 6 id., 169; and Ramsey vs. Company, 6 id., 498.)

The other causes at that term, though important, and involving large amounts of money or journey across the plains being made with mule teams. He and his party had intended going to the Salmon river, but upon their arrival at Snake river they found that Bannack was the center of attraction, and accordingly directed their course to this camp. Here they arrived in July, 1863. The same evening of his arrival, Mr. Shineberger went up to Horse prairie and staked out a claim. Just then the famous Alder Gulch was found and he went thither, and was one of the first inhabitants of Alder Gulch. He mined there successfully for two years. Then he began a prosperous freighting business between Salt Lake City and Virginia City. Subsequently he packed flour on mules from Deer Lodge to Elk Creek. At the latter place he engaged in the dairy business, getting his cows from his farm at Horse prairie, and selling milk at $1 per gallon in large quantities, and at $1.50 per gallon for small quantities. In 1865 he came back to his Horse prairie ranch and remained a year. Then he bought his present ranch at Red Rock, which now consists of over 3,000 acres and is seven miles long. Mr. Shineberger's mining experience covered a period of seven years. Since then he has devoted his attention to farming and stock-raising, carrying on his operations on an extensive scale and meeting with prosperity. The greatest misfortune with which he has met was in the winter of 1886-7, when a large number of his cattle perished because of the severe winter, his loss amounting to no less than $75,000. For miles in every direction the ground was strewn with dead cattle. In a single year he has shipped as much as 700 tons of timothy hay.

Mr. Shineberger is a man of temperate habits and has not only been uniformly prosperous, but has also always enjoyed good health. Politically, he is a Democrat; fraternally, a Mason and a member of Bannack Lodge, No. 16.

WILLIAM JOHNS, a farmer of Little Prickly Pear valley, was born in Germany, October 15, 1835. He received his education in his native land, but after reaching manhood came to the United States, landing in New York in 1856. He afterward began his career as a farmer near Chicago, receiving $7 per month and board, and remained in Illinois three years. During the Pike's Peak excitement Mr. Johns crossed the plains with ox teams to that place, where he mined for two and a half years, and received from $1.50 to $2 a day and board. In the fall of 1863 he located in Bannack City, Montana, and three weeks later went to Virginia City, arriving there during the trial and hanging of the road agents. In the spring of 1865 Mr. Johns engaged in freighting between Helena, Fort Benton and the different mining camps, also purchased and hauled salt from Salt Lake City to Helena, for which he paid seven cents a pound and received seventy cents per pound. Five years later he assisted in building the toll road in the Little Prickly Pear valley, managed the same for seven years, and then pre-empted 160 acres of land where he now resides. In addition to his farming interests Mr. Johns kept the stage station until the railroad was built, and since that time has been engaged in raising cattle and horses on a large free range near his farm. He raises a grade of Durham cattle, of which he keeps property, contain nothing more than the application of well known principles of the law to the facts in each case.

The briefs and arguments of counsel at that term, for learning and ability, have never been surpassed in the Territory or State of Montana, and would have added dignity and strength to any bar in the country; and, if the opinions and decisions of the judges were not sound and able, the fault was not with such lawyers as E. W. Toole, W. F. Sanders, Claggett and Dixon, Sharpe and Napton, Chumasero and Chadwick, Joseph K. Toole, Shoper and Lowry, Henry N. Blake, Samuel Word, James G. Spratt, Henry L. Warren, George G. Symes, W. E. Cullen, W. J. Stephens and U. S. District Attorney Cornelius Hedges, who, at that term, attempted to enlighten and educate them.

A little later came the case of Barkley vs. Tieleke (2 Montana, 59), in which the Supreme Court, by Servis, J., decided that a water right is property in the nature of real estate, and must be conveyed by deed, and that a defective conveyance of a water right is equivalent to an abandonment thereof.

This has been a leading case and has exercised a controlling influence. It is doubtful if that influence has always been in furtherance of justice. In the early days, when water rights, especially for the purpose of irrigation, had their inception, possessory rights to land and improvements were sold and transferred without much ceremony, a bill of sale and a delivery of possession answering the purpose; and it is not very clear why a water right for use in cultivating such land might not have been conveyed with equal informality, or why, as abandonment is a question of intention, an honest purpose to convey a water right for a consideration paid, should be defeated by a technical about 600 head, and also has both work and road horses. In 1891 he built a good frame residence on his place and has piped good spring water through his house, milk house and barns.

Mr. Johns was married October 11, 1866, to Miss Margaret Hoffelt, a native of this country but of German descent. To this union was born four children,—Annie L., David F., William J. and Florence. The wife and mother died in 1879, and March 16, 1880, our subject was united in marriage with Miss Elizabeth Wallendorf. Socially, Mr. Johns is a member of the I. O. O. F. and the A. O. U. W., and, politically, he supports the Republican party. He takes a deep interest in the welfare of Montana, of which he is a worthy citizen and an honored pioneer.

W. A. ALLEN, a dentist of Billings, and one of the founders of the city, was born in Noble county, Ohio, in 1848, a son of Robert T., and Rachel (Guiler) Allen. The father was a cousin of Ethan Allen, of Ticonderoga fame. Our subject first applied himself to the trade of gunsmith, afterward to the blacksmith's trade, and finally, in 1877, turned his attention to denistry. He completed his dental education under the instructions of the American Dental Association in Chicago.

Mr. Allen crossed the plains to the Black Hills for mining purposes, arriving in July, 1877. At Spearfish he joined a party of 250 persons. They had a battle with Indians, in which seven men and one woman was killed. The party was diminished to 154 people and fifty wagons, after which Dr. Allen was chosen captain, and they proceeded to Bozeman. They had encounters with Indians at Redwater, Hay creek and on Belle Fourche river; at the latter place they killed eight Indians, and the Captain was four times wounded by red-skins while conducting the party to Bozeman. During the journey he found the body of Harry J. Morris, of Iowa, who had been killed by Frank Roberts. Captain Allen rode 1,400 miles, at an expense of $90 to himself, as a witness, and his evidence convicted Roberts, who was executed. At Virginia City, Montana, our subject was on the ground where General Custer fought and fell in 1876. He has killed many buffalo and antelope where Billings now stands, and has had many encounters with Indians while traveling on the stage between Bozeman and Miles City, during which time he lost a number of horses.

Mr. Allen finally began the practice of dentistry at the old town of Colson, but since the starting of Billings, in 1882, he has followed his profession in this city. He built the first shingle-roof house in the valley. In company with John L. Guiler, Mr. Allen owns 700 acres of land on Clark's fork, where they have founded the town of Allendale, on a strictly prohibition plan. They have completed a fine flouring-mill at that place, with roller process and water power, at a cost of $15,000. The Doctor is largely interested in stock-raising.

He was first married in 1874, in Ohio, to Josephine Houston, a daughter of John Houston, who died from disease contracted while a soldier in the late war. Two children defect in the deed of conveyance, ignorantly made, whereby the water and water right so intended to be conveyed, is held to be abandoned by the vendor, the purchaser receiving nothing, while the water is given to the subsequent appropriator. Prior to the statute of 1885, requiring a record of appropriations of water and water rights, the date and priorities of such appropriations existed only in memory, and much litigation has resulted in the adjudication of these rights. In such cases it would seem to be a dictate of justice to hold that to be the elder and prior appropriator, where in point of time the water was first taken from the stream, and to where it has, year after year, been continuously used for cultivating the land, even though there may have been informalities in conveying or in delivering possession of the land or water right from time to time, as the same passed into the hands of different owners, the continued uninterrupted use of the water on the land ought to fix the appropriation as from the date of the beginning of such uninterrupted use.

Another case, belonging to the same period, of interest and importance, is that of the Territory vs. Lee (2 Montana, 124), in which an act of the Legislative Assembly entitled "An act to provide for the forfeiture to the Territory of placer mines held by aliens," was declared void. The defendant, Fan Lee, was a Chinaman, and a subject of the Chinese Empire, and had purchased and was in possession of three thousand feet of placer mining ground, which, by the decision of the district court had been forfeited to the Territory. On appeal to the Supreme Court, in reversing the judgment below, Wade, C. J., discussed the general powers were born to that union,—William O. and Robert T. The wife and mother departed this life in 1882.

In 1887, in Fountain City, Wisconsin, the Doctor was united in marriage with Mollie, a daughter of Hon. A. Finkelnburg, of that State. He represented his county in both branches of the Legislature. Mr. and Mrs. Allen have one child, Lelah.

Our subject is one of the noted hunters of the Rockies, and may well be termed a mighty hunter or Nimrod of the West. His trophies are numerous, and his hairbreadth escapes many. He has killed thirty-nine bears, many of them grizzlies, and one weighed 1,300 pounds. He can relate thrilling scenes by the hour. One of his daring feats was made in a canoe. He sailed down the Big Horn river into the Yellowstone, and down that river to the Missouri, the Sioux Indians frequently shooting at him, but he returned them shot in return. The Doctor and wife are members of the Methodist Church, and the former affiliates with the Prohibition party. His brother, R. T. Allen, came to this city in 1882, where he is now engaged in the practice of law.

THOMAS B. GARDENER, a prominent rancher of Silver Bow county, is a Montana pioneer of 1862 and is also what is popularly termed a Forty-niner of California. He is familiar with every mode of travel and every phase of life in the West from the time of the first settlements here on up to the present, and his reminiscences of pioneer days are most interesting. A detailed account of his life and travels would fill a volume. Lack of space, however, prevents us from publishing more than a brief biography of him in this work; but the following, although somewhat abridged, will serve to show him as he is—a brave old pioneer.

Thomas B. Gardener was born at Warehouse Point, Hartford county, Connecticut, October 24, 1824. His grandfather, David Gardener, was one of the early settlers of the State of New York and it is believed that he was of Scotch origin. His son Daniel, the father of Thomas B., was born in one of the Eastern States about the year 1789, and when he grew up was united in marriage to Miss Prudence Whiple, a native of New Haven, Connecticut. They removed to Johnstown, Licking county, Ohio, in 1834, and he died there in 1844, in the fifty-first year of his age; her death occurred in 1850. Both were members of the Episcopal Church and were people of the highest respectability. Their family consisted of three sons and two daughters, and of this number Thomas B. is the only one in Montana.

Thomas B. Gardener spent his boyhood days in Ohio, and for some time worked at the cooper's trade with his father. When news of the gold discovery in California spread like wild-fire all over the country, he bade adieu to home and friends and started for the new El Dorado of the West, leaving Sandusky, Ohio, January 3, 1849, and going from there to Cincinnati and thence to Independence. At Independence he joined one of the first companies of gold-seekers that crossed the plains to California. The train with which he traveled was composed of thirty wagons drawn by horses and mules, and there were about four men to each wagon, all well armed.

and limitations of a Territorial Legislature, and held that alienage is a disability that can only be taken advantage of by the sovereign power; that a Territory, under the limitations of the organic act does not possess such power, the acts of its legislature being subject to Congressional supervision; that its courts have no final jurisdiction; and especially that a Territory could not by forfeiting to itself the possessory title of an alien to a placer mining claim, become the owner of such title for the reason that such ownership by the Territory would interfere with the primary disposal of the soil, which, under the organic act is retained by the general Government,—in other words, that the Territory by its legislature could not forfeit the property of an alien and thereby become the owner of property which if forfeited at all must belong to the United States.

Belonging to the same period is the case of McCauley vs. Gilmer (2 Montana, 202) which settled the law for Montana as to the necessary averments of a complaint in an action in the nature of ejectment, in which case, Servis, J., speaking for the court, held that the only facts necessary to be alleged in the complaint are that the plaintiff is seized in fee or for life or years, as the case may be; that the defendant was in possession at the time of the commencement of the action and that he withholds possession of the property.

The cases of Chumasero et al. vs. Potts et al.; Lawrence vs. Hickman, Sanders vs. Star and Shober vs. Calloway (2 Montana, 242), which Their journey was long and tedious, and was not unlike that made by many other emigrant parties about that time and later on. At Salt Lake they disposed of their wagons, and from there to Sacramento the journey was made with pack animals, the distance between these two places being covered in fourteen days. One member of their party accidentally shot himself and was buried by the wayside.

It was on the twenty-second of July that Mr. Gardener and his party landed in Sacramento. Sacramento at that time had only one wooden building. Mr. Gardener was offered work at his trade there at $16 per day; but he had gone to California to seek for gold in her mines, and even that large salary was not sufficient to allure him from his purpose. He mined on Yuba river, sometimes getting as high as $100 per day. In company with others, he helped to turn the course of the Yuba river and in its old bed he found considerable gold. From there he went to Coloma, and in a similar enterprise sunk his money. At one time he had about $5,000 in gold dust. This he loaned out and the gentleman to whom he loaned it lost all his property by fire. Thus were fortunes made and lost. The miner's financial status was indeed an uncertain one. Mr. Gardener mined again and subsequently purchased a boarding-house at Sanders' Bar, on the Yuba river at the mouth of Deer creek, where he remained three years and made considerable money. Afterward he was engaged in some other mining operations in California, which, however, was unsuccessful, and he then went to Sacramento and thence to San Francisco, and from there directed his course to Idaho, where he continued mining with only moderate success.

In 1862, learning of the discovery of gold at Bannack, he and others started for this point, which they reached after much difficulty. News had just been received at Bannack concerning the discovery of gold at Alder Gulch, and as soon as they had rested sufficiently they turned their steps in that direction, landing there in June. Mr. Gardener secured two claims, No. 1 above the town and No. 1 below it. He and two others mined together for two years and took out $8,000. He was at Alder Gulch during the whole of the road-agent excitement and saw five of the desperadoes hung. In 1864 he and his partners went to German Gulch, where they mined until 1869, taking out $12,000 a year every year except one, and then they got $5,000.

In 1869 Mr. Gardener sold his claim and took up 160 acres of land where he now resides, nine miles west of Butte City. To this tract he has since added until he is now the owner of 600 acres under fence, and also has a large free range besides. Here he is raising fine Durham cattle and Belmont trotting horses. As a rancher he has met with marked success.

Mr. Gardener was married in 1868 to Miss Susan Townsend of Athens, Ohio, and they have two sons: Charles T., born at German Gulch, and Turner M., born on the ranch.

Since 1848 Mr. Gardener has been a member of the I. O. O. F. Politically, he is a stanch Republican, and for four years he served as Postmaster of German Gulch. He is active in church work and is Sunday-school superintendent at Silver Bow. In speaking of his early experience here, Mr. Gardener says that after he had spent seventeen years in the wild West he returned to Ohio on a visit, this return trip costing him $350. It was made by flatboat and stage and a part of it on foot.

Willis M. Beckford

involved the removal of the capital of the Territory from Virginia City to Helena, and which were tried and determined at the January term, 1875, of the Supreme Court are of great historical interest, besides the legal questions determined and the precedents thereby established. It is most unfortunate that the briefs and arguments of counsel (W. F. Sanders, Johnston & Toole, and Chumasero & Chadwick, representing the cases for the Helena side; and Samuel Word, J. G. Spratt, H. F. Williams, H. N. Blake and C. W. Turner, that of Virginia City), in the cases do not appear in the reports, for not in the judicial history of Montana is there anything more learned or able. Every authority within reach or that could be obtained on either side was presented. The public pulse was feverish and excited. In 1869 there had been a vote by the people of the Territory upon the question of removing the seat of government from Virginia City to Helena. It was claimed that the vote showed a majority in favor of Helena, but as the returns unfortunately were burned after reaching Virginia City, before they had been canvassed, there was no means of determining officially how the vote stood, and so Virginia City retained the capital.

The act of February 11, 1874, authorized another election upon the question of removing the seat of government to the town of Helena, WALTER M. BICKFORD, Missoula, was born at Newburg, Maine, February 25, 1852. He attended the common school of his native village, and afterward the Bucksport Seminary and the Maine Central Institute, at Pittsfield, Maine. He went to Pennsylvania and studied law under Colonel George H. Bemus, at Petrolia, being admitted to the bar at Butler, Pennsylvania, in 1878. In 1880 Mr. Bickford went West, locating in Robinson, Colorado, where he successfully practiced his profession. Here he was elected City Attorney, serving his city in this capacity nearly four years. In 1884, he moved to Montana, locating at Missoula, where he now resides.

Mr. Bickford has forged his way rapidly to the front in Montana, and is to-day one of the best known men in the State. Besides winning laurels at the bar, he has made good ventures in real estate and mining, and has been quite successful in these operations. In 1888, he was elected to the Territorial Council, from Missoula county, serving with distinction in that body, and receiving the recognition as the leader of the Democratic faction. He also served his county in the constitutional convention of 1890, and the same year received the Democratic nomination for Associate Justice of the Supreme Bench of the State, suffering defeat with the rest of his ticket.

In 1892 he was appointed Commissioner of the World's Columbian Exposition, for Montana, and ably discharged the duties pertaining to this office, rendering excellent service for the State in this trying capacity.

Mr. Bickford was married in 1878, at Jamestown, New York, to Miss Emma S. Woodford, a grandniece of President Fillmore. From this union there has been one daughter.

Mr. Bickford is now a resident of Missoula county, where his extensive business interests receive his attention. His activity and eminent qualifications which have brought him to the front in the political movements of the past but bespeak the quality which will doubtless win for him the appreciation of his party in the future. He is still a young man, an active participant in the political movements of the present campaign, and will doubtless always hold a front rank in the administration of affairs from his section of the State.

MATTHEW DORRITY, a hardware merchant of Marysville, was born in New York city, in 1853. His father, Hugh Dorrity, was a native of Ireland, where he was reared to manhood and learned the machinist's trade. He was married in his native country, and in 1846 came with his wife to New York. They were the parents of nine children. The father died in Oneida county, New York, at the age of sixty-seven years, and his wife survived him only a short time.

Matthew Dorrity, the fourth child in order of birth in the above family, was raised in North Western and Boonville, Oneida county, New York. He arrived in Montana in 1877, and, being a natural machinist, followed that occupation in Lewis & Clarke county. He has the honor of erecting the first engine ever brought into the mining district of Marysville, and also blew the first whistle, the sound of which resounded in the mountains and valleys of this rich mining district, and was a prophecy of the great mining results that were to follow in the neighborhood of Marysville. Mr. Dorrity continued in the machinery and mining business until coming to Marysville, in 1883, then conducted a general mercantile store four years, afterward prospected for gold and silver mines, and now has several good claims within four miles of Marysville. In 1892 he built his present hardware store. His property is located on Main street, north of the depot. Mr. Dorrity carries a general line of hardware, tools and stoves, and in connection with his store also does plumbing and roofing.

which election took place the following August. The canvass of the ballots by the county commissioners and abstracts thereof by the county clerks of the several counties had shown a majority of ballots in favor of Helena of 912. Certificates of the canvass and a copy of the abstract of the vote in each county were required to be sent to the secretary of the Territory, and from these certificates and abstracts the secretary and the United States marshal in the presence of the Governor, were required to ascertain the result of the election. It was known by the canvass of the commissioners and the abstract of T. E. Collins, county clerk of Meagher county, that the vote of that county had resulted as follows, viz.: 561 ballots in favor of Helena and 29 ballots in favor of Virginia City, but upon opening the abstract of the returns from that county in the presence of the Governor, thirty days after the election, as required by law, it was found that by mistake, or otherwise, these figures had been transposed, and that by the return and abstract of the vote for that county there had been cast for Helena 29 ballots, and for Virginia City 561 ballots, the effect of which was to give a majority of the ballots cast at the election in favor of Virginia City for the capital.

The people remembered the failure of the election in 1869, and when they learned of this

Mr. Dorrity was married August 19, 1882, to Miss Nellie O'Brien, a native of Chicago and a daughter of William O'Brien, also of that city. Mr. Dorrity is independent in political matters, has served as Deputy Sheriff of the county, under Sheriff Kilpatrick, and is now Supervisor of Roads of his district.

WALLACE D. DICKINSON, prominent among the citizens of Great Falls, has the management of the Boston & Great Falls Land Company, of the Boston Electric Light & Power Company and of the Great Falls Street Railway Company; so that it is seen that he is a potent factor in business interests of vital importance in the growth and development of the city.

He is a native of the State of New York, born at Malone, in 1852, of ancestors who came from England to America and settled in Vermont. His father, H. G Dickinson, was born in Bangor, New York, and was for many years generel agent for the Santa Fe Railroad Town-site Company, in Kansas and Colorado, and later was general manager of the San Diego Land and Town-site Company. He married Miss Sarah King, of his native town, and all of their five children are living. Mr. Dickinson died in 1892, and his wife still survives him, residing in National City, California.

Wallace D., the eldest child, received his education in the public schools of New York and in the Brooklyn Institute, graduating at the latter in 1871. He then turned his attention to civil engineering; was for three years connected with the North Pacific Railroad; in 1871 was employed on this line of road in Montana; and was for three years in Duluth, Minnesota, in the freight department of the road. Next he spent ten years in Topeka, Kansas, in the employ of the Santa Fe Railroad Company, as their agent most of the time, but for two years had charge of a carpet and furniture store in that city. In 1886 he went with his father to San Diego and was general sales agent and partner of the firm of C. E. Heath & Company. During his connection with the firm they did a very extensive business, having in charge nearly all the town-site sales.

In 1890 he came to Great Falls to accept his present position. When he arrived the street railway and electric-light plants were in their infancy, and since that time he has given his undivided attention to them. He operates eight and a half miles of single track of electric railway, and has seven motor cars and four trail cars, which carry about 40,000 passengers per month. The power is derived from the Black Eagle Falls through the electric-light station there, the power being transmitted by turbine wheels in the basement to the dynamos above, and the building, which feet in diminisions. The plant is an 1,100-horse power, is a brick structure, being two stories high, and 40 x 160 and is using half of it at present. The company are supplying 150 arc lamps and 3,900 incandescent lamps, besides a number of power motors.

Their land interests consist of 500 acres, the East Side addition to the city, just opposite the smelters. Only a part of the property is yet platted, on which are about eighty cottages and 400 other residences. The Central Avenue street railway runs through this addition, giving half-hour service to the center of the city. Water pipes and electric lights extend through different streets of the addition. Mr. Dickinson is still a large property-holder at San Diego and National City, California. Since coming to Great Falls he has been fully identified with her growth and improvement. His management of the large interests of which he is superintendent has given the highest satisfaction. Such has been his business record in this city that he and his family are among the most esteemed citizens.

He was married in 1880 to Miss Marion Wood, a native of Galesburg, Illinois, and they have three children: Adelaide, May King and Arthur Wood.

remarkable transposition of the figures in the abstract from Meagher county it is not at all strange that they were excited. Naturally there were charges of crime and forgery. The count by the commissioners of Meagher county and the abstract of the note made by the county clerk had been published, the result had been known for thirty days, Helena had received a majority of 532 votes in that county, but the return and abstract when it reached the capital gave to Virginia City a majority of 532 votes in Meagher county.

It was contended that the only power possessed by the Territorial canvassing board was to count the vote as shown by the abstracts, even though the abstracts by means of mistake, fraud or otherwise, were known to be false, and that the canvassing board possessed no power whatever, after the expiration of the day appointed by law for canvassing the vote.

These suits were commenced in the Supreme Court, under a statute of the Territory, giving to that court jurisdiction in mandamus proceedings, to have determined whether or not the canvassing board could be required to ascertain the true and correct vote at the election, or whether the court, ascertaining from the proof the correct vote, could require the Governor to declare the result by his proclamation. These cases were against the Territorial canvassing

THE STANDARD FIRE BRICK CO., an enterprise that has done much to advance the growth and development of Anaconda and vicinity, was organized in 1886, Mr. Marcus Daly being one of its principal founders. The plant cost $80,000.

Before this enterprise was established, many hundred thousand dollars went out of Anaconda annually for building material, some of the fire brick used in the furnaces here being imported from Europe at a great cost. Clay of the best quality for all kinds of building and fire-brick purposes is found near Anconda, and now the Standard Fire Brick Company turns out as good brick as is made anywhere in the world. Its product includes brick of all shapes and dimensions, and also the celebrated silica brick, which has the reputation of standing fire better than any other brick made. The capacity of the works to manufacture red brick is 65,000 per day. One hundred and fifty men are kept constantly employed. Thus the enterprise has proved a source of wealth to its projectors and of great value to the city, both in supplying building material and in furnishing employment to wage workers.

Mr. George Perry, a man of ability and experience in the business, is the company's foreman, and to his efforts is due much of the success of the enterprise. Further mention of him is found elsewhere in this work.

GEORGE PERRY, foreman of the Standard Fire Brick Company's works, at Anaconda, Montana, was born and reared in England, and there served an apprenticeship to the business of manufacturing brick and also to the trade of bricklayer.

In 1867 Mr. Perry emigrated to America and settled in Norristown, Pennsylvania. A man named Player had a patent right on a furnace in this country, and sent to the old country for Mr. Perry to be foreman for him. From Pennsylvania he went to Chicago, where he engaged in bricklaying, being employed in the erections of many of the large structures of that city. Next we find him in Ogden. There he was engaged in contracting and building for a number of years. In 1884 he came to Anaconda and has since been identified with this place. He built the furnaces for the Standard Fire Brick Company, and also did other work for the firm, and when they learned that he was an experienced brickmaker they employed him as foreman of their factory, in which position he has since continued, rendering most efficient service, and proving himself to be the right man in the right place.

Mr. Perry was married in 1866, to Miss Lucy Bashford, a native of England, who came with him to America soon after their marriage. They have thirteen children, of whom ten are living, three of the daughters being married. Mr. Perry and his family have one of the most pleasant homes in Anaconda and are among the most respected people of the town.

He supports the Republican party, and is a member of the I. O. O. F. and the National Union.

JOHN W. TILTON, one of the leading merchants of Bozeman, Montana, is another one of the representative citizens who is entitled to personal mention in this work.

Mr. Tilton was born in Ashland county, Ohio, in 1843, son of Samuel and Mary (Ramsey) Tilton, both being descendants of pioneer families in Ohio, and Samuel Tilton being one of the well-to-do farmers of Ashland county. The Tiltons originated in England, while the Ramseys descended from the Irish. Grandfather Tilton was a soldier in the Colonial army during the Revolutionary war and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia. John W. Tilton has one brother and two sisters.

Soon after attaining his majority the subject of our sketch started out on his own responsibility, going to St. Louis, Missouri, in 1864, where he secured passage on the steamer Welcome, commanded by Captain Townsend, and bound for Fort Benton, Montana. The time occupied in making this trip was seventy-six days; fare, board, the Governor, the Auditor and the Treasurer, who had their offices in Virginia City. As they were in every way similar the cases were tried together. To the petitions of the relators it was objected by motion and demurred.

First: That the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction to issue a writ of mandamus; no original jurisdiction, and that the act of the Territorial Legislative Assembly conferring such jurisdiction in mandamus proceedings was null and void, as being contrary to the organic act.

Second: That the relators, being private citizens, had no right or capacity to invoke the writ.

Third: That no demand had been made prior to the application for the writ.

Fourth: That the court did not have authority to control the executive by mandamus.

Fifth: That the act of the Legislature requiring of the Governor, Secretary, and Marshal the service of canvassing the vote of the Territory at a general election, was a requirement unknown to the organic act and in violation of the provision thereof prohibiting federal officers from holding a Territorial office, and therefore, that the act imposing the duty of canvassing such vote upon federal officers was void.

These propositions were of vital importance, for if the petitions of the relators were sustained their cases were substantially won, for upon the facts there was no room for doubt, and if the court had no jurisdiction, or the relators no right, that was the end of the proceedings.

$150. At Fort Benton he joined a party consisting of Maj. Graham, J. C. Ramsey and a Mr. Keblinger, and together they purchased pack animals and proceeded to the south side of the Missouri river on their way to Virginia City, crossing the Belt mountain range and going down Eldora Gulch, where in after years the famous rich placers were discovered. The first settlement they struck was Gallatin. Mr. Tilton spent two years mining at Alder Gulch, but as he met with only fair success he decided to leave the mines and turn his attention to agricultural pursuits. Accordingly he came to the Gallatin valley and located near the old town of Hamilton, on the West Gallatin, where he and J. C. Ramsey each took claim to 160 acres of land. The first two years their crops were nearly all distroyed by frost, and the two years following the grasshoppers became a destructive pest and destroyed all vegetation in this locality. Thus having had four unfortunate years on the farm, he determined to try the mines again and went to Wilson creek, twenty-five miles south of Helena, where he operated with fair success for two years. At the end of that time he sold his mining interests and came to Bozeman. Here he engaged in the dry-goods and general merchandise business, being in partnership with A. M. Tanner. Seven months later he sold his share in the establishment, purchased property in the eastern limits of the town and erected a frame building thereon in which he conducted a mercantile business for four years. Then he purchased the fine business corner on Main and Rouse streets, where in 1887 he erected his present modern business block, 44 x 110 feet, two stories and basement, at a cost of $30,000. Here he is doing a large cash business in general merchandise, hardware, etc., in fact handling everything except dry goods. His magnificent store building is handsomely finished inside with hard woods. The columns at the main entrance are Massachusetts polished granite.

In speaking of his early experieuce in Montana, Mr. Tilton remarked that when he landed in Virginia City his cash capital was just fifteen cents. Produce of all kinds was high in those days. Flour sold at Virginia City in 1864 at $1.25 per pound; potatoes fifteen cents a pound; salt, fifty cents a pound. After he settled in the Gallatin valley there were two weeks that he lived on meat and potatoes; flour could not be had at any price. The year of General Custer's massacre Mr. Tilton spent three months with General Gibson down on the Yellowstone, in the employ of the Government, being in the transportation department.

Mr. Tilton was married in 1878 to Miss Mary Thompson. Her parents reside in Christiania, Norway. She is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

In his political views Mr. Tilton is independent to a certain extent, but usually affiliates with the Democratic party. His success in his life and his present financial standing give ample evidence of his business ability.

BENJAMIN PIZER, one of the old-time merchants of Montana and one of the oldest business men of Phillipsburg, was born in Poland, December 15, 1848.

When in his eighteenth year he was married to Miss Jessie Silverman, a native of his own country, and not long after their marriage they emigrated to America, sailing from Europe, April 15, 1868, and landing at New York after an ocean voyage of seventeen days. From

These propositions were argued pro and con for four days, and then the judges, besides what study and investigation they had given to the questions during the progress of the argument, were in consultation one day; and during the following night and the morning of the next day, Wade, C. J., wrote the opinion of the court (Knowles, J., concurring; Servis, J., dissenting), and at two o'clock in the afternoon, read the opinion in which it was held that the act of the Legislative Assembly conferring original jurisdiction in mandamus upon the Supreme Court was valid; that the court had authority to issue the writ; that the relators, as private citizens, had the right and capacity to petition for the writ; that no demand was necessary prior to the application; that the court had authority to compel the executive to perform a ministerial act, and that the Legislative Assembly had authority to require the secretary and marshal in the presence of the Governor to canvass the returns of a general election; and that the imposition of these duties was not the creation of an office.

The respondents then filed their answers and demanded a jury trial. This demand was refused, and subsequently Knowles, J., rendered an elaborate and able opinion upon the subject. (2 Montana, 258; Wade, C. J., concurring; Servis, J., dissenting.)

New York they went to St. Louis, expecting to come on up the Missouri river by steamboat to Montana, but they missed the boat and were obliged to spend the winter in St. Louis. During their sojourn in that city their oldest child, David, was born. In the spring they came up to Fort Benton and thence by wagon to Helena, being eight days in making the trip from the fort, camping out every night.

At the time of his arrival here Mr. Pizer's capital consisted of $150. With this he purchased dry goods and started out as a peddler in Helena. Dry goods here in those days were high, and his first bundle did not exceed fifty pounds in weight. It was large enough, however, to give him a start. For seven years he continued peddling in this way, and by perseverance and economy accumulated a little money. He then bought a wagon and for two years longer continued peddling, traveling over nearly the whole of Montana, and during that time making a wide acquaintance among the early settlers. March 28, 1878, he opened up in business in Phillipsburg, having bought out Harry Sims, who was a dealer in fruit, tobacco and cigars. Mr. Pizer continued in that business for several years. In 1889 he built his brick store-room, 19 x 60 feet, where he has since done a gents' furnishing goods business, keeping a nice stock, selling at reasonable prices and meeting with success.

Mr. and Mrs. Pizer have had three more children added to their family since they came to Montana, all born in Helena. Two, Mary and Lottie, are living. Abraham died in his eighth year.

Mr. Pizer has been a life-long Republican, and at this writing is County Commissioner of Granite county. He does not, however, claim to be a politician. His religion is that of the Hebrew. Fraternally, he is a member of the I. O. O. F., K. of P. and A. O. U. W., and he has the honor of being the Grand Patriarch of the I. O. O. F. in Montana.

ANTON HASHER, the enterprising boot and shoe merchant of Marysville, was born in Bohemia, where he was raised and educated, and also learned the shoemaker's trade. He came to the United States in 1887, and for the first six months followed his trade at Billings, Montana. He then came to Marysville, worked as a joiner three and a half years, and May 25, 1892, opened his present shoe store. Mr. Hasher keeps a complete line of stylish and reliable goods, also makes shoes to order and does general repairing. He is a young man of intelligence and integrity, an excellent mechanic and a good judge in his line of work. He is richly deserving of the patronage which the people of Marysville bestow upon him.

EDWARD W. DUNNE, Postmaster of Billings, was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1855, a son of Michael and Mary (Farrell) Dunne. The father was engaged in business in that city, and during the late war served in the Tenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, of which a number of his relatives were also members. Edward received his education in the city schools. At the age of eighteen years he went to Texas, where he was engaged in business until coming to Montana, in 1876. In 1878 he embarked in mercantile pursuits at Huntley, where he was also appointed Postmaster, was at the organization of the town of Fort Custer, then known as Fort No. 2, and at times was in the Government employ. In 1887 Mr. Dunne engaged as Postal Clerk on the Northern Pacific Railroad, after which he located in Billings, and continued in that capacity until 1889. In that year he was appointed Assistant Postmaster of Billings, under C. A. Wustum, and June 28, 1893, by President Cleveland, received the appointment of Postmaster of Billings.

Mr. Dunne was married in 1883, to Miss Anna Kierman, a daughter of Thomas Kierman, a prominent farmer of Centralia, Iowa. They have three children,—Anna K., Esther M. and Edna W. Mr. Dunne is Past Chancellor Commander of Rathbone Lodge, K. of P., of Billings, and is identified with the Democratic party.

Thereupon the causes came on for trial before the court, upon the evidence, and having ascertained therefrom the true and correct vote of the people upon the question of the removal of the seat of government, rendering a decree accordingly, and required the Governor to issue a proclamation removing the capital of the Territory from Virginia City to the the town of Helena, which was done; and thus ended one of the most important and ably-conducted legal contests of the Territory or State.

Another case of historic importance is the trial and conviction and execution of William H. Stears, in August, 1875, for the murder of Franz Warl, a charcoal burner in the Ten-Mile country, Lewis and Clarke county; for that this was the first execution for murder in the Territory upon the verdict of a lawful jury and sentence of a lawful court. Joseph K. Toole was the prosecuting attorney, and Joseph J. Williams, formerly prosecuting attorney for the county, and before that a prosecuting attorney in the State of California, defended Stears. The case had been tried at the preceding May term, which trial resulted in a verdict of guilty and a sentence to death; but on appeal the verdict had been set aside, for the reason that though the indictment charged Stears with murder in the first degree, the verdict, which was: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty in manner

HON. ALEXANDER BURRELL, who has been prominently connected with the Great Drum Lummon mine during the greater part of its history, was born near Edinburg, Scotland, January 14, 1851, a son of Archie and Eliza (Telfer) Burrell, natives also of that country. In 1856 the family came to America, locating in Chicago, where the father followed the coppersmith's trade. Soon after his arrival in this country he became a victim of the cholera and died, leaving the family without husband or father, in a strange land. The mother now resides at Great Falls, Montana, having reached a good old age.

Alexander Burrell, the second son in order of birth, received his education in the Morris, Illinois, public schools, and at an early age began his career as a miner in the coal mines of Illinois. He was thus occupied for nearly twenty years, and for a time was also engaged in the manufacture of building material and mining with his brother near Chicago. In 1888 Mr. Burrell came to Marysville, Montana, for the first two years had charge of the supplies for the Montana Mining Company, for the following two years held the position of superintendent of works for the same company, and in 1893 was promoted to superintendent of mining, his present position. He has had long and thorough experience in underground works, and is proving himself to be the right man in the right place. Since coming to Montana Mr. Burrell has identified himself with many of the offices of the county, is a Republican in political matters, and has the honor of having been selected by the people of his district as Representative in the Legislative Assembly of Montana, in which he served with honor to himself and his constituents. He was a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. Burrell was married April 8, 1879, to Miss Abby Kiersted, a native of Morris, Illinois, and a daughter of George K. Kiersted. They have had six children,—George L., Alexander A., Grace, Sidney, John and William D. Mrs. Burrell is a member of the Episcopal Church. In his social relations, our subject is a member of Helena Lodge, No. 3, A. F. & A. M., and of the A. O. U. W. of Marysville. The Burrell home is one of refinement, and Mr. Burrell is a man of the highest integrity of character.

WILLIAM H. H. DICKINSON came to Montana in 1865, and is now a well-known and prominent business man of Missoula.

The Dickinsons came from England to this country and settled in New Jersey at an early day. Mr. Dickinson's father, Jeremiah F. Dickinson, was born in Salem, New Jersey, May 15, 1795. He married Miss Harriet Sapp, a native of his own town, born June 26, 1801, their marriage occurring July 5, 1819. In 1823 they left New Jersey to seek a home in Ohio, which was then on the frontier, went first to Marietta and thence to Salem. He had previous to this time been employed as a bricklayer, but after settling in Salem turned his attention to mercantile pursuits. His wife died in 1854, in the fifty-third year of her age, and he lived to be eighty-three. They had a family of seven children, four daughters and three sons, and all but one are living.

The subject of our sketch is the youngest in the family. He was born in Salem, Ohio, October 23, 1840. That was during the Harrison campaign, and, as Mr. Dickinson's father was an ardent admirer of General Harrison, he gave his son the name of William Henry Harrison. Reared in Ohio at the time when the slavery question so greatly excited the country, he grew up to be a hater of slavery and oppression, and held himself ready to aid in ridding the Union of this great curse. When the Rebellion was inaugurated he was among the first to enlist for the war. Indeed, so enthusiastic was he about entering the ranks that he paid his own way to Kansas to enlist under Colonel Montgomery and Lieutenant Coppie, one of John Brown's men. The date of his enlistment was July 30, 1861, his company being and form as he stands charged in the indictment," did not specify the degree of the crime, and was therefore uncertain, for the reason that under such an indictment murder in the first or second degree, or manslaughter, is included. (Territory vs. Stears, 2 Montana, 325; opinion by Wade, C. J.)

In the spring of 1875, Hon. Francis G. Servis resigned as associate Justice, and returned to Ohio, and subsequently was elected Judge of the common pleas court in the Mahoning district. He died at Canfield in the same county, in March, 1877, leaving behind an unblemished record as jurist, lawyer and citizen.

Hon. Henry N. Blake, of Virginia City, Montana, formerly of Boston, Massachusetts, succeeded Servis, on August 10, 1875, as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. At the time of his appointment he had been in the active practice of his profession in Montana, for the period of ten years, and was perfectly familiar with the statutes and the decisions of the courts of the Territory. Always an accurate and careful student, he brought to the bench a thorough knowledge of the law, enriched by a long and varied experience in the courts. At the first term of the Supreme Court following his appointment he rendered several important decisions which have been often referred to as precedents, and among them: Haase vs. Corbin, 2 Montana, 409; Moxon vs. Wilkinson, id. 421; Territory vs. Perkins, id., 467; also Black vs. Clendennin, 3 Montana, 44.

At the same term, the court, by Wade, C. J.,

Company C, Third Kansas Volunteer Infantry. He was with the forces that operated on the frontier in Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, and among the Indian nations. During his service, which covered a period of three years and one month, he participated in nineteen engagements, and in all that time was only hit once, and then with a spent ball. He was mustered out August 21, 1864.
